2. WILLS ¶506(3)—CONSTRUCTION—"HEIRS"
AS CHILDREN.

A bequest to "heirs" of a person named held to refer to his children, so as to exclude his widow.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Heirs.]

Error from Superior Court, Walton County; A. J. Cobb, Judge.

Proceedings by W. T. Foster, as executor of the will of Mrs. Mary W. Sandidge, against Mrs. Jessie Nunnally and others, to construe a will. A decree construing the will was rendered, and respondents bring error. Affirmed.

W. T. Foster, as surviving executor of the will of Mrs. Mary W. Sandidge, filed a petition in the superior court of Walton county, praying for the construction of the will and a codicil thereto, and for direction in administering the estate. The items of the will necessary to be considered in deciding the assignments of error set forth in the bill of exceptions are as follows:

"Item 17. I give and bequeath to Alonzo H. Nunnally one thousand dollars in money, the same to be his full share of my estate, unless there should more come to him in the distribution of the residuum of my estate."

"Item 25. After the foregoing bequests have been complied with, it is my will that whatever remains of my estate, of cash, notes, stocks, bonds, household and kitchen furniture, books, pictures, china, silverware, and other personal and perishable property, be sold at public or private sale, as my executors may think best, or otherwise divided into three equal parts, and one part to be given to my sister, Martha E. Foster, her heirs and assigns, one part to be given to my brother, G. A. Nunnally, his heirs and assigns, and one part to be given to my nephew, Alonzo H. Nunnally, his heirs and assigns."

The instrument was executed on January 1, 1914. Alonzo H. Nunnally, nephew of the testatrix, and named as a legatee in the above-quoted items, died intestate prior to the death of the testatrix, leaving a widow and six children surviving him, and who were in life at the death of the testatrix. Alonzo H. Nunnally owned no realty when he died, and no administration has been had on his estate. After his death, which was known to the testatrix, she, on October 19, 1914, executed a codicil to her will. It is only necessary to consider so much of the codicil as follows:

"Third. The bequest in item No. 25, of my will, where I had already willed my sister, Mrs. M. E. Foster, I now in addition to said bequest in said will give and bequeath to, her the said Mrs. M. E. Foster and her heirs the oil paintings of myself and Mr. Mark Stroud, also all my room furniture and bedding and bedclothing of every kind. Also four thousand ($4,000) dollars in money, the four thousand ($4,000) dollars is to be paid from notes I have against W. H. Nunnally for the purchase money for my storehouses sold by me to said W. H. Nunnally; and it is my request, if said notes are not due at the time of my death, that the said W. H. Nunnally is to give to Mrs. M. E. Foster his note for the interest to be yearly [paid] on four thousand ($4,000) dollars until said purchase-money notes become due.

"Fourth. In addition to my bequest in my will in item No. 17, to my nephew, Alonzo H. Nunnally, I now give and bequeath to [his] heirs at law an additional one thousand ($1,000) dollars, said amounts to be paid from notes I hold against W. H. Nunnally for the purchase money for my storehouses sold by me to the said W. H. Nunnally; and it is my request that if said notes be not due at the time of my death, the said W. H. Nunnally is to give his note to the heirs at law of Alonzo H. Nunnally now deceased for the interest to be yearly [paid] on two thousand ($2,000) dollars until the purchase-money notes become due, and this shall be their full share of my estate.

"Fifth. In addition to my bequest made in item 25 in my will, for and in consideration of his promise to board and care for me during the balance of my life, I give and bequeath to my brother, G. A. Nunnally, my home in Monroe, Georgia, where I now live, for and during his natural life, and at his death to be sold and equally divided between Alonzo H. Nunnally's heirs at law and J. W. Nunnally, Mell Nunnally, Mrs. Sarah Harrison, children of the late Mrs. Mary Briscoe Nunnally."

"Eighth. I give and bequeath, should there be after all other bequests are fully paid, be left as much as one thousand ($1,000) dollars, that it be paid to the heirs at law of A. F. Nunnally equally, with the exception of W. B. Nunnally, who has already been provided for in the will."

The testatrix died on January 9, 1917, and her will was duly probated in both common and solemn form. By agreement of all parties at interest the case was submitted to the judge to be heard, and a decree rendered therein by him without the intervention of a jury. The will and codicil were put in evidence, but nothing further, save as to the death, etc., of Alonzo H. Nunnally, as above stated. The conclusions reached by the judge were as follows:

"1. The children of Alonzo H. Nunnally are entitled to $1,000 under item 17 of the will, and an additional $1,000 under item 4 of the codicil, making their legacy $2,000 in the aggregate. The word 'heir' is construed 'children,' and this excludes the widow of Alonzo H. Nunnally. The intention of the testatrix is to make [the] bequest under item 17 of the will the entire interest of the children of Alonzo H. Nunnally under the will; but this does not prevent them from taking as remaindermen under item 5 of the codicil.

"2. Item 5 of the codicil creates a life estate in G. A. Nunnally in the house and lot therein referred to, and upon his death the proceeds of a sale of the same vested in the children of Alonzo H. Nunnally and the three persons named. The word 'heirs' here also construed 'children,' which excludes the widow of Alonzo H. Nunnally. The title to the proceeds of a sale of the house and lot therefore vests in the six children of Alonzo H. Nunnally and the three persons named, each taking his one-ninth ( $\frac{1}{9}$ ) undivided interest. Item 5 of the codicil provides for a sale, but the legatees by way of reconversion have the right to take the same as realty. If, within five days after the final decree is signed and entered, the nine devisees shall file with the executor their written election to take the lands in lieu of the proceeds of a sale, it will be ordered that the executor deliver possession of the house and lot to the legatees. If no such unanimous election is filed within the time stated, the executor will proceed at once to sell the house and lot at private sale, or at public sale after the manner of administrator's sale as he may deem best. If a private sale is had, it shall be subject to confirmation by the court; the authority for a private sale not being conferred by the will, or in the codicil thereto, and being authorized only under the general equity powers of the court having all parties at interest before it.

of the will. Under this item the residuum goes to the three persons named in equal shares as in fee, that is, each takes one-third. The words 'heirs and assigns' are construed as words of limitation, and not of purchase; they limit and describe the estate of the taker named. One-third of the residuum should be paid Mrs. Martha E. Foster, and one-third to Mrs. G. A. Nunnally as executrix of G. A. Nunnally. The bequest to Alonzo H. Nunnally is the residue referred to in item 17 of the will, and the one-third of the residuum would have gone to his children if there had been no codicil, but item 4 of the codicil revokes the legacy in item 25 of the will and the related provisions in item 17 of the will.

"4. The legacy under the residuary clause of the will to Alonzo H. Nunnally, being revoked by the codicil, is the one-third of the residuum under item 25 of the will undivided. This depends upon whether the codicil contains a residuary clause. The codicil provides a conditional residuary clause in the eighth item thereof. If, after all the other bequests are fully paid, there be left as much as $1,000, that it be paid to the heirs at law of A. F. Nunnally, with the exception of W. B. Nunnally, is a provision for any residuum which amounts to $1,000 or more. Therefore the children of A. F. Nunnally, except W. B. Nunnally should take any final residuum that amounts to $1,000 or more. The word 'heirs' here again construed as children, which excludes the widow of A. F. Nunnally. As the final residuum exceeds $1,000, it is unnecessary to determine what would be the disposition of the residuum if it had amounted to less than $1,000.

"5. Counsel for the executor is requested to frame a final decree in accordance with the conclusions herein set forth."

A final decree was prepared in strict conformity with the conclusions reached and announced by the judge, and was duly rendered. The widow and children of Alonzo H. Nunnally excepted to the decree, making thereon the following assignments of error:

"First. Because the said judgment and decree is contrary to law.

"Second. Because said judgment and decree is contrary to the evidence.

"Third. Because, as plaintiffs in error insist, the court erred in holding and ruling that the bequest in residuum in the twenty-fifth item of the original will to Alonzo H. Nunnally had been revoked. Plaintiffs in error insist that said will neither expressly nor by implication known to law revokes the bequest in residuum to the said Alonzo H. Nunnally; and that the court should have held and ruled that said bequest in residuum to the said Alonzo H. Nunnally stands unrevoked and should be paid to his children.

"Fourth. Because, as plaintiffs in error insist, the court erred in holding and ruling that the children of A. F. Nunnally took any sum under said will in excess of $1,000. Plaintiffs in error insist that the eighth item of the codicil of the said will should be construed as giving the sum of $1,000 only to the children of A. F. Nunnally, except W. B. Nunnally, to be equally divided among them; and that the court should have held and ruled that the said eighth item of the codicil gave to said children of A. F. Nunnally, except W. B. Nunnally, no greater sum than $1,000, and that that sum was to be paid only in the event that so much remained after paying special bequests.

"Fifth. Because as plaintiffs in error insist, the court erred in holding that the eighth item of the codicil of the will gave to the children of A. F. Nunnally, except W. B. Nunnally, one-third of the residuum. Plaintiffs in error insist that there is nothing in the will which justifies this construction.

"Sixth. Because, as plaintiffs in error insist, the court should have held and ruled that the fourth item of the codicil of the will repeats the language of the seventeenth item of the original will, down to and including the words 'to be in full of his share in my estate,' leaving the exception in item 17, to wit, 'unless there should more come to him in the distribution of the residuum of my estate,' unaffected by anything stated in said codicil; and the court should have held and decreed that the intention of the testator was shown in the fourth item of the codicil to repeat the language of the seventeenth item of the will and to leave the exception in the said seventeenth item to stand unchanged.

"Seventh. Because, as plaintiffs in error insist, the court should have held and decreed that the remainder in the home in Monroe, provided by item 5 of the codicil, was vested in ten persons, each taking one-tenth, and that the widow of Alonzo H. Nunnally took an equal share with his children and the other devisees in remainder.

"Eighth. Because, as plaintiffs in error insist, the court should have held and decreed that the codicil of the will shows no intention to leave an intestacy as to any part of the estate, shows no intention to revoke any part of the bequests in residuum provided by the twenty-fifth item of the will, and shows no intention to name a new beneficiary in residuum; but said bequest in residuum provided by the twenty-fifth item of the will remains unchanged by the codicil."

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. In item 17 of the will Alonzo H. Nunnally is given "one thousand dollars in money, the same to be his full share of my estate, unless there should more come to him in the distribution of the residuum of my estate." In item 25, which purports to dispose of certain property as the residuum of the estate of the testatrix, it is directed that such property be sold by the executors and the proceeds "divided into three equal parts, one part to be given to my sister, Martha E. Foster, her heirs and assigns, one part to be given to my brother, G. A. Nunnally, his heirs and assigns, and one part to be given to my nephew, Alonzo H. Nunnally, his heirs and assigns." Item 4 of the codicil is to this effect:

"In addition to my bequest in my will in item No. 17, to my nephew, Alonzo H. Nunnally, I now give and bequeath to [his] heirs at law an additional one thousand dollars, said amounts to be paid from notes I hold against W. H. Nunnally; * * * and it is my request that if said notes be not due at the time of my death, the said W. H. Nunnally is to give his note to the heirs at law of Alonzo H. Nunnally, now deceased, for the interest to be yearly [paid] on two thousand dollars, until the purchase-money notes become due, and this shall be their full share of my estate."

The trial judge held that the bequest "to Alonzo H. Nunnally, his heirs and assigns," made in item 25 of the will to one-third of the residuum therein referred to was revoked by the fourth item of the codicil, which gave $2,000 "to the heirs at law of Alonzo H. Nunnally, now deceased," to be their full share in the estate of the testatrix. Error is assigned upon this holding. We agree with his honor in the ruling here made. When the codicil was executed the testatrix knew of the death of her nephew, Alonzo H. Nunnally, and she provided in the fourth item of the codicil that the heirs at law of Alonzo H. Nunnally should take $2,000 as their full share in her estate. In item 17 of the will, Alonzo H. Nunnally is given $1,000, this to be his full share of the estate of the testatrix, unless more should come to him in the distribution of the residuum of her estate. In item 4 of the codicil the bequest in item 17 of the will is specifically referred to, and $1,000 additional is given to the heirs at law of Alonzo H. Nunnally; whereas the bequest to him made in item 25 of the will is not referred to. Mentioning item 17 in the codicil, and failing to refer to item 25, evidences an intention on the part of the testatrix that the children of Alonzo H. Nunnally are to take under the fourth item of the codicil and not under the twenty-fifth item of the will. Moreover, it is significant that in item 3 of the codicil an additional bequest is made to Mrs. W. E. Foster, and it is plainly stated that the bequest was in addition to one-third of the residuum bequeathed to her in item 25 of the will. In item 5 of the codicil an additional bequest is made to G. A. Nunnally. When the testatrix made such provisions in the third and fifth items of the codicil, she certainly had in mind the provisions in the twenty-fifth item of the will, as it appears that the bequests of two-thirds of the residuum referred to in that item, that is, one-third to Mrs. Foster, and one-third to G. A. Nunnally, were ratified by the provisions of the codicil, while the persons who would have taken the remaining one-third in the residuum under item 25 of the will, if the codicil had not been executed—that is, the children of Alonzo H. Nunnally—were, in the fourth item of the codicil given, in addition to the $1,000 bequeathed to Alonzo H. Nunnally, his heirs and assigns, in the 17th item of the will, an additional $1,000, with the express stipulation that this sum of $2,000 should be their full share of the estate of the testatrix. Evidently, therefore, in view of the circumstances and the language of the will and the codicil, it was not the intention of the testatrix that the children of Alonzo H. Nunnally, who, if the testatrix had died intestate, would have been entitled, as heirs at law, to a portion of her estate, and who, if no codicil had been executed, would have taken whatever had been given him under the will, should take, in addition to the $2,000 given them in the fourth item of the codicil, a one-third interest in the residuum as provided in item 25 of the will. It was correctly held by the trial judge that the children of Alonzo H. Nunnally take $2,000 under the fourth item of the codicil as their entire interest in the estate of the testatrix, except as to what they might take as remaindermen under the fifth item of the codicil.

2. The judge further held and decreed that the codicil contains a conditional residuary clause in the eighth item thereof, which is to the effect that, should there be left, after all other bequests are fully paid, as much as $1,000, it should be paid to the heirs at law of A. F. Nunnally equally, with the exception of W. B. Nunnally, who had already been provided for in the will, and, further, that this residuary clause covered the legacy of one-third of the residuum of the estate given to Alonzo H. Nunnally under item 25 of the will—thus preventing an intestacy as to that, which was revoked by the fourth item of the codicil; and it was further decreed that the children of A. F. Nunnally, except W. B. Nunnally, should take any final residuum that amounts to $1,000 and more, the word "heir" here being construed as, "children," thus excluding the widow of A. F. Nunnally. Error was assigned upon this ruling, on the ground that under the eighth item of the codicil, the children of A. F. Nunnally are not entitled to more than $1,000, to be equally divided among them, except W. B. Nunnally, and that the $1,000 was to be paid only in the event that so much remained after paying special bequests. The language of the eighth item of the codicil is so clear and explicit as to leave no room for doubt as to the correctness of the judge's ruling in reference thereto. In executing the eighth item of the codicil, the testatrix doubtless had in mind that she had, in item 4 of the codicil, revoked so much of the twenty-fifth item of the will as bequeathed to Alonzo H. Nunnally a third of the residuum as therein disposed of, and that it was necessary to make some disposition of that one-third in order to prevent an intestacy as to it. And she therefore, in item 8 of the codicil, conditionally bequeathed it to the heirs at law of A. F. Nunnally, who had not been provided for in the will.

[2] 3. In item 5 of the codicil the home of the testatrix is given to her brother, G. A.

Nunnally, for life, "and at his death to be sold and equally divided between Alonzo H. Nunnally's heirs at law, and J. W. Nunnally, Mell Nunnally, and Mrs. Sarah Harrison." The judge held that upon the death of the life tenant the proceeds of a sale of the home vested in the six children of Alonzo H. Nunnally and the three persons named, each taking a one-ninth undivided interest therein, the words "heirs at law" being construed to mean "children," thus excluding the widow of Alonzo H. Nunnally. Error is assigned upon this ruling, because, as contended by the plaintiffs in error, the words "heirs at law" of Alonzo H. Nunnally, who died intestate leaving a widow and six children and owning an estate of personalty only, included the widow, and that she is entitled to an equal share in the proceeds of the sale with his children and the other legatees in remainder. We cannot concede the soundness of this contention, and agree to the holding of the judge in excluding the widow from participating in the proceeds of the sale of the home. From a consideration of the entire will and codicil, the evident testamentary scheme of the testatrix was to distribute her estate among her kin, who, if she had died intestate, would have been her heirs at law. In carrying out this purpose she made bequests to her brother, to her sister, and to numerous nephews and nieces. There were 27 of these separate bequests in the will and codicil, and in each one of them it was expressly and specifically stated that the legacy given—in nearly every instance approximately $1,000—"shall be [his or her] full share of my estate." It seems clear, therefore, that in executing the codicil, after the death of Alonzo H. Nunnally, which was known to her, and in the fifth item thereof, giving to his "heirs at law" one-third of the proceeds of the sale of the house and lot, after the death of the life tenant, the testatrix intended that the children of Alonzo H. Nunnally, who were related to her by consanguinity, and who, if the codicil had not been executed, or if she had died intestate, would have been entitled to share in her estate, should take as "his heirs at law" to the exclusion of the widow, who, as such, would in no event be entitled to share in the estate of the testatrix. In this view we find it unnecessary to decide whether the widow of an intestate who dies leaving an estate consisting of personalty only is, under former decisions of this court, an heir at law of her husband. See, in this connection, Cole v. Cole, 135 Ga. 19, 68 S. E. 784; Hanvy v. Moore, 140 Ga. 691, 79 S. E. 772, and cases cited.

The foregoing rulings, in effect, dispose of all of the assignments of error. We agree to the conclusions reached by the judge, and affirm his decree entered thereon.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. SIMMONS.
(No. 10257.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
July 17, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. MASTER AND SERVANT ⚡258(1)—INJURIES TO SERVANT — COMPLAINT — SUFFICIENCY.

The petition set out a cause of action, and was not subject to general demurrer.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT ⚡204(2), 217(1)—INJURIES TO SERVANT — ASSUMPTION OF RISK — ACTIONS UNDER FEDERAL EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY ACT.

The suit was brought under the federal "Employer's Liability Act" (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665), but not on account of any violation of the federal statutes for the protection of employes. Thus the doctrine of assumption of risk was available as a complete defense, since an employe assumes the ordinary risks and hazards of his occupation, and also those risks which are known to him, or which are plainly observable, even though due to the master's negligence; and no presumption of negligence existed against the defendant.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT ⚡222(2) — INJURIES TO SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—EVIDENCE.

The plaintiff was a section hand in the employ of the defendant, and was injured while engaged in the work which he was employed to perform. The uncontradicted evidence shows that, as to the acts of negligence charged, the defendant used all ordinary care for the plaintiff's safety, unless it be that the foreman was negligent in ordering him to remove the lever car at the time and place he did; and, even though the defendant was negligent in this respect, such negligence was known to the plaintiff, and was plainly observable. He therefore assumed the risk occasioned thereby, and cannot recover.

Error from Superior Court, Habersham County; J. B. Jones, Judge.

Action by Seaborn Simmons against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Seaborn Simmons brought an action against the Southern Railway Company for personal injuries, under the federal "Employer's Liability Act" of April 22, 1908 (35 Stat. 65, c. 149 [U. S. Comp. St. 1916, §§ 8657-8665]). The allegations of the petition are substantially as follows: That on February 11, 1918, while engaged by the defendant as a section hand, plaintiff was working for the defendant under the direction and control of Dalton Lovell, section foreman, who was in full charge of the section of the defendant's line of road known as the "Baldwin section;" that the plaintiff was directed by Lovell to assist the remainder of the crew in propelling a lever car belonging to the defendant, which was being used to transport the section crew and their foreman from Baldwin, Ga., to Cornella, Ga., for the purpose of repairing the tracks of the defendant's line of railroad; that when the plaintiff was on the car helping to propel it, and had traveled about half the distance from Baldwin to Cornella, one of the defendant's passenger trains came around a sharp curve, running at great speed, some 50 or 60 miles per hour, on the main track that the lever car was on; that when Lovell saw the train coming he ordered the section crew to remove the lever car from the track, which they undertook to do, but, on account of the nearness of the train and the great speed at which it was being run, they were unable to remove the car in time to prevent the train from striking it; that when the plaintiff saw that the train was going to strike the car, he undertook to get to a place of safety, but the train struck the car and knocked it from the track and against him, breaking his leg and causing other injuries described. It was further alleged that the defendant had a double track from Baldwin to Cornella, and an agent at its station at Baldwin whose duty it was to know when trains were due to arrive, and that it was the duty of Lovell, the foreman, to ascertain from the station agent at Baldwin, before starting with the lever car, if any train was due to arrive, and which track it would be on. It is alleged that the defendant was negligent in the following respects: First, in running the lever car on the same track that it was using at the time for its passenger trains at this point; second, in ordering the plaintiff to remove the lever car from the track, as the train was so close to it; third, in not warning the plaintiff of the approach of the train, in running the train at such a great rate of speed, in not stopping the train, and in knocking the lever car from the track and against the plaintiff; fourth, in not using the other track for the lever car, as the defendant knew that the passenger train was on the track at that time and place, and that it was obviously dangerous to operate the lever car on that track. It is further alleged that the plaintiff was without fault, and in the exercise of ordinary care for his own safety, and could not have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence by the exercise of ordinary diligence after the negligence of the defendant became apparent; that he did not know of the approach of the train in time to prevent the injuries, and could not have found out about the acts of negligence by the exercise of ordinary care; that it was no part of his duty to look out for trains, but this was the duty of Lovell, the foreman.

Upon the trial of the case it was admitted that both the plaintiff and the defendant were engaged in interstate commerce at the time of the alleged injury. The plaintiff himself testified:

"I had been working with Lovell ever since the last of October; October, November, December, and January. You catch trains on the double track day and night, all the time, plenty of them. * * * They generally run by schedule; they run passenger trains on schedule. I have known one to be late. I know that was late that morning. I thought it was due, thought No. 36 [the train which struck the lever car] was due. I didn't know it. I didn't know about the second 36. I knew they ran extra freight trains there sometimes. I have seen trains of all kinds, extras, and Nos. 78 and 55, 45, 29, and 39, and 44—all kinds. I knew they run trains, and I could look out for one most any time. * * * I knew I could expect a train on that track most any old time. I also know they run extra freight trains, and extra freights and passengers. They run them every once in a while, run a number of trains. When I was on the lever car I was expecting trains most any time."

The plaintiff further testified:

"On the 11th day of February, 1918, we put our car on the track and started to Cornelia to fix a railroad crossing. * * * It was about 7 o'clock I suppose. It was hardly daylight. You could see pretty well. It made the headlight of the engine shine pretty bright. The headlight was shining. * * * There were two tracks, north and south bound main line. * * * I knew I was on the north-bound line. * * * We got about half way from Baldwin to Cornelia, and Dalton Lovell looked back and saw 36 coming, and said 'Boys, let's get off and get the car off.' * * * I had my face towards Cornelia, and the engine was coming behind me. * * * The minute he said, 'Let's get off,' I knew the train was coming. * * * When I first saw the train it was at least 50 yards from me. By reason of it not being quite daylight, I don't suppose I could see him as far as he could see me. I don't suppose I could. * * * I saw the headlight when it was at least fifty yards away. * * * When I got on the ground and started to take the lever car off, it was 50 yards away. * * * I could have seen the headlight 200 yards, I guess, if we looked back. It came around the curve, and came out of the cut there. The cut at the end of the curve was 225 yards where he could have seen us. * * * Cling Buchannon and the other men picked up and left. * * * Cling left me. He had hold of my end. He joined the bird gang, and I still stood and looked at the engine, but was struggling with the lever car. * * * Burton left; it might have been just a little before I did. * * * It might have been just a minute. I say he might have left a little before I did, both of them [Burton and Lovell], but it was not over that. * * * Lovell left before I did, just a little before I did. He had his back to the lever car. I saw him leave, and then I left. I didn't leave quite quick enough. If I had, I wouldn't have got hit. * * * Trains Nos. 36, 37, 38, 40, 42, 29, and 30 always run fast, but didn't run much fast up grade; didn't run much faster than 36 was running the day I got hurt. * * * If Dalton Lovell ever did warn me to get away from the car, that it was going to be struck, after he told me to move it off the track, I didn't hear him."

Dalton Lovell, sworn in behalf of the plaintiff, testified:

"I was section foreman for the Southern Railway on the Baldwin section, and was on the lever car that was struck by the train coming from Baldwin to Cornelia. When I first saw the headlight, the train was about 200 yards from the lever car. When I first saw it I put on the brakes and said, 'Let's get off.' * * * The engineer in charge of the train, if there had not been smoke, could have seen the lever car about 200 yards. It was early in the morning and smoky. * * * The first section of train 36 had already run, but the second section had not run. The second section has not got any schedule that I know of. The first section is the one that is on the time-table. * * * If the second section, which struck us, was late, I didn't know it. There was not any operator at Baldwin to tell how late it was. * * * As to my warning Simmons to leave the lever car before he did leave it, I didn't go around and tell him. I always taught them before, when we could not get a car off, to get away. * * * My back was in the direction the train was coming. I had been looking back that way, expecting the train any time. On these tracks they run the trains fast all the time. They run those passenger trains sometimes behind time, and sometimes on time, but always along there fast. * * * As soon as I hollered * * * Simmons knew it [the train] was coming. He got down off of the lever car with his face towards the train, on the right-hand side of the track coming towards Cornelia. He was on the engineer's side. * * * It was a dark and foggy morning, about daylight. I don't know whether it was hardly good daylight. It was winter time. The headlight was burning. It had to be burning on account of it being dark. Standing there where I was, I don't know how far I could have seen a man on the track ahead of me. I could have seen one 50 feet across there that time of day, a dark and smoky and foggy morning. * * * Fifty feet is my estimate. * * * Looking back in the direction the train was coming from, there is a cut and a curve. There was not anything to keep Simmons from seeing the train after he turned around. He said he did see the train. When I first put him to work I told him that he would have to look out for trains all the time, look for himself. * * * On a clear day in good daylight, the engineer could have seen the lever car about 200 yards. * * * On this particular morning the engineer could not have seen more than 50 feet, I guess, about 50 feet, because it was cloudy and smoky, and not broad daylight. * * * There was not any depot agent at Baldwin the morning we left there when Mr. Simmons got hurt, not at that hour. The Baldwin depot was supposed to open at 8 o'clock. * * * Most of the time we left Baldwin before the depot was opened."

B. T. Holland, sworn in behalf of the defendant, testified:

"I am an engineer on the Southern Railroad. I was the engineer on the train that struck the lever car when Mr. Simmons was hurt. I came around the curve that morning. I don't know exactly what time, about daylight. It was pretty foggy, and the first thing I knew I was right into the lever car. As I came around through the cut I was looking out. It was about daylight, very foggy. The headlight was burning. When I first discovered the lever car, I put on the air brakes as hard as it would go on in the emergency. When I first discovered the lever car I don't think it was over 15 or 20 feet from me, maybe a little more. I discovered it as soon as I could. Just as soon as the conditions would let me, I saw it. I stopped as quick as I could, put the brakes on as hard as they would go on in emergency, and stopped. * * * I had on my headlight. It was burning. It was an electric headlight, the kind in common use on the Southern Railroad. I was something near 25 or 30 feet of the lever car when I first saw it. * * * A man looking out on the tracks with a headlight of the kind generally in use on the Southern Railroad could not see a car and four men over 30 or 40 feet, there was such a fog. * * * That headlight throws a light in front of an engine a considerable distance, owing to the condition of the weather. If there is nothing there to obscure the light, you can see a mile. * * * In the condition of the fog that morning, you could not see over 40 or 50 feet. I was in 40 or 50 feet of this hand car when I first saw it. * * * The train was running 35 or 40 miles an hour."

The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled, and the movant excepted.

Edgar A. Neely, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

J. J. & Sam Kimzey, of Cornella, for defendant in error.

JENKINS, J. (after stating the facts as above). Since this action was brought under the federal "Employers' Liability Act," the provisions of that act are controlling, and the case must be decided in accordance therewith. As was held in Charleston, etc., Ry. Co. v. Sylvester, 17 Ga. App. 85, 86 S. E. 275:

"In a suit brought under the federal Employers' Liability Act, except * * * as to violations of federal statutes for the protection of employes, assumption of risk is an absolute defense, while contributory negligence merely reduces the damages. Roberts, Injuries to Interstate Employes, § 130; Seaboard Air Line Ry. v. Horton, 233 U. S. 492, 34 Sup. Ct. 635, 58 L. Ed. 1062, L. R. A. 1915C, 1, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 475."

In such a case there is no presumption of negligence against the defendant, and it is well settled that, under the provisions of this act, the plaintiff not only assumed whatever risks were normally incident to his employment, but also those defects and risks which were known to him, or which were plainly observable, although due to the master's negligence. See Charleston, etc., Ry. Co. v. Sylvester, supra, and cases cited. It will be borne in mind that in cases of this sort, no matter what acts of negligence on the part of the defendant may be shown by the evidence, the plaintiff must recover, if at all, upon proof of one or more of the specific acts of negligence alleged in the petition, and that there can be no recovery unless one or more of these acts is established by proof. See Jarrell v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co., 99 S. E. 386 (1b), and cases there cited. In the case of Southern Railway Co. v. Blackwell, 20 Ga. App. 630, 93 S. E. 321, which was a case very similar to the one now under review, this court held that—

"One of the risks assumed by the plaintiff in this case (who was employed as a track hand), upon entering the service of the railway company, was the danger ordinarily incident to the usual and proper operation of its trains over the track upon which he was at work. This proposition is the fundamental principle underlying the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of L. & N. Railroad Co. v. Kemp, 140 Ga. 657, 79 S. E. 558."

In the Kemp Case, the plaintiff was foreman in charge of a force of section hands, and his duties required him to inspect and maintain the tracks and roadway of the defendant upon his section. While engaged in the inspection of the tracks he was confronted with an emergency occasioned by the sudden appearance of a freight train, operated in the usual method, which rounded a curve, and in attempting to remove from the track the hand car on which he was riding, and avoid the impending danger to himself and his hand car, he was injured. The Supreme Court expressly ruled in that case that under this state of facts the plaintiff could not recover. It was further held in the Blackwell Case that—

"To justify a recovery for injury caused by a train striking a section hand while engaged in repairing a track, it must be shown that the proximate cause of his injury was the railway company's neglect of some duty to him in respect to his protection from injury by passing trains"—citing Norfolk, etc., Ry. Co. v. Gesswine, 144 Fed. 56, 75 C. C. A. 214, Aerkfetz v. Humphreys, 145 U. S. 418, 12 Sup. Ct. 835, 36 L. Ed. 758, Ellis' Adm'r v. Louisville, etc., Ry. Co., 155 Ky. 745, 160 S. W. 512, and Morris v. Boston & Maine Rd., 184 Mass. 368, 68 N. E. 680, and quoting from the case of Woods v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co. (Mo.) 187 S. W. 11, as follows: "It is not the duty of a railroad company to notify section men that any certain trains are expected to pass over the road, but it is their duty to be on the lookout and keep out of the way."

In the case of Connelley v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 201 Fed. 54, 56, 119 C. C. A. 392, 394 (47 L. R. A. [N. S.] 867), the Circuit Court of Appeals said:

"It is an obvious fact that many occupations, as, for example, a powder mill operator, a structural iron worker, a diver, a blaster, a track-walker, necessarily subject those who follow them to great dangers. When, therefore, a man contracts for such employment, he knows and takes on himself the risks and dangers incident to such dangerous work. His assumption of those obvious and unavoidable risks is in the very nature of things part of his employment. It follows, therefore, that the employer violates no legal duty to the employé in failing to protect him from dangers which cannot be escaped by any one doing such work. * * * It is obvious that even where a railroad operates its trains, and moves its switch drafts in a proper and careful manner, trackwalkers and repairmen are necessarily subjected to great risks. Their very occupation is one of constant peril. Indeed, it follows from the nature of such employment that the duty of self-preservation has to rest on them, for no adequate protection, other than self-protection, can be afforded them. And such has been the reasonable holding of the law. * * * Indeed, in thus making self-protection the substantial safeguard of trackwalkers and section men, the law is reasonable and just, for no other dependable safeguard can be afforded their perilous work in the practical operation of railroads."

And in the case of Hinz v. Chicago, B. & N. R. Co., 93 Wis. 16, 66 N. W. 718, the Supreme Court of Wisconsin held:

"A section hand, whose duties required him to ride over the road on a hand car, and who had been notified by the company, and of his own knowledge knew, that wild trains were frequently run over the road at a high rate of speed, assumed the risk of injury from being run into by one of these trains, running at a high rate of speed, on a foggy morning."

[1, 2] Applying this principle of law to the facts adduced upon the trial of this case, we are compelled to set aside the verdict in favor of the plaintiff. As has already been stated, there is no presumption of negligence against the defendant in this case. It will be seen from the plaintiff's own testimony and that of the witnesses sworn in his behalf, as well as from the uncontradicted evidence in behalf of the defendant, the employés of the defendant in charge of its locomotive and cars which injured the plaintiff used all ordinary care and diligence to avoid the injury. The plaintiff, besides knowing that he might expect a train along this track at any time, was in point of fact specifically warned of, and saw the approach of, the train which caused his injuries in ample time to have avoided the injury by the exercise of the slightest degree of care upon his part. There is no evidence to show that the engineer in charge of the defendant's train could, in the exercise of the degree of care required by law, have known of the presence of the plaintiff on the track. According to the testimony of the plaintiff himself, it was not good daylight at the time he was injured, and while he testified, "I don't think it was misty, I wouldn't say," the positive testimony of the foreman in charge of the section crew, who was sworn in behalf of the plaintiff, and the engineer in charge of the train which caused the injury, sworn in behalf of the defendant, was to the effect that it was cloudy, misty, foggy, and smoky, and that the engineer couldn't have seen the car and the plaintiff a distance of more than 50 feet. The cloudy, misty, foggy, and smoky condition existing at the time the injury occurred prevented the engineer from seeing the plaintiff in time to avoid the accident. When the engine came out of the cut and around the curve onto the straight stretch, it was running at the usual rate of speed of about 35 or 40 miles per hour, but, due to its close proximity to the hand car at the time its presence was discovered, it was impossible to stop the train in time to prevent striking the hand car, although the brakes were applied and the engineer did everything in his power, when the emergency arose, to avoid injuring the plaintiff. It follows, from what has been said, that the plaintiff was guilty of no negligence in the operation of its train.

[3] It is insisted, however, that the defendant's foreman was negligent "in ordering plaintiff to remove the lever car from the track, as the train was so close to it," and that the plaintiff was injured while in the line of his duty, under the orders and in the immediate presence of the "boss" to whose orders he was subject. While it is true that a servant is bound to obey a command, when given as such, by one occupying the relation of vice principal to the master, if it pertains to the duties of the servant's employment, and does not involve a violation of the law, and if the act required is not one which is of itself so obviously dangerous that no person of ordinary prudence could be expected to perform it; still even the direct and immediate order of the master will not justify a servant in rashly exposing himself to a known and obvious danger; and if, in compliance with the command in such cases, the servant be injured, he cannot recover of the master therefor. Whiters v. Mallory S. S. Co., 23 Ga. App. 47, 97 S. E. 453; International Cotton Mills v. Webb, 22 Ga. App. 309, 96 S. E. 16. Thus granting, for the sake of the argument, that the foreman was negligent in ordering the plaintiff to remove the lever car at the time and place that he did, the order was negligent only by reason of the close proximity of the approaching train, and this fact was, according to the plaintiff's own testimony, known to and plainly observable by him. In the case of Charleston, etc., Ry. Co. v. Sylvestre, supra, this court held that under the federal Employers' Liability Act the employe, not only assumes the ordinary risks and hazards of his occupation, but also those defects and risks which are known to him, or which are plainly observable, although due to the master's negligence. And in Gila Valley Ry. Co. v. Hall, 232 U. S. 94, 34 Sup. Ct. 229, 58 L. Ed. 521, the United States Supreme Court held that an employé "is not to be treated as assuming the risks arising from a defect that is attributable to the employer's negligence, until the employé becomes aware of such defect, or unless it is so plainly observable that he may be presumed to have known of it. [Italics ours.] In order to charge an employé with the assumption of risk attributable to a defect due to the employer's negligence it must appear, not only that he knew (or is presumed to have known) of the defect, * * * but that he knew it endangered his safety; or else such danger must have been so obvious that an ordinarily prudent person under the circumstances would have appreciated it." See, also, Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. Ry. Co. v. Thompson, 236 Fed. 1, 149 C. O. A. 211. Thus it is impossible to hold, under the facts as disclosed by the record in this case, that the plaintiff did not know and appreciate the obvious danger incident to remaining upon the track in the face of an on-coming locomotive, whose gleaming headlight was staring him in the face. We are compelled to say that he assumed the risk which occasioned his injury.

While constrained to hold as we do, we at the same time feel that the purpose and conduct of the plaintiff in continuing his desperate attempt to remove the hand car from the track, in order to prevent a collision such as might imperil many passengers and others, was both fearless and highly commendable; but the law, unfortunately for the plaintiff, places upon him, and not upon the company, the risk incident to his courageous act.

Judgment reversed.

WHITE v. STATE. (No. 10488.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
July 22, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

CRIMINAL LAW §823(1)—HOMICIDE §101 —STATUTES—INSTRUCTIONS—NEW TRIAL—CURE OF ERROR.

"The law embraced in section 73 of the Penal Code of 1910 does not qualify or limit the law of justifiable homicide as laid down in sections 70 and 71 of that Code. The section first mentioned applies exclusively to cases of self-defense from danger to life arising during the progress of a fight wherein both parties had been at fault. The other two sections are applicable when the homicide is committed in good faith to prevent the perpetration of any of the offenses mentioned in section 70, or under the fears of a reasonable man that such an offense will be perpetrated, unless the person who is actually or apparently about to commit it be slain. Instructions as to these two separate branches of the law of justifiable homicide should not be so given as to confuse the one with the other."

(a) "Where an erroneous rule of law is given to the jury on a material issue in the case, and is of such a nature as is calculated to mislead them, a new trial will be granted, notwithstanding the correct rule may have been announced in other portions of the charge."

Broyles, P. J., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Butts County;
W. E. H. Searcy, Jr., Judge.

Charlie White was convicted of voluntary manslaughter, a new trial was denied, and he brings error. Reversed.

H. M. Fletcher, of Jackson, for plaintiff in error.

E. M. Owen, Sol. Gen., of Zebulon, and
W. E. Watkins, of Jackson, for the State.

BLOODWORTH, J. Charlie White was indicted for murder and convicted of voluntary manslaughter, and, complaining of the overruling of the motion for new trial, has brought his case to this court for review.

The trial judge charged the jury in part as follows:

"Justifiable homicide, so far as the definition is applicable to this case, is the killing of a human being in self-defense or defense of habitation or property, against one who manifestly intends or endeavors by violence or surprise to commit a felony on either. If a person kill another in his defense, it must appear that the danger was so urgent and pressing, at the time of the killing, that, in order to save his own life, the killing of the other was absolutely necessary; and it must appear, also, that the person killed was the assailant, or that the slayer had really and in good faith endeavored to decline any further struggle before the mortal blow was given. I charge you that the expression 'felony,' as used here, means an offense for which the offender, if convicted, would be liable to be punished by death or imprisonment in penitentiary. The law provides that justifiable homicide is the killing of a human being in self-defense, or in defense of habitation, property, or person, against one who manifestly intends or endeavors by violence or surprise to commit a felony on either. The bare fear of any of these offenses, to prevent which the homicide is alleged to have been committed, shall not be sufficient to justify the killing. It must appear that the circumstances at the time were sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable man, and that the party killing really acted under the influence of these fears, and not in a spirit of revenge."

The first ground of the amendment to the motion for new trial complains that this charge is error for the reason hereinafter stated. In a note to this ground the trial judge says that section 73 of the Penal Code was given in charge at the request of counsel for the defendant. This being true, the defendant could not complain that section 73 was given in charge; but he can complain that it was given in such connection as to confuse "the defense of justifiable homicide under the fears of a reasonable man, based upon the provisions of the two related sections 70 and 71 of the Criminal Code, with the defense of absolute necessity to kill in order to save one's life, which is contained in section 73 of said Code," and this is the reason assigned why the charge is erroneous.

Under repeated rulings of our Supreme Court, we think this point is well taken, even though in our opinion the facts demanded that section 73 be given in charge to the jury. The first headnote of the decision in Pugh v. State, 114 Ga. 16, 39 S. E. 875, is as follows:

"The law embraced in section 73 of the Penal Code does not qualify or limit the law of justifiable homicide as contained in sections 70 and 71. While the law embodied in sections 70 and 71, as well as that embodied in section 73, may both be properly given in the same case, the provisions of the different sections should not be charged in such a way as to leave the impression upon the jury that they are both applicable to the same state of facts."

In Franklin v. State, 146 Ga. 42, 90 S. E. 481, Mr. Justice Beck said:

"It was proper in this case to give sections 70, 71, and 73 of the Penal Code in charge to the jury, but section 73 should not have been charged in such a way as to make it likely that the provisions of that section would be confused in the minds of the jury with the provisions of sections 70 and 71. It is true that the judge told the jury that the provisions of section 73 were to be kept distinct from the provisions of sections 70 and 71; but that is not sufficient. How could a layman be expected to keep the provisions of section 73 and of the other sections referred to distinct, without instructions as to the case in which the principles of section 73 are applicable? In the case of Pryer v. State, 128 Ga. 28, 57 S. E. 93, it is said: 'We would suggest that it would avoid much confusion if, where it is proper to give in charge section 73 of the Penal Code, the presiding judge would give the jury some instruction as to cases in which it is applicable, instead of * * * charging it immediately after sections 70 and 71, without any explanation.' Section 73 is applicable only in the cases of mutual combat, as has been repeatedly ruled, and the jury ought to be so informed in appropriate instructions, or at least, the jury should be told in what cases the provisions of section 73 are applicable. Otherwise the inevitable tendency is to confuse that section with the provisions of sections 70 and 71, where all three of the sections are given. Warrick v. State, 125 Ga. 133, 141, 53 S. E. 1027."

In Ragland v. State, 111 Ga. 216, 36 S. E. 684, Mr. Justice Little said:

"It is justifiable homicide, under our law, for one to kill another who is manifestly intending or endeavoring by violence or surprise to commit a felony on his person, and this is true without regard to the grade of felony; and it is not a correct proposition of law that, when one kills another to prevent the commission of a felony on his person, the danger must be so urgent and pressing at the time of the killing that, in order to save his own life, the killing of the other was necessary. On the contrary, it is only necessary to be shown that the circumstances were sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable man that such felony was about to be committed upon him, in order to justify the homicide. Otherwise, a woman who killed a man to prevent the rape of her person, or one who slew a burglar to prevent the burglary of his home, would not be justifiable. In neither of these cases was the life of the slayer involved, but in each a felony was about to be committed. A person in this state may kill another for other purposes than to save his own life, and be justified, if he do so to prevent any felony from being committed on his habitation, person, or property; his defense is complete when to a jury it appears that the circumstances were sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable man that a felony was about to be committed, and that he killed to prevent its commission. The latter part of the charge as given applies only to cases of homicide where the parties had previously been engaged in mutual combat. Powell v. State, 101 Ga. 9 [29 S. E. 309, 65 Am. St. Rep. 277]; Stubbs v. State, 110 Ga. [916, 36 S. E. 200]. It is doubtless true that the Presiding Judge recognized these distinctions; but, inasmuch as the two principles enunciated in his charge are directly coupled together, without a distinction having been drawn, the jury might have understood, from the charge as set out in the ground of the motion, that, while it was justifiable for one to kill another to prevent the commission of a felony on his person, it must at the same time appear that the danger was so urgent and pressing at the time of the killing that it was necessary for the slayer to take the life of the deceased, in order to save his own life. This is not and has never been the law."

See, also, White v. State, 147 Ga. 378 (5), 383 (5), 94 S. E. 222; Pryer v. State, 128 Ga. 28, 57 S. E. 93; Smith v. State, 119 Ga. 564, 46 S. E. 846 (3); Jordan v. State, 117 Ga. 405, 43 S. E. 747 (2); Powell v. State, 101 Ga. 11 (6), 22 (6, 7), 29 S. E. 309, 65 Am. St. Rep. 277.

From the charge given in the instant case, the jury might have concluded that the provisions of sections 70 and 71 and of section 73 were applicable to the same state of facts. In Nunn v. State, 14 Ga. App. 699, 82 S. E. 58, Judge Roan says:

"It is impossible to tell which portion of the charge the jury applied to the evidence when arriving at its verdict—the law as laid down by section 73, read to them by the court without comment, or the latter part of the charge, whereby the court seemingly recalled the instructions given on this section. For this reason the latter portion of the court's charge, while it is correct law in the abstract, is in direct conflict with the letter of the law embodied in section 73 of the Penal Code, and it does not operate to modify the law as laid down in that section, any more than the law as laid down in that section modifies the latter portion of the charge. It would be well for the trial judges, in giving in charge section 73 of the Penal Code where it is applicable, to instruct the jury, in immediate connection therewith, under what circumstances it is applicable. In this way such confusion can be avoided. See Powell v. State, 101 Ga. 23, 29 S. E. 309, 65 Am. St. Rep. 277; Pugh v. State, supra; Warwick v. State, 125 Ga. 141, 53 S. E. 1027; Pryer v. State, 128 Ga. 28, 57 S. E. 93; Lightsy v. State, 2 Ga. App. 442, 58 S. E. 686; Holland v. State, 3 Ga. App. 465, 60 S. E. 205; McAllister v. State, 7 Ga. App. 541, 67 S. E. 221."

Even though the judge, after giving in charge to the jury erroneous instructions, did give to the jury a correct charge, he did not withdraw the erroneous charge, or state to the jury that it was erroneous.

"Where an erroneous instruction is given on a material issue, the error is not rendered harmless by a subsequent statement of the judge that he has given the correct rule in another part of his charge. He must make it plain and clear to the jury that the first instruction was incorrect and is expressly retracted, and that the subsequent statement is correct and is substituted for the incorrect one; and it must appear, therefore, that the jury could not have been misled or confused by the two inconsistent statements." Pelham Mfg. Co. v. Powell, 6 Ga. App. 309, 64 S. E. 1117 (4).

See Mayor & Council of Madison v. Bearden, 22 Ga. App. 378, 96 S. E. 572, and cases cited; Central of Ga. Ry. Co. v. Deas, 22 Ga. App. 428, 96 S. E. 267.

"The jury must take the whole charge as the law, and it is not for them to select one part to the exclusion of another, nor to decide whether one part cures or qualifies another, without being instructed so to do by the judge." Savannah, Florida & Western Ry. Co. v. Hatcher, 118 Ga. 273, 45 S. E. 239.

Because of this error in the charge, we think a new trial should be ordered. On account of this direction, it is unnecessary to consider other allegations of error.

Judgment reversed.

STEPHENS, J., concurs.

BROYLES, P. J. (dissenting). The reason why it is generally reversible error for the court to charge sections 70, 71, and 73 of the Penal Code together, without proper explanation is that the jury may be misled into thinking that, even though the defendant may have killed the deceased under the fears of a reasonable man that a felony was about to be committed on his person, the killing would not be justifiable unless it appeared to him that the danger was so urgent and pressing at the time of the killing that, in order to save his own life, the killing of the other was absolutely necessary. In the instant case I do not see how the jury could have been so misled; for, after charging the above three Code sections (and all three were applicable), the jury were clearly and correctly instructed, several times, that, if the circumstances were sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable man that a felony was about to be committed on him, the killing would be justifiable and the defendant should be acquitted. Immediately after the excerpt from the charge complained of the court charged as follows:

"The fears of a person should be the fears of a reasonable man—one reasonably courageous, reasonably self-possessed, not those of a coward. If the circumstances were sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable man that a felony was about to be inflicted upon him, then the killing would be presumed to be the result of such fears, and he would be justifiable. If the jury have a reasonable doubt as to whether the circumstances were sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable man, then the killing would be justifiable. The killing is not justifiable because one feels that he has reason to fear that he will be injured, without regard to the character of the injury some person is about to inflict upon him. If the assailant intended or endeavored to commit a misdemeanor or a trespass only upon the person, the killing of such person would be voluntary manslaughter. But if he intended to commit a felonious assault, then the killing would be justifiable. If the circumstances are not such as to excite the fears of a reasonable man that he is in any danger at all, and when he is in no danger he shot and killed another with malice, then such killing would be murder. If the circumstances were sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable man that an injury was about to be inflicted upon him less than a felony, under those circumstances such a killing would be voluntary manslaughter. When the circumstances are sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable man that a felony is about to be inflicted upon him, and under those circumstances he kills another, then the killing would be justifiable. In order to justify the killing on the ground that the accused acted under the fears of a reasonable man that a felony was about to be inflicted upon him, it must appear that there was real or apparent danger sufficient to justify the belief that a felony was about to be inflicted upon him. If the circumstances surrounding the defendant at the time, as they appeared to him at that time, situated as he was, were sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable man that there was real or apparent danger that a felony was about to be inflicted upon him, and he acted under the influence of these fears, and not in a spirit of revenge, and killed another, then such killing would be justifiable."

And the very last part of the charge is as follows:

"If you do not believe he is guilty of either offense [murder or voluntary manslaughter], or have reasonable doubt of it, or if you find he was justified in doing whatever he did do, or that he acted under the fear of a reasonable man that a felony was about to be inflicted upon him, or if you have a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused of either offense named, it would be your duty to acquit him, and the form of your verdict would be: 'We, the jury, find the defendant not guilty.'"

In my opinion, in the light of the entire charge, the excerpt from the charge complained of did not mislead the jury into thinking that, if the accused killed the deceased under the fears of a reasonable man that a felony was about to be committed upon him, the killing would nevertheless not be justifiable, unless it appeared to him that the danger was so urgent and pressing that, in order to save his own life, the killing of the other was absolutely necessary.

I think the judgment should be affirmed.

PLEADING  $\S$ 354(2)—ACTION FOR BROKER'S COMMISSIONS—STRIKING OUT PLEA—SUFFICIENCY.

Plaintiff, a real estate dealer, sued the defendants, landowners, on a plain and unambiguous written contract for commissions for selling a tract of land. Defendants admitted signing the contract, but pleaded that it was procured by fraud, and the sale made by the plaintiff, not under the written contract, but under a previous verbal one. A demurrer to the plea was filed, and the following order passed: "It is ordered and adjudged that said demurrer be, and the same is, sustained in so far as the allegations as to fraud in obtaining the contract sued upon, the same being held insufficient; but as to the allegations touching another or a verbal contract, the same is allowed." In Ware v. Ware & Harper, 20 Ga. App. 202, 92 S. E. 961, the court said: "The defendant admitted the execution of the contract which is the basis of this suit, and filed a plea of fraud in its procurement. The defendant could read and write, and there was no trick, artifice, or fraud practiced upon him which prevented him from reading the contract. The relation between the parties was that of landowner and real estate agent employed for the purpose of negotiating a sale of the land. In respect to the services to be rendered by the real estate agent, a relation of confidence existed between the owner and the agent. In respect to the compensation to be paid to the agent by the owner, the parties dealt at arm's length. There is nothing in the evidence to take this case out of the general rule that parole evidence will not be received to add to, vary, or dispute the plain and unambiguous terms of a written contract." Under this ruling the court erred in not striking the entire plea. This error rendered the further proceedings nugatory. See Sloan v. Farmers' Bank, 20 Ga. App. 123, 125, 126, 127, 92 S. E. 893, and cases cited.

CRIMINAL LAW  $\S$ 1172(2)—APPEAL AND ERROR—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR.

The court did not err in refusing to grant a new trial.

Stephens, J., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Glascock County; B. F. Walker, Judge.

James Neal was convicted of violating the prohibition law, and he brings error. Affirmed.

M. L. Felts, of Warrenton, for plaintiff in error.

R. C. Norman, Sol. Gen., of Washington, Ga., for the State.

BROYLES, P. J. The indictment contained two counts. The first count charged the defendant with the offense of manufacturing alcoholic liquors. The second count charged him with knowingly permitting apparatus for the distilling and manufacturing of intoxicating liquors to be located on his premises. He was convicted on both counts. The court instructed the jury, in substance, that if the evidence showed that such apparatus was found on premises "possessed or controlled" by the defendant, the state made a prima facie case, and that would entitle the state to a verdict in its favor unless the defendant showed that the apparatus was there without his knowledge. This charge was excepted to.

Conceding, but not deciding, that this charge was erroneous, it does not require a new trial, under the facts of the case. The uncontradicted evidence, even eliminating all of the testimony of the witness Charlie Lewis, whom the defendant attempted to impeach, clearly showed that a complete distillery for the manufacture of intoxicating liquors was located on the defendant's premises with his knowledge, and with, at least, his implied consent. This was established by the unimpeached evidence of the sheriff of the county, who testified to incriminatory admissions made to him by the defendant, which admissions, under the particular facts of the case, amounted to a confession of his guilt of the offense charged in the second count. This testimony of the sheriff was not contradicted by any other evidence, nor even by the defendant in his statement to the jury. Under these circumstances a verdict of guilty under the second count of the indictment was demanded, and the alleged error in the charge, if error, was harmless.

There was ample evidence to authorize the defendant's conviction under the first count of the indictment, and no error in the charge as to this count is complained of.

The remaining special grounds of the motion for a new trial are without merit. The court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

BLOODWORTH, J., concurs.

STEPHENS, J. (dissenting). I cannot concur with the majority of the court in the conclusion that the defendant's conviction was demanded. As I understand the evidence, there was an issue of fact for the jury as to whether or not the defendant had knowledge of the existence of a still upon his premises. While his statement is long and argumentative and full of irrelevancies, it can be construed only as a denial of such knowledge. He stated this (in referring to the branch on which the still was found):

"It's a thick branch. I never had my foot in it before until this still was found, and I didn't know anybody else ever did. As I stated about this, I don't know anything about the spring and I have no occasion to visit my branch, and have no occasion to know of a still in there."

He further said:

"I ask, you, gentlemen, to direct your attention to the fact that I have no opportunity to be away from the office; that I have been there with a two-man job since they claim this distilling on my place. I don't know who it was. I never knew it at the time. I only discovered that since."

This clearly and unmistakably amounted to a denial upon the part of the defendant of any knowledge whatsoever as to the existence of a still upon his premises. The jury had a right to believe this statement in preference to the sworn testimony. This certainly made an issue of fact for the jury's determination. Conceding, however, that the defendant may have, in an extrajudicial confession, admitted knowledge of the existence of a still upon his premises, such admission cannot be said to eliminate from the consideration of the jury the issue as to the knowledge of the existence of this still made by the defendant's denial in his statement. Where the defendant neither in his statement nor by testimony, denies an alleged extrajudicial confession, I hardly think it can be said that such undenied confession can be considered by the court as proof of guilt and as eliminating the issue. It is a fundamental doctrine of criminal law that—

"Confessions of guilt should be received with great caution. A confession alone, uncorroborated by other evidence, will not justify a conviction." Penal Code, § 1081.

What degree of corroboration will warrant an inference of guilt is essentially a jury question. Even though there be no issue as to the fact of a confession having been made and as to the fact of corroborative circumstances, the inferences to be drawn from these undisputed facts are peculiarly for the jury. "Confession is the means of proof, and not proof." Wigmore's Principles of Judicial Proof, 538. It cannot be said, as a universal rule, in every case where the facts are undisputed, that certain fixed and invariable inferences must be drawn from these facts. On a trial for murder all of the facts may be undisputed, yet the jury is left free to infer from these undisputed facts either malice or reasonable fears, i. e., murder or justifiable homicide.

Besides, the "incriminatory admissions made to [the sheriff] by the defendant, which admissions," in the language of the majority of the court, "under the particular facts of this case, amounted to a confession of his guilt of the offense charged," are, I respectfully submit, no more than "incriminatory admissions." The sheriff testified:

"I would consider it [the still] located on Mr. Neal's premises, because he told me he knew it was there. He told me that the Sunday we were there. He said he knew who operated it, and he said he would tell me if I would guess. I guessed A. L. Bales, and he said A. L. Bales don't run it. He said he knew all about it. I don't know—I don't remember that he told me how many times he had been down there. The question that come up—the question about the gun came up, and he said it was his gun and he loaned it to a man that was in the business and he was sorry he did, and I asked him if he would tell me who that man was. He told me he knew about it. He said he wasn't having anything to do with it himself. I don't know that he told me that he gave his consent. No, sir; he didn't tell me who operated it. I can't remember that he told me that it was his farm; we talked about the farm and the place."

However damaging to the defendant his statement to the sheriff may have been, it did not amount to a confession of the crime charged. A confession must consist in an admission of all the elements constituting the offense, and not an admission of only a part of the essential elements of the offense.

"Unless the statement of the defendant is broad enough to comprehend every essential element necessary to make out a case against him, it cannot be said to be a confession of guilt. * * * Incriminating statements, to be the equivalent of a confession of guilt, must be so comprehensive as to include every act necessary to be proved by the prosecution in order to establish the defendant's guilt." Owens v. State, 120 Ga. 296, 298, 299, 48 S. E. 21, 22.

"A confession, in criminal law, is a voluntary statement made by the person charged with the commission of a crime or misdemeanor, communicated to another person, wherein he acknowledges himself to be guilty of the offense charged, and disclosing the circumstances of the act and the share and participation he had in it." Black's Law Dictionary.

"A confession is a person's admission or declaration of an agency or participation in a crime, and is restricted to admissions of guilt." 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 439.

The statement of the sheriff tended to establish by way of admission knowledge only of the existence of the still on the part of the defendant. The statement contained no admission of the entire offense charged; the offense being to "knowingly permit or allow" a still upon one's premises. Nothing which the defendant said to the sheriff admitted that the defendant "permitted" or "allowed" a still upon his premises, nor did it admit that defendant possessed or controlled the premises. The evidence of the sheriff therefore established no more than a mere inculpatory admission on the part of the defendant. Such an admission, says the Supreme Court in Covington v. State, 79 Ga. 687, 690, 7 S. E. 153, 155, in the language of Judge Bleckley—

"is not direct or * * * positive evidence of guilt, but it belongs to circumstantial evidence; the admitted facts being circumstances proved by the prisoner's admissions, instead of being proved by some witness who was present when these facts transpired."

The evidence having clearly made an issue as to the defendant's guilt or innocence, and the charge of the court excepted to having necessarily controlled the verdict and being an erroneous statement of the law, the verdict should be set aside and a new trial granted.

The defendant was indicted under two counts. One charged him with distilling and manufacturing prohibited liquors, and the other charged him with knowingly permitting, having, and possessing distilling apparatus on his premises. He was convicted on both counts. Section 22 of the act approved March 28, 1917 (Acts Ex. Sess. 1917, p. 18), making it unlawful for any one "to knowingly permit or allow any one to have or possess or locate on his premises any apparatus for the distilling or manufacturing of the liquors and beverages specified in this article," provides that—

"When any such apparatus is found or discovered upon said premises the same shall be prima facie evidence that the person in actual possession had knowledge of the existence of the same, * * * the burden of proof in all cases being upon the person in actual possession to show the want of knowledge of the existence of such apparatus on his premises." (Italics mine.)

The evidence in this case showed that a distilling apparatus was found upon the premises of the defendant, upon which lived defendant's tenant or cropper; the defendant himself not living upon the premises, but controlling the same as landlord and visiting the same daily. Defendant in his statement, however, stated that the tenant had been on the place two years, and superintended the entire farm just as if it were his (the tenant's). The judge charged the jury as follows:

"The burden is upon the state to show that the apparatus was upon the premises or property possessed or controlled by the defendant, and if the state shows that to your satisfaction, and beyond a reasonable doubt, or that there was apparatus for making these liquors or beverages, as enumerated and set out in the section of the law read to you, on the premises in possession and control of the defendant, then the state has made out a prima facie case under the law, and, stopping there, the state would be entitled under the law to have a verdict in their favor; unless the defendant shows to you that such apparatus was there without his knowledge. The burden to show that he had no knowledge of the existence of such apparatus on his premises is upon him, and not upon the state."

This charge of the court was error, in that it instructed the jury that when such distilling apparatus was found upon premises "possessed or controlled" by the defendant the state had made a prima facie case which would "entitle" it to a verdict in its favor. One who possesses or controls premises is not necessarily the one in actual possession, in the sense in which the term is used in this act. The expression "actual possession" means possession in fact; an actual and immediate occupancy of the premises. In 1 Words & Phrases (2d Series) p. 97, "actual possession" is defined as follows:

"'Actual possession' of land consists in subjecting it to the will and dominion of the owner."

cupant, and must be evidenced by those things which are essential to its beneficial use. * * * 'Actual possession' means possession in fact, effected by actual entry upon the premises and actual occupancy. * * * It is necessary that the possession must be actual, etc. 'Actual' means real, visible. * * * Actual possession is the same as pedis possessio or pedis positio, and these mean a foothold on the land, an actual entry, a possession in fact, a standing upon it, an occupation of it, as a real, demonstrative act done. It is the contrary of a possession in law, which follows in the wake of title."

"Actual possession exists where the thing is in the immediate occupancy of the party. Constructive is that which exists in contemplation of law, without actual personal occupation." Brown v. Volkening, 64 N. Y. 76, 80.

The term "actual possession" as used in a penal statute of Texas, providing that any person leaving the dead carcass or body of any horse, etc., which died in the actual possession of such person, in any public road, or within 50 yards thereof, shall be fined, etc., applies to cases where the animal dies while it is actually being used by the owner; that is, in his manual possession at the time of its death. Ogg v. State, 48 Tex. Cr. R. 231, 87 S. W. 348.

Since the law places the burden of showing absence of knowledge of the existence of a still upon the one in "actual possession" of the premises upon which the still was found, it must necessarily follow that "actual possession," in the sense here used, means such close proximity to the premises as will reasonably lead to the inference that the party in possession had knowledge of the existence of the still. Such knowledge could justly be imputed to one in actual possession, pedis possessio, whereas it could not justly be imputed to one who merely owned the premises and had control thereof, but lived elsewhere. It will be seen, therefore, that where premises are immediately occupied by a tenant or cropper who actually lives thereon, and the owner or landlord, as the defendant in this case, does not live thereon, although such owner or landlord may be in control of the premises as owner, such control of the premises is not the actual possession in the sense of this act. The owner may not live upon the premises, and yet, from the particular circumstances, such as going over the place daily and inspecting it, etc., it may be inferred that he had knowledge of the existence of a distilling apparatus thereon. This inference, would not arise, however, from the fact that he controlled the place, but would arise from all of the facts and circumstances of the particular case going to show knowledge on the part of the defendant. The statute makes it unlawful for the owner of the premises, whether he lives thereon or not, to allow distilling apparatus thereon; but the statute makes actual possession, and not ownership or control, prima facie evidence of knowledge of the existence of the still on the premises. Ownership or control alone are not sufficient, without more, to authorize the inference that the owner knew of the existence of a still on his premises.

Where, in a criminal case, a prima facie case for the state is made, a verdict of guilty is not demanded. A prima facie case merely authorizes the jury to find a verdict of guilty under the evidence. It is therefore error for the court to charge the jury that a prima facie case under this act "entitled" the state to a verdict. The possession of distilling apparatus upon the premises of the defendant does not, as a matter of law, demand the defendant's conviction. Such possession merely authorizes the jury to convict the party in actual possession of the premises. It is not a presumption of law, but is a presumption of fact. See the authorities collected and referred to in Holliday v. State, 23 Ga. App. 400, 98 S. E. 386; State v. Wilkerson, 164 N. C. 431, 79 S. E. 888.

I deem it unnecessary here to touch upon the grounds of the motion for a new trial based upon newly discovered evidence, and upon the manner in which the jury was drawn.

I am of the opinion that the judgment should be reversed.

H. T. ARMINGTON & SONS v. STATE.
(No. 9915.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
July 17, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS — 250 — SALES — 465
— VEHICLES USED IN ILLEGAL TRANSPORTATION — RESERVATION OF TITLE — RECORDATION OF CONTRACT — CONDEMNATION OF VEHICLES — EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY.

In a statutory proceeding to condemn a vehicle illegally employed in the transportation of intoxicating liquors, where the owner of the vehicle had conditionally sold it to the party engaged in the illegal transaction, but under the terms of the contract had reserved title in himself until full payment of the purchase price should be made, the mere fact that the contract had not been recorded would not defeat the seller's claim of title under his reservation. Moreover, in this case, a careful examination of the record fails to disclose sufficient evidence to authorize the judgment rendered by the trial judge, who by agreement heard the case without the intervention of a jury, since the proof failed to show that the automobile was at the time of seizure being used for the purpose and in the manner prohibited by the statute, as alleged in the petition to condemn.

Error from City Court of Macon; Du Pont Guerrey, Judge.

Petition by the State to condemn a vehicle illegally employed in the transportation of intoxicating liquors, wherein H. T. Armington & Sons intervened. Judgment for the State, and interveners bring error. Reversed.

On May 4, 1918, a police officer of the city of Macon seized a certain Buick automobile which contained 150 or 175 pints of whisky. At the time the automobile was seized, it was located near a vacant house, and not upon a public highway. No one was in possession of the automobile, nor had the officer seen any one driving it; but he had noticed its tracks leading from a public highway to the place where it was found. After seizing the automobile the officer reported the fact to the solicitor of the city court of Macon, and on May 7, 1918, proceedings were instituted in the court under the provisions of section 20 of the act of 1917 (Acts Ex. Sess. 1917, p. 16) for the purpose of condemning and forfeiting to the state the automobile so seized. The identity of the owner of the automobile not being known, advertisement was made pursuant to the statute. On May 13, 1918, H. T. Armington & Sons, a business concern of Jacksonville, Fla. (whether a corporation or partnership not being disclosed), interposed an intervention wherein it set up that on January 31, 1918, it had in Duval county, Fla., sold the automobile and delivered possession thereof to one J. B. Bryant, taking from him a conditional sale contract wherein title to the automobile was retained in H. T. Armington & Sons until payment of the full purchase price by Bryant; that there remained unpaid the sum of $568.13; and that any use of the automobile in violation of the law was without the knowledge or consent of the respondent. Upon the trial of the case the officer who made the seizure testified:

"I am a police officer of the city of Macon, and as such have power and authority to make arrests. On the 4th day of May, 1918, I seized the automobile in controversy in this county. I guess there must have been between 150 and 175 pints of whisky in it, contained in pint bottles. Nobody was in possession of the automobile. I do not know who had been in possession of it. The whisky was in the back of the automobile. * * * I have seen a man named J. B. Bryant in possession of this automobile at occasional intervals for the past three or four months. * * * When I seized the automobile it was not on a public highway of this state, but was close to a vacant house. I could see the tracks of the automobile going from the public highway to where the automobile stopped. I did not see the automobile when it was driven there, and do not know how long it had been standing there."

Another witness for the state testified that he had examined the automobile, and that it was worth $1,000.

H. R. Howell, sworn in behalf of the respondent, testified that he was sales manager for H. T. Armington & Sons, and that he was familiar with the transaction in which the automobile was sold by the respondent to Bryant under a title retention contract, upon which contract his name appeared as a witness; that he conducted the sale on January 31, 1918, and that since that time he had had charge of collecting the installments due under the contract, and that the credits entered upon the back thereof represented the payments received by him for the respondent, and that there was a balance due of $568.13 under the contract; that the respondent had no knowledge that any one was using or had used the automobile for violating the prohibition law of the state of Georgia, or for transporting whisky or any intoxicating beverage, contrary to the laws of Georgia, and did not know that the automobile had ever been carried from Duval county, Fla., in violation of the terms of the contract of purchase; that if Bryan or any one else used the automobile for that purpose, or carried it out of Duval county, Fla., it was without the knowledge or consent of the respondent in this case. The respondent then introduced in evidence the title retention contract (which, however, had never been recorded), whereby the respondent retained title to the automobile in controversy until the full purchase price had been paid therefor by Bryan.

The judge of the city court, acting by consent as both court and jury, found in favor of the state, and entered up the following judgment:

"The court having found for the state, it is considered and adjudged that the claim of title [to] one Six Buick automobile, motor No. 162135, by the respondents, Armington & Sons, be and the same is hereby denied and disallowed, and that the state may further proceed as in such cases provided by law."

To the verdict and judgment thus rendered the respondent excepted, upon the grounds that "said verdict and judgment is contrary to law, contrary to evidence, and without any evidence to support it."

Walter De Fore and Jas. C. Estes, both of Macon, for plaintiff in error.

Will Gunn, Sol., of Macon, for defendant in error.

JENKINS, J. (after stating the facts as above). The respondents claimed title to the automobile in controversy under a title retention contract executed in the state of Florida, and which had never been recorded, and set up in their intervention that under the statutes of Florida it was not necessary that such a contract be recorded in order to be valid as against all parties. Such seems to be the law of Florida, for the Supreme Court of that state, in Campbell Co. v. Walker, 22 Fla. 412, 1 South. 59, held as follows:

"1. An agreement in writing to sell personal property, the title to which is reserved by the seller until the purchase money is paid by the buyer, is a conditional sale, and does not vest title in the buyer until the performance of the condition, to wit, the payment of the purchase money, notwithstanding that, at the time of making said agreement, possession of the property is delivered by the seller to the purchaser.

"2. Neither the act of the Legislature of January 30, 1838, nor of January 8, 1853 (McClell. Dig. p. 765, §§ 1, 2), requires such an instrument to be recorded."

"4. An agreement, such as is described in the first headnote, is valid, as against subsequent creditors and bona fide purchasers for valuable consideration, without notice."

This case was cited and followed in American Process Co. v. Florida White Pressed Brick Co., 56 Fla. 116, 47 South. 942 (2), 16 Ann. Cas. 1064. And in Georgia the fact that such a title retention contract has not been recorded will not defeat the claim of title based thereon by a respondent in a proceeding of this sort. See Shrouder v. Sweat, 148 Ga. 378, 96 S. E. 881; Whites v. State, 23 Ga. App. 174, 98 S. E. 171. The trial court, therefore, erred in finding and adjudging that the claim of title of the respondent in this case to the automobile in controversy be "denied and disallowed."

Furthermore, the petition to condemn alleges that the automobile in question was "a vehicle and conveyance used on the public roads and private ways of said state, in said county, and at the time said automobile was seized said automobile was being used in conveying between 150 and 175 pints of whisky, contained in pint bottles; said whisky being liquors and beverages the sale and possession of which is prohibited by law." The portion of section 20 of the act of 1917 material to a consideration of this case is as follows:

"All vehicles and conveyances of every kind and description which are used on any of the public roads or private ways of this state . . . in conveying any liquors or beverages, the sale or possession of which is prohibited by law, shall be seized by any sheriff or other arresting officer, who shall report the same to the solicitor of the county, city or superior court having jurisdiction in the county where the seizure was made, whose duty it shall be within ten days from the time he received said notice to institute condemnation proceedings in said court by petition, a copy of which shall be served upon the owner or lessee if known, and if the owner or lessee is unknown, notice of such proceedings shall be published once a week for two weeks in the newspaper in which the sheriff's advertisements are published. If no defense is filed within 30 days from the filing of the petition, judgment by default shall be entered by the court at chambers, otherwise the case shall proceed as other civil cases in said court. Should it appear upon the trial of the case that said vehicle, conveyance, boat or vessel was so used with the knowledge of the owner or lessee, the same shall be sold by order of the court after such advertisement as the court may direct."

In our opinion it is altogether possible that the vehicle had been, and even more probably would soon have been, used in an illegal manner upon the highways of this state; but the statute, being summary in its nature, must be strictly construed (Phillips v. Stapleton, 23 Ga. App. 303, 97 S. E. 885), and after a careful examination of the evidence we are of the opinion that the evidence as we find it is legally insufficient to authorize the judgment rendered, and that it failed to show that the automobile had been or was being used upon the highways for the purpose and in the manner prohibited by the statute. The sum total of the evidence of the officer who made the seizure is to the effect that the automobile, when found, was not upon a public highway or a private way, but near a vacant house, and that he had not seen when or by whom it had been placed there, but that when thus found it contained between 150 and 175 pints of whisky. Thus it was not shown that the automobile was "used" on any of the "public roads or private ways" of this state "in conveying" any of the prohibited liquors. While the officer did testify that he saw where the tracks of the automobile led from a public highway to the place where it was found near a vacant house, it is not shown that while on the public highway it contained the whisky found therein. It is just as reasonable to presume that it did not, and that it was brought there for the purpose of receiving the whisky at that point, to be later conveyed to some other point. If so, the seizure was premature. The verdict and judgment, being thus without evidence to support it, is therefore contrary to law.

Judgment reversed.

SCOGGINS v. STATE (two cases).
(Nos. 10517, 10518.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
July 17, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)CRIMINAL LAW — 977(3)—SENTENCE — IMPOSITION OF SENTENCE AT SUBSEQUENT TERM.

At the January Term, 1918, of the superior court of Floyd County, M. E. Scoggins was convicted of voluntary manslaughter. A motion for new trial was overruled, and on February 1, 1919, the judgment was affirmed by this court. See Scoggins v. State, 23 Ga. App. 366, 98 S. E. 240. No sentence was pronounced against the defendant during the term at which he was convicted. On April 14, 1919, during a regular term of the court, the judge had the defendant brought before him, and when the defendant was asked if he had anything to say why sentence should not be passed upon him, he filed objections, the substance of which is that, the term of the court at which a verdict was rendered having expired, the court had "no right, power, or jurisdiction to pronounce or enter any sentence or judgment against this defendant." The court overruled the objections and sentenced the defendant to a term of years in the penitentiary, "to which ruling, refusing to consider said objections, and to which sentence, the defendant then and there excepted." In a separate bill of exceptions the defendant assigned error on the overruling of a motion in arrest of judgment, based on the same ground.

A case involving the same question as is here raised is that of Darsey v. State. In that case the accused was convicted of voluntary manslaughter in January, 1911, but no sentence was then imposed. The case was carried to the Supreme Court of this state (see 136 Ga. 501, 71 S. E. 661, where many of the facts are set out), then to the Supreme Court of the United States (231 U. S. 741, 34 Sup. Ct. 318, 58 L. Ed. 462). The rulings of both of these courts were adverse to the defendant. Finally, in February, 1915, sentence was for the first time imposed, and the same point was then and there urged against the judge imposing sentence as is insisted upon in the instant case. The case then came to this court, and this court held that "that portion of the plea of former jeopardy which set up that a previous verdict of involuntary manslaughter was a good and legal verdict, and that it still stands against the defendant, having been sustained by the court, it was not error for the court to order that the former verdict be established by the solicitor general, and to sentence the defendant under this verdict," and that "the accused will not be heard to complain of the long delay in this case (three or four years) from the rendition of the first verdict to the sentence of the court, where the principal cause of the delay was the appealing of this case by the defendant to the Supreme Court of this state and to the Supreme Court of the United States." Darsey v. State, 17 Ga. App. 280, 86 S. E. 781 (2, 3). Here is a definite and distinct ruling that it was not error for the court to sentence the defendant under the verdict, although more than four years had elapsed between the date of the verdict and the time of imposing sentence. (The record in the Darsey Case shows, further, that one judge presided at the time of the verdict and a different judge imposed the sentence.)

Under the foregoing rulings, there is no merit in the exceptions now under consideration, and on each bill of exceptions the judgment must be affirmed.

July 22, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. CRIMINAL LAW — 589(5)—JURY — 116—CONTINUANCE — GROUNDS — DISQUALIFICATION OF JURORS—JURY CHALLENGE.

In the motion for a new trial it is alleged that the court erred in refusing to continue the case and to furnish the defendant's counsel "with a list of 24 jurors that had not tried Mrs. Campbell" (his wife); that on the day before the day of his trial she was tried in two cases for cruelty to children at a certain orphan's home, and he was charged with assault and battery on an inmate of the said home; that "there were only 36 jurors impaneled at that time in Cobb superior court; that 24 of these jurors had tried a case against defendant's wife, 12 in one case and 12 in another; and that this did not leave 24 jurors for defendant to strike an impartial jury from." Held:

(a) Granting that some of the jurors in attendance on the court were disqualified to try the accused, this would not be a good ground for a continuance of the case. Humphries v. State, 100 Ga. 260, 28 S. E. 25 (2); Sutton v. State, 18 Ga. App. 28, 88 S. E. 744.

(b) If the objection urged against the jurors was cause for challenge at all, it should have been made to the polls. Schnell v. State, 92 Ga. 459, 17 S. E. 966; Bryan v. State, 124 Ga. 79, 80, 52 S. E. 298, and cases cited; Coleman v. State, 141 Ga. 731 (1), 732 (1), 82 S. E. 228, and cases cited; Throckmorton v. State, 23 Ga. App. 112, 97 S. E. 664. The judge complied with the request of counsel for the accused and allowed the jurors to be examined on their voire dire.

2. CRIMINAL LAW — 929 — NEW TRIAL — GROUNDS—MISCONDUCT OF BAILIFF—CUSTODY OF JUROR.

It is assigned as error that "while the jury was considering this case one of the bailiffs told a juror, while they were at breakfast, 'that they had tried C. C. Campbell [the defendant] while this jury was out, in another case, and had turned him a loose.'" It is insisted that "this communication was unlawful and illegal, and prejudicial to the rights of defendant." The oath which the law of this state prescribes for bailiffs who have charge of juries during the trial of cases provides that they shall make no communication to the jury except by leave of the court. Had the bailiff in this case not overlooked his oath, he would not have communicated to the jury the fact that the accused had been acquitted in the other case. However, we cannot see how this conduct of the bailiff could have resulted in any ill effects to the accused. We cannot conceive that a jury of 12 upright and intelligent men would violate their oaths, and be led into the error of rendering a verdict contrary to the facts, simply because a jury in another case against the same defendant had acquitted him. Suppose the verdict first rendered had been returned before the jury in the second case had been stricken, could it be said that the jurors in the courtroom were disqualified simply because they knew that the accused had been acquitted in the first case tried? Surely not. We do not think the trial judge abused his discretion in overruling this ground of the motion for a new trial.

3. CRIMINAL LAW — 913(4) — NEW TRIAL — GROUNDS—EXCESSIVE SENTENCE.

It is insisted that a new trial should be granted because "the sentence in this case of 12 months in the state farm is excessive." "An assignment of error, in a motion for new trial, that a sentence within the limits fixed by law, is excessive, and too harsh under the facts and circumstances of the case, presents no reason for interference by the * * * court." McCollough v. State, 11 Ga. App. 612(6), 76 S. E. 393. See, also, Truitt v. State, 124 Ga. 657, 52 S. E. 890. Weldon v. State, 21 Ga. App. 332, 94 S. E. 327 (9); McLeod v. State, 22 Ga. App. 241, 95 S. E. 934 (4).

4. CRIMINAL LAW — 1158(1) — REVIEW — QUESTIONS OF FACT.

There is some evidence to support the verdict. "This court, by the constitutional amendment creating it, is limited in jurisdiction to the correction of errors of law alone, and therefore has no power to grant a new trial on the ground that the verdict is strongly contrary to the weight of the evidence, if there is any evidence at all to support it." Edge v. Thomas, 9 Ga. App. 559, 71 S. E. 875; Toole v. Jones, 19 Ga. App. 24, 90 S. E. 732; Cook v. McMurry, 19 Ga. App. 491, 91 S. E. 785.

BAIL — 79(1) — FORFEITURE — ESCAPE — CONVICTION OF OTHER OFFENSE.

Under the principle underlying the ruling in Cooper v. Brown, 10 Ga. App. 730, 73 S. E. 1101, where a defendant has been convicted of a criminal offense, and has filed a bill of exceptions and given bond for his appearance to abide the final judgment in the case, and pending the hearing of the writ of error he is convicted of another criminal offense and sentenced to the chain gang, from which he escapes, the bond given in the first case becomes functus officio, and the obligation of the sureties is annulled. It follows that the defendant is a fugitive from justice, not only in the latter case, but in the first one, and the bill of exceptions will be dismissed, unless the defendant gives himself up to the officers of the law within 30 days from the time the case was submitted to this court. *Madden v. (7), 257(8)—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO KILL
—EVIDENCE—PROOF OF DEADLY CHARACTER

COURT.

The plaintiff in error was convicted of assault with intent to murder. In the brief filed by his attorney it is insisted that the evidence does not show that the knife used was a weapon likely to produce death, and that the evidence also fails to show malice or intent to kill, and therefore the judgment is without evidence to support it, and should be set aside. The motion for a new trial contains the general grounds only. It is true that, "when it is charged in the indictment that the assault was made with a weapon likely to produce death, the character of the weapon enters into a description of the offense, and must be proved like any other essential feature" (Paschal v. State, 125 Ga. 280, 54 S. E. 172), yet in the decision from which the statement quoted above is taken it is said: "Under the indictment it was necessary to prove that the knife with which the assault was made was a weapon likely to produce death. This allegation might have been established by direct proof as to the character of the weapon, by an exhibition of it to the jury, or by evidence as to the nature of the wound, or other evidence such as would warrant the jury in finding that the instrument was one calculated to produce death." (Italics ours.) Mathews v. State, 104 Ga. 499, 30 S. E. 727; Paschal v. State, 68 Ga. 818. In Mathews v. State, supra, the Supreme Court said: "In order to convict the accused, under the indictment, it was necessary to prove that the instrument with which the assault was made was a 'weapon likely to produce death.' This may be shown by direct or circumstantial evidence, but must be proved." The person assaulted swore on the trial of this case: "I saw Tom Hardy on or about the 29th of July, 1917, at the depot in Pendergrass. He was messing with my wife, and I said, 'Tommie, you quit messing with my wife;' and he jumped up and cut me with a pocket knife and run off. He cut me awful bad. I will let you see for yourselves. (Exhibits neck.) Like to have killed me. I laid in eight months not able to do nothing. * * * After he cut me I could not hold my head straight to save my life. If I had held my head straight I would have bled to death before the doctor got there."

In Nelson v. State, 4 Ga. App. 223, 60 S. E. 1072, the first and second headnotes are as follows: "The lethal character of the weapon used in making an assault may be inferred from the effect and nature of the wound inflicted." "The intent to kill may be shown by the use of a deadly weapon in a manner likely to produce death." Applying these principles to the evidence in this case, including an inspection of the wound by the jury, we think there was proof enough to "justify an inference by the jury that the knife used was in truth a deadly weapon," and to show that it was used in a "manner likely to produce death," and that this, in connection with the other evidence in the case, was sufficient to authorize the jury to infer malice and intent to kill. "There being evidence tending to show the guilt of the accused, the jury having believed it, as shown by their finding him guilty, and the trial judge being satisfied therewith, this court cannot say that he abused the discretion vested in him by law to grant or refuse new trials." Allen v. State, 91 Ga. 189, 16 S. E. 980.

NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS—NEWLY DISCOVERED
EVIDENCE—MOTION—SUFFICIENCY—
IMPEACHING EVIDENCE.

The only ground of the motion for a new trial that is insisted upon in the brief of plaintiff in error relates to alleged newly discovered evidence. The record shows that this alleged newly discovered evidence is that of witnesses who testified against plaintiff in error in the investigation before a United States commissioner in the presence of the plaintiff in error, and therefore can in no sense be "newly discovered evidence." The mere fact that the defendant "did not know of its relevancy and importance" will not avail him. Fleming v. State, 21 Ga. App. 188, 93 S. E. 1012(1); Adams v. State, 22 Ga. App. 252, 95 S. E. 877 (3); Rachels v. State, 22 Ga. App. 649, 96 S. E. 1045(1). In his affidavit attached to the motion for a new trial it is not stated that he "did not know of the existence of such evidence before the trial, and that the same could not have been discovered by the exercise of ordinary diligence." Civ. Code 1910, § 6086. Hence this ground of the motion should not be considered by this court. Moreover, this alleged newly discovered evidence is merely impeaching in its nature and "it is a sound and well-settled rule that a new trial will not be granted on the ground of newly discovered testimony, if the only object of the evidence be to impeach the character or credit of a witness. Where one has been convicted of a crime, on false testimony, and witnesses have subsequently been discovered, who can prove that testimony false, it is better that redress should be sought in executive clemency than that the court by granting a new trial should violate a general rule essential to the pure and certain administration of justice." *Levinig v. 1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨78, 87—DIVERSION OR DIMINUTION OF WATER—RIGHTS OF LOWER OWNER—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

The right which a riparian owner of land adjacent to a nonnavigable stream has to a reasonable use and consumption of its water does not include the right to use, divert, or diminish the supply so as materially and unreasonably to interfere with the rights and uses of a lower owner. Primarily, each has the same and a common right to the natural and undisturbed flow of the stream, subject only to such detention or diminution as may be occasioned by a reasonable use by others. Whether in a given instance such use shall be taken as reasonable or unreasonable is a question to be determined by the jury upon the particular facts of the case, including, among other things, the size and character of the stream, and the uses to which it is subservient. White v. East Lake Land Co., 96 Ga. 415, 23 S. E. 393, 51 Am. St. Rep. 141.

2. DIVERSION OF WATERS.

The petition, as amended, seeking specified damages because of the alleged unreasonable diversion of water on the part of the defendant, whereby the earnings of the plaintiff's mill property were diminished, set forth a cause of action. The exceptions taken to the overruling of the special grounds of demurrer are without merit. The charge of the court is without material error. It cannot be said that the amount of the verdict, though in our opinion liberal, is altogether without evidence to support it.

This was a suit to recover the value of an alleged shortage in a carload shipment of rags; the shortage being the difference in the alleged weight of the rags at the time of their delivery to the defendant carrier and the weight of the rags when delivered to the consignee. In this case there was no presumption against the railroad company, but the plaintiff had the burden of affirmatively proving his case. "The relation of landlord and tenant, either by express contract or by legal implication, is an essential basis of a distress warrant." Hearn v. Huff, 6 Ga. App. 56, 64 S. E. 298. Where, therefore, a counter affidavit denies in terms of the statute that the sum distrained for is due, and specially denies that the relation of landlord and tenant exists, it sets up a sufficient defense to the proceeding by distress warrant. But where, as in this case, the distress warrant is returnable to a court without jurisdiction to grant affirmative equitable relief, and, by way of denying the relation of landlord and tenant, the counter affidavit further sets up the full terms of the alleged contract of purchase, and the defendants specially pray "that the court will enforce their said contract of purchase against the said plaintiff in distress warrant, and that a verdict of the jury and a decree of the court may be framed in the premises, providing for and requiring said plaintiff in said distress warrant to stand to, abide by, and carry out the said contract of sale of the aforesaid described tract of land to these defendants in distress warrant," it is error to overrule a timely motion by the plaintiff to strike this prayer, on the ground that it seeks relief beyond the jurisdiction of the trial court to grant. *Butler v. J. S. Ridgill, of Tifton, and E. K. Wilcox, of Valdosta, for defendant in error.

LUKE, J. In the plaintiff's petition it is alleged that the defendant is a member of

"Gardner Lumber Company," a firm composed of the defendant and Robinson. It is conceded that the note sued was executed in the name of "Gardner Lumber Company, by Robinson," for the purchase of certain shares of stock in a corporation, and the stock certificate was attached to the note as collateral security. It is further conceded that the note sued on was a Florida contract, and the issues raised by the pleadings were to be tried according to the law of Florida. The evidence was undisputed that the giving of the note was without the knowledge or consent of the defendant, and not necessary to the conduct of the business of the partnership, "Gardner Lumber Company," which was engaged in the saw mill business at Gardner, Fla. The contract of partnership was in evidence, and by none of its terms was authority given to the partner Robinson to execute the note of the partnership or to create debts other than were necessary to the conduct of the business. Necessarily the partner Robinson must have been acting within the scope of the partnership, or the other partner, the defendant here, must have known of the transaction or by some act ratified the execution of the note, in order for the plaintiff to recover against him. In Lanier v. McCabe, 2 Fla. 32, 48 Am. Rep. 173, the Supreme Court held:

"Where several persons formed an association, for the purpose of establishing and putting in operation a steam sawmill, one of the parties cannot issue notes in the name of the company, which shall bind the other members of the company, except the authority be given by the articles of their association or otherwise. The partnership must be in a trade or concern to which the issuing or transfer of bills is necessary or usual, otherwise a copartner will not be liable for the act of his partner, unless he give express authority."

While ordinarily every partner is a general and authorized agent of the firm, his power to act as such agent must be within the scope of the partnership business.

No article of partnership authorized the execution of the note sued on. The note was given without the knowledge or consent of the defendant, and when knowledge came to him that the note had been given (which, according to the evidence, was when he received notice of intention to sue), he denied liability. In the evidence there was nothing to show such a course of dealings as would authorize or ratify the execution of the note, and, there being no proof that the purchase of the stock for which the note was given was necessary to the conduct of the business of the partnership, it was not error to direct a verdict for the defendant.

Judgment affirmed.

1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION  $\Leftrightarrow$  191(5)— CONVICTION OF OFFENSE INCLUDED IN CHARGE — LARCENY AFTER TRUST—SIMPLE LARCENY.

The same transaction may constitute both larceny after trust and simple larceny. In such a case the jury can convict the accused of either offense.

2. LARCENY  $\Leftrightarrow$  3(2) — SIMPLE LARCENY — FALSE PRETENSES.

If a person obtains possession of the property of another under the false pretense of a bailment, with intent to appropriate the property to his own use, and the owner intends to part with the possession only of the property, the possession is obtained unlawfully, and the subsequent appropriation in pursuance of the original intent is simple larceny.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; John D. Humphries, Judge.

Albert Kelley and others were convicted of larceny, and they bring error. Affirmed.

H. A. Allen, Tillou Von Nunes, and W. I. Heyward, all of Atlanta, for plaintiffs in error.

Jno. A. Boykin, Sol. Gen., and E. A. Stephens, both of Atlanta, for the State.

BROYLES, P. J. The controlling question in this case is whether the defendants were guilty of simple larceny as charged and convicted, or whether they were guilty of larceny after trust only. It is contended by their counsel that under the evidence adduced the only offense of which they could have been legally convicted was larceny after trust. Both of the defendants were employed by the firm of Cefalu & Co., engaged in the "green grocery" business. One of the defendants, Hampton, was employed by the firm about 8 o'clock on the morning of January 31, 1919, to drive their delivery wagon. After making one delivery to a local hotel he returned to the store with the mule and wagon. About 10:30 o'clock on the same morning he was again intrusted with the mule and wagon and sent out to deliver other groceries. This time he did not return to the store, and the mule and wagon were not sent back. About 1:30 o'clock in the afternoon of the same day the other defendant, Kelley, rode up on the mule to the stable of a horse and mule dealer in Atlanta and offered to sell the mule for $15, but finally agreed to take $5 for it. The dealer, without the knowledge of Kelley, had the police telephoned for, and attempted to keep Kelley there by conversation and by delay in paying him the money. Kelley's suspicions were aroused, however, and before the police arrived he ran and attempted to escape, but was caught by the dealer and was turned over to the police when they arrived. Kelley told the police that he had left the other defendant, Hampton, "up the street a little ways," and that he and Hampton had decided to sell the mule and get money to leave on that night.

[1] 1. It is well settled that the same transaction may constitute both larceny after trust and simple larceny, and that in such a case the jury can convict the accused of either offense. Martin v. State, 123 Ga. 478, 51 S. E. 334, and authorities cited; Bryant v. State, 8 Ga. App. 389, 69 S. E. 121 (2).

[2] 2. Where a person obtains possession of the property of another, under the false pretense of a bailment, with intent to appropriate the property to his own use, and the owner intends to part with the possession only of the property, the possession is obtained unlawfully, and the subsequent appropriation of the property in pursuance of the original intent is simple larceny. Martin v. State, supra, and authorities cited.

The intent with which an act is done is peculiarly a question of fact for determination by the jury; and although a finding by the jury that the accused had the intent to commit the crime charged may be supported by evidence which is exceedingly weak and unsatisfactory, the verdict will not be set aside on that ground. Johnson v. State, 9 Ga. App. 406, 71 S. E. 507 (3).

Under the foregoing rulings we think that the facts of the instant case authorized the jury to find that when the defendant Hampton obtained possession of the mule and wagon to make the second trip for his employers he had formed the intent to appropriate the property to his own use, and that the other defendant, Kelley, conspired with him, and that they were both guilty of simple larceny.

Judgment affirmed.

BLOODWORTH and STEPHENS, JJ., concur.

STEPHENS, J. (specially concurring). I concur in the judgment of affirmance on the ground that, under the law of Georgia:

"Horse stealing shall be denominated simple larceny. * * * The offense shall, in all cases, be charged as simple larceny, but the indictment shall designate the nature, character and sex of the animal, and give some other description by which its identity may be ascertained." Penal Code, §§ 153, 154.

The indictment in this case charges the defendant with simple larceny for that he "did wrongfully, fraudulently, and privately take, steal, and carry away with intent to steal the same one sorrel horse mule and wagon, of the value of $100," etc. The evidence showed that the defendants were guilty of horse stealing, and therefore supported the indictment.

The excerpts from the charge of the court, if error, were harmless.

1. PLEADING  $\S$  332—BILL OF PARTICULARS—AMENDMENTS.

Where in a suit upon an account a bill of particulars is not attached, and a demand therefor is made by the defendant, and subsequently, by amendment allowed, a bill of particulars is set out, this amendment need not be served upon the defendant; and the plaintiff does not lose a term of the court because the bill of particulars was not attached in the first instance to the account sued on. Section 6269 of the Civil Code of 1910 has been superseded by section 5623 thereof. Moore v. Hendrix, 144 Ga. 646, 87 S. E. 915 (2); Rea v. McGahee, 12 Ga. App. 326, 77 S. E. 204.

2. TIME OF RENDITION OF JUDGMENT.

It does not affirmatively appear from the petition for certiorari and the answer thereto that the original judgment in favor of the plaintiff was not rendered at the proper term of the court.

July 17, 1919.)

1. NEGLIGENCE — 113(1), 136(14)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY—DEMURRER.

Ordinarily questions of negligence are such as lie peculiarly within the province of the jury to determine; but where by the allegations of the petition itself it clearly appears that the plaintiff, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have readily avoided the consequences flowing from the defendant's negligence, the petition is subject to demurrer, since, "If the plaintiff by ordinary care could have avoided the consequences to himself caused by the defendant's negligence, he is not entitled to recover." Civ. Code 1910, § 4428; Ball v. Walsh, 137 Ga. 350, 73 S. E. 585.

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT — 162, 164(1, 7)—CONDITION OF PREMISES—LATENT DEFECTS—NOTICE—LIABILITY OF LANDLORD.

It is ordinarily the duty of a landlord to turn over the rented property to the tenant in a condition reasonably safe and suited for the purposes intended. If, at the time of the renting, latent and dangerous defects exist, of which the tenant does not then have or does not acquire actual knowledge prior to the time of the resulting injury, then the landlord is liable to the tenant for damages naturally flowing from his exposure to the risks resulting from such unknown defects. If, however, prior to the time of the injury the defects were actually known to the tenant, or were so plainly observable that the tenant must necessarily have had the same and equal opportunity as the landlord of discovering and understanding them, with full opportunity of notifying the landlord thereof prior to the time of the damage or injury, then, before the landlord would be liable in damages to the tenant for such naturally resulting injuries, it must appear that notice had first been given him of such defects. Henley v. Brockman, 124 Ga. 1059, 53 S. E. 672 (5); Driver v. Maxwell, 56 Ga. 11(2); White v. Montgomery, 58 Ga. 204; Ocean Steamship Co. v. Hamilton, 112 Ga. 901, 903, 38 S. E. 204; Stack v. Harris, 111 Ga. 149, 150, 36 S. E. 615.

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT — 169(3)—INJURY TO TENANT—SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION.

Applying the foregoing principles of law to the instant case there could be no valid recovery under the allegations contained in the petition, and the demurrer thereto should have been sustained. Certain other legal principles also appear to be involved, which we think might likewise bar a recovery, but which it is not thought necessary to formulate.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by Mrs. J. W. Maynard and others against S. T. Weyman. Demurrer to petition overruled, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Mrs. J. W. Maynard brought her action against S. T. Weyman and another for damages arising from personal injuries; the allegations of the petition as to this defendant being substantially as follows: That prior to August 27, 1917, plaintiff's husband, J. W. Maynard, and her brother-in-law, L. W. Whitley, entered into an agreement with the defendant whereby they were to jointly rent from the defendant, for the use of themselves and their families, the house and lot known as 570 Central avenue, Atlanta, Ga., and in pursuance of this agreement took possession of the house on the date above named; that a few hours after the plaintiff and her family and that of her sister moved into the residence, two employes of the Atlanta Gaslight Company called at said residence (presumably at the request of the plaintiff) for the purpose of installing gas meters, connecting up and testing the gas fixtures, and turning on the gas for use by plaintiff and the other residents of said house; that plaintiff and her sister requested said employes to make a careful examination of all the gas fixtures and connections in the house; that shortly after the employes of the gas company had finished their work of installing gas meters, testing and connecting up the gas fixtures and connections, and left the house, the plaintiff discovered that the bathroom was completely filled with gas which had escaped and was then escaping through a hole in the ceiling, and discovered further that the entire bathroom gas fixture was lying, entirely disconnected, in the bathtub; that thereupon the plaintiff, with the assistance of a stranger who had come into the house to aid her, threw open the door and window of the bathroom, in order that the gas might escape therefrom, and that within a few minutes thereafter the stranger succeeded in connecting the gas fixture with the hole in the wall, thus stopping the leakage of gas therefrom. It is further alleged that about 30 minutes later the stranger who had come voluntarily to the assistance of the plaintiff and the other residents of the house stood upon a box in the middle of the bathroom, while plaintiff stood within about 10 feet of him and in the doorway between the bathroom and the adjoining hall, and struck a match for the purpose of testing the connection between the gas pipe or fixture and the hole in the wall, and was extending his hand in the direction of the hole or wall connection, when suddenly and unexpectedly there was an explosion and a flame which spread over the entire bathroom and into the doorway of the hall adjoining the bathroom where the plaintiff was standing at the time, burning and injuring her as described.

Plaintiff alleged that the defendant was negligent in the following particulars: (a) In failing to have the house in a tenantable condition, and in a safe and suitable condition for use and occupancy as a residence by the plaintiff and the other persons residing there; (b) in failing to have all gas fixtures in said house safely, securely, and properly connected up, so that the gas, when turned on, would not escape therefrom.

The defendant demurred to the petition upon the following grounds: (1) It set forth no cause of action against the defendant; (2) it fails to allege that the plaintiff gave notice to the defendant of the repairs alleged to be necessary, nor does plaintiff show that she was herself not guilty of such negligence as would preclude her right to recover damages of this defendant; (3) it appears from the allegations thereof that the alleged defects were patent and were known to plaintiff, and unknown to this defendant, but petitioner fails to allege any knowledge on the part of this defendant, or that she gave this defendant notice of such defects; (4) the allegations of the petition clearly disclose that the plaintiff, by the use of ordinary care, could have avoided the consequences to herself caused by said alleged negligence. The trial court, after hearing argument of counsel, passed an order overruling the demurrer, and to this order and judgment the defendant excepts.

1. ASSIGNMENTS ⇐24(1)—PARTNERSHIP ⇐296(1) — DISSOLUTION — ASSIGNMENT OF RIGHT OF ACTION — PARTIES — JOINDER — TORTS.

"A chose in action arising from a tort is assignable where it involves, directly or indirectly, a right of property."

(a) "Where a partnership is dissolved and one partner assigns to the other all of his right, title, and interest in and to the assets of the partnership, the assignee may institute and maintain an action against such tort-feasor for the entire damage sustained by the partnership. The assignor is not a proper party plaintiff to the suit, nor is it proper that the suit be brought in the names of both partners for the use of the assignee."

2. SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION.

The petition was not subject to general demurrer.

3. PARTNERSHIP ⇐296(2) — DISSOLUTION — ASSIGNMENTS OF INTEREST IN ASSETS — PLEADING—SUFFICIENCY.

"An allegation in a petition by one member of a partnership that the other member thereof sold out to the plaintiff 'all of his right, title, and interest in and to the assets of said partnership, plaintiff having operated the business since the date of said sale under a trade-name, and being the sole and exclusive owner of all of the assets of the firm,' is a sufficient allegation of assignment of a chose in action, in the absence of an appropriate special demurrer, and as against a general demurrer that 'plaintiff's petition sets forth no cause of action which would authorize a judgment against defendant.'"

(a) The above allegation in the plaintiff's petition was not attacked by an appropriate special demurrer.

4. SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION.

The petition as amended was not subject to any of the special grounds of the demurrer interposed.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐1078(1), 1079—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—SUFFICIENCY—ARGUMENT.

An assignment of error not argued in the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error will be treated as abandoned. A mere reference to such an assignment, with the statement that it is not abandoned but insisted upon, will not be considered as an argument. "Courts of review have the right to expect assistance from counsel by citation of authority or argument." Youmans v. Moore, 11 Ga. App. 66, 74 S. E. 710; Muse v. Hall, 18 Ga. App. 651, 90 S. E. 222; James v. Boyett, 19 Ga. App. 157, 91 S. E. 219; Barfield Music House v. Harris, 20 Ga. App. 42, 92 S. E. 402. In the instant case the only reference to the first five grounds of the amendment to the motion for a new trial is as follows: "We contend that the court committed error in overruling the assignments of error contained in the fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth grounds of the amendment to the motion for a new trial, for the reasons set out in each ground thereof, and we invite the attention of the court to each ground thereof." Under the above ruling these grounds will be treated as abandoned.

6. TRIAL — 259(1) — INSTRUCTIONS — GIVING UNDUE PROMINENCE TO CONTENTIONS OF ONE PARTY.

"While it is undoubtedly true that the contentions of the plaintiff were stated more at length than those of the defendant, it cannot be inferred from this fact that undue stress was laid upon, or undue prominence given to, the contentions of the former. In the first place, the contentions, so far as appear from the pleadings of the plaintiff, are set forth fully and distinctly in his petition, properly paragraphed, and the defendant contented itself, as it had a right to do, with a bare denial of the allegations of the petition. If the plaintiff's case required a full, definite, and affirmative allegation of certain facts, and the defense to the cause of action as stated rests upon a mere denial of the allegations in the petition, and the trial judge sums up the contentions of both parties by a fair statement of the material allegations in the petition, and then states that these allegations are denied by the defendant, how can it be said that he has failed to state the contentions of either party?" Macon, Dublin & Savannah R. Co. v. Joyner, 129 Ga. 684, 59 S. E. 903. Under this ruling, and the facts of the instant case, the charge of the court stated the contentions of the parties fairly and with sufficient fullness and clearness. If the defendants had desired a more elaborate statement of their contentions a timely written request therefor should have been offered.

7. SUFFICIENCY OF INSTRUCTIONS.

The reference in the charge to the defense of the defendants was sufficiently full, in the absence of a timely written request for more detailed instructions thereon.

8. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The verdict was authorized by the evidence, and the court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT — 308(2)—DISTRESS WARRANT PROCEEDINGS—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

On the trial of an issue raised by counter affidavit to a distress warrant, where the plaintiff testified to a positive agreement as to rental and fixed definitely the amount of rent to be paid, it was not error to refuse to admit his testimony as to what would be a reasonable rental value of the premises rented. The assignment of error in the motion for a new trial does not show that this testimony was offered merely to corroborate other evidence of the plaintiff.

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS §155—REMOVAL OF OFFICERS—INCIDENTAL POWERS.

"A municipal corporation has an incidental power to institute proceedings against, and remove from office for misconduct, all corporate officers, though the power to do so be not expressly given by the charter of such corporation." Mayor, etc., of Savannah v. Grayson, 104 Ga. 105, 30 S. E. 693 (3).

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS §159(1, 4), 160—REMOVAL OF OFFICERS—NATURE OF PROCEEDINGS—CONCLUSIVENESS OF JUDGMENT—NECESSITY OF NOTICE.

In such cases, the governing authorities may act either judicially or ministerially. Where a municipal official, as in this case, is the incumbent of an office established by law with a prescribed tenure, and is not merely an appointee holding at the pleasure of the governing power, in order that the act of removal may have the force and effect of a judgment it is a necessary prerequisite that notice shall first have been given to the delinquent official of the grounds or cause for his removal and opportunity for a hearing granted him thereon. Coleman v. Glenn, 103 Ga. 458, 30 S. E. 297, 68 Am. St. Rep. 108; Edge v. Holcomb, 135 Ga. 765, 768, 70 S. E. 644; Wright v. Gamble, 136 Ga. 376, 71 S. E. 795, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 866, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 372. Where the power of removal is thus exercised judicially, the judgment so rendered is generally conclusive upon the removed officer, unless it is subsequently set aside. Queen v. Atlanta, 59 Ga. 318; Mayor and Aldermen of Savannah v. Monroe, 22 Ga. App. 285, 96 S. E. 500.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS §159(1)—REMOVAL OF OFFICERS—PROCEDURE.

In such a proceeding, where the governing authorities act judicially, if there be an ordinance prescribing the form of procedure, the terms thereof must be adhered to and followed. 2 Dillon on Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.) §§ 467, 468.

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS §159(5), 183 (3)—REMOVAL OF OFFICERS—COPY OF CHARGES.

Where the ordinances relating to this subject provide that "For any neglect or violation of duty, the marshal and collector shall be liable, on conviction [italics ours], to a fine not exceeding fifty dollars, suspension or expulsion, or a fine and either of the other penalties, in the discretion of the mayor and council," and that, "If any officer charged with any offense shall request it, he shall be furnished with a copy of the charges against him, and, if he desires to make a defense, may appear before the mayor and council in person, or by attorney, and show cause, if any he can, why he should not be punished," reference is had by the terms of the ordinance itself to the furnishing of pending charges, in order that such official can, if he desires, appear and make his defense. It does not have reference to the mere furnishing of a statement of the procedure and the grounds thereof of an action which has already been taken.

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS §160—REMOVAL OF OFFICERS—SUMMARY PROCEEDINGS—EFFECT OF DETERMINATION.

Under the undisputed facts disclosed by the pleadings and the evidence in this case, the proceeding taken by the municipal authorities against the delinquent marshal was ministerial only; and where, thus acting ministerially, the governing authorities summarily suspend or discharge such an official for dereliction in his duties, without prior notice given or opportunity for him to be heard, the procedure has nothing of the binding force and effect of a judgment, and is not conclusive upon the suspended or discharged official. Oliver v. Americus, 69 Ga. 165.

6. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS §162(5)—REMOVAL OF OFFICERS—SUIT FOR SALARY—NECESSITY OF REINSTATEMENT.

In such a case the official who, by virtue of the exercise of the ministerial powers of the governing authorities, has thus been summarily suspended or discharged, not being concluded, is authorized in this state, unless such right has been waived, to bring his suit against the municipality for his wages or salary, without first having been reinstated. Oliver v. Americus, 69 Ga. 165, 169; Davis v. Mayor and Council of Cordele, 115 Ga. 770, 771, 42 S. E. 63. The rule in certain other jurisdictions seems to be different; some courts holding that reinstatement by a competent legal tribunal in direct proceedings taken for that purpose is always a condition precedent to such right of recovery, even though the act of removal be purely ministerial; these holdings being to the effect that title to office cannot be tried in an action to recover the salary incident thereto. See 28 Cyc. 450, § 13 (d); 19 R. C. L. 941, § 241; Selby

v. City of Portland, 14 Or. 243, 12 Pac. 377, 58 Am. Rep. 307.

7. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS —156, 162(5), 165—REMOVAL OF OFFICERS—SUITS FOR SALARY—DEFENSES—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

If an official who has been duly elected to and who has qualified in an office, the tenure of which is fixed by statute, should be removed from office, not by virtue of a judicial proceeding taken for such purpose with notice first given, but summarily and by virtue only of the exercise of the inherent ministerial powers of the governing authorities, he is prima facie still entitled to the emoluments of the office, and upon his bringing suit therefor it is the right and privilege of the municipality to defend such action by setting up and proving either of the two following grounds of defense: (1) The existence of any ground or cause whatever such as would justify the act of removal; or (2) in the event no such reason can be actually made to appear, it is still permissible to show as a ground of defense that the action of the governing authorities was nevertheless taken in good faith, and that the salary of the office has in the meantime been thus paid to a de facto officer. Whether the governing authorities had justifiable cause for their action, and, if not, whether the reasons existing were such as to authorize a finding that the acts of removal and the subsequent payment of the salary to a de facto officer were arbitrarily taken, or proceeded in good faith, are usually issues of fact to be determined by the jury. Thus, in a suit by such an official who has been thus removed, if the evidence is in conflict as to whether there was actual ground or cause for removal, it would be reversible error for the court to charge, without qualification, that—"Even if his removal is illegal, such officer cannot recover against the city for salary during the period when his office was filled and his salary paid to another appointee." Mattox v. Board of Education, 148 Ga. 577, 97 S. E. 532.

But since in this case the plaintiff himself admits that he refused to levy certain executions issued by the city, without showing by the record or even contending that they were void upon their face, it must be taken that the authorities had sufficient ground for removal, and consequently the question of good faith does not enter. Gladden v. Cobb, 73 Ga. 235, 6 S. E. 161; Singer Co. v. Barnett, 76 Ga. 377; Wilbur v. Stokes, 117 Ga. 545, 43 S. E. 856.

JENKINS, J. Judgment affirmed.

On Motion for Rehearing.

JENKINS, J. Whether the executions issued by the city would have been void upon their face had they shown that they were issued in whole or in part for amounts due the city for lights and water, fixtures, and appliances, including bathtubs, etc., need not be considered by this court. Although the city fi. fas. which the marshal refused to execute do not appear in the record, still the undisputed evidence is to the effect that they did not show upon their face what constituted the items covered by the amounts stated therein, and it therefore affirmatively appears that the executions were not void upon their face for this reason.

Had the question of good faith on the part of the municipal authorities been in fact involved, then the excerpt from the charge quoted in paragraph 8 of the decision would have been reversible error, upon exceptions having been taken pointing out that the court failed to qualify the same to the effect that such action, if taken without sufficient cause, in order to afford protection to the city, must have been taken in good faith. However, irrespective of the fact that we do not consider the question of good faith to be involved in this case, the exception as actually taken to the portion of the charge complained of assigns error solely upon the ground that the charge as thus given was erroneous for the reason that, where a de jure officer has been illegally removed, the payment of the salary to a de facto officer could not defeat the de jure officer's right thereto, whereas, under the ruling recently announced by the Supreme Court in Mattox v. Board of Education, supra, such is not the law when such action is taken in good faith, even though without sufficient cause. The motion for a new trial makes no assignment of error based upon the failure of the court to thus qualify the charge excepted to in accordance with the rule thus stated.

Motion for rehearing denied.

CAMPBELL v. STATE. (No. 10553.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
July 23, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. CRIMINAL LAW §1091(10) — APPEAL AND ERROR—REVIEW—EXCEPTIONS—SUFFICIENCY.

The bill of exceptions containing no assignment of error upon the judgment overruling the demurrer to the indictment, nor upon the exceptions pendente lite complaining of such judgment, the exceptions pendente lite cannot be considered by this court.

2. CRIMINAL LAW §659—NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS—CONDUCT OF AUDIENCE.

Under the facts of the case the court did not err in refusing to declare a mistrial because of loud and general applause in the courtroom during the trial.

3. CRIMINAL LAW §670—APPEAL—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—SUFFICIENCY.

This court and the Supreme Court have repeatedly ruled that an assignment of error based upon the refusal of the court to allow a witness for the movant to answer a certain question will not be considered, where it does not appear that the trial judge was at the time apprised of what answer was expected from the witness. This ruling disposes of the second and third special grounds of the motion for a new trial.

4. CRIMINAL LAW §1064(1)—REVIEW—MOTIONS FOR NEW TRIAL.

Under repeated rulings of this court and of the Supreme Court, a ground of a motion for a new trial which complains of the exclusion of documentary evidence will not be considered, unless such evidence is set forth in the ground or attached thereto as an exhibit. Under this ruling the fourth special ground of the motion for a new trial will not be considered.

5. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence amply authorized, if it did not demand, the verdict, and the court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Cobb County;

C. M. Dobbs and Herbert Clay, both of Marietta, for plaintiff in error.

Jno. T. Dorsey, Sol. Gen., of Marietta, and Wm. Butt, of Blue Ridge, for the State.

BROYLES, P. J. [1-5] The second head-note alone needs elaboration. While a little girl, a witness for the state, was being cross-examined, the defendant's counsel propounded to her the following question: "Where do little girls go when they burn little girls?"

The witness answered: "They don't go nowhere if anybody has told them to do it that is bigger than they are." This answer was followed by loud and general applause in the crowded courtroom. The applause consisted in the clapping of hands and the stamping of feet, and the court immediately called for order. Counsel for the defense at once moved for a mistrial. The court, before allowing counsel to complete his motion, sent the jury to their room, and after they had retired, and while counsel for the defendant was still standing for the purpose of completing his motion, "cautioned and warned the audience that he would not stand for any more applause, or any more disorder of any kind, and that he would fine the first one guilty of either, and would, if necessary, clear the courtroom." Counsel for the defense then completed his motion for a mistrial, which the court overruled. The jury were then brought back, and the court instructed them as follows:

"Gentlemen of the jury, you couldn't help but observe the applause in the courtroom when this witness answered the last question asked her. Now, you must not be influenced in any manner, shape, or form by that applause. You must not let that influence your finding one way or the other; you must not be influenced in any way by it. You are trying this case on the evidence adduced on the trial of the case, and the statement of the defendant, if she makes one, and under the rules of law the court will give you in charge, and don't let that applause influence you one way or the other. I especially charge you and want to impress upon you that it is your duty to disregard that and not let it have any influence on your mind one way or the other, in making your verdict in the case when finally submitted under the charge of the court."

Under the foregoing facts, and especially since the verdict against the defendant is overwhelmingly supported by the evidence, we do not think this ground of the motion for a new trial requires a reversal of the judgment below. It does not appear that the applause was a demonstration against the defendant. In fact, the circumstances would indicate that it was merely an approval of the ready, witty, and logical answer given by the little witness to the question propounded by defendant's counsel. There was merely a clapping of hands and a stamping of feet. No threats of any kind were made against the defendant, and it does not appear that this applause was liable to intimidate or to prejudice the jury into returning a verdict against the defendant. In this respect the instant case is easily distinguished from the Woolfolk Case, 81 Ga. 551, 8 S. E. 724, and the other cases cited by counsel for the plaintiff in error. Under the circumstances we think the prompt rebuke to the demonstrators by the judge, and his immediate and careful caution to the jury to disregard the applause, was sufficient.

1. GAMING §98(2)—CONVICTION—EVIDENCE.

Evidence that the defendant and others were seen at a secluded spot in the woods, sitting around in a circle, where cards were being dealt by one of them to the others, although he was not seen with any cards in his hands and was not seen to handle any money, and that upon the approach of the officers he and the others ran, leaving money and cards upon the ground, was sufficient to authorize the defendant's conviction of playing and betting for money at a game played with cards, and the trial judge did not err in charging the jury as set out in the first ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial. Frost v. State, 120 Ga. 311, 47 S. E. 901.

2. CRIMINAL LAW §538(3)—CONFESSION.

Evidence that the defendant, after he had been indicted for gaming, stated that he played in the game on the date alleged in the indictment, and that "they had a good pot and left some on the ground," and that he was gambling on this occasion, and was going to plead guilty, was ample evidence of a confession. Abrams v. State, 121 Ga. 170, 48 S. E. 965 (5).

3. CRIMINAL LAW §698(1), 828 — CONFESSIONS—VOLUNTARY CHARACTER—CHARGE.

Where evidence of a confession is offered by the state in a criminal case, and there is no objection thereto by the defendant upon the ground that the alleged confession was not voluntarily made, it is admissible as a voluntary confession. Eberhart v. State, 47 Ga. 598; Alford v. State, 137 Ga. 458, 73 S. E. 375 (4).

(a) While charging upon the weight to be given confessions, a failure on the part of the trial judge to charge the jury that they would not be authorized to consider such an alleged confession unless freely and voluntarily made was not error, in the absence of a timely written request so to charge. See, in this connection, Pierce v. State, 132 Ga. 27, 63 S. E. 792.

4. CRIMINAL LAW §822(4), 823(2)—CHARGE—EXPRESSION OF OPINION.

To determine whether an expression in an excerpt from the charge of the court is an expression or intimation of opinion on the part of the trial judge as to what has or has not been proved, it is proper, in a doubtful case, to construe the expression in connection with the entire charge, and where the trial judge elsewhere in his charge, in ample and unmistakable language, tells the jury that the particular matter about which it is claimed he has expressed an opinion as to its having been proved is an issue in the case, such expression will not be construed as an expression or intimation of opinion on the facts. Hanvey v. State, 68 Ga. 615; Moon v. State, 68 Ga. 697.

(a) Upon the trial of one charged with the offense of playing and betting for money at a game played with cards, where the trial judge, as in this case, in his charge to the jury uses the following language: "And if you further find that they were engaged in playing cards, and that one of the party was heard to remark, 'About $5,' that is insisted was done in the game"—the expression "that is insisted was done in the game" is not subject to the exception that it amounted to an expression of opinion on the part of the trial judge that there had been a game, when the judge, elsewhere in his charge to the jury, expressly told them that whether or not there had been a game was an issue of fact for them to determine.

5. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence authorized the verdict and judgment.

Error from City Court of Newnan; W. A. Post, Judge.

R. E. Washington was convicted of gaming, and he brings error. Affirmed.

A. H. Freeman, of Newnan, for plaintiff in error.

1. HOMICIDE §83—PARTICIPATION—DEGREE.

"Presence and participation in the act of killing a human being is not evidence of consent and concurrence in the perpetration of the act, by a defendant charged with aiding and abetting in the killing, unless he had a felonious design or participated in the felonious design of the person killing.

(a) "If the person charged with murder in the first degree, commit the assault on the deceased with a deadly weapon, but his intention to assault him with a deadly weapon was unknown to the person charged in the same indictment as principal in the second degree and he intended to participate in an assault and battery only, and in no design to kill, he is guilty of manslaughter only.

(b) "If a man charged in an indictment as principal in the second degree is connected with the act of killing, but is not connected with the intention to kill, and does not know that the person killing intended to use a deadly weapon in making an assault, he is guilty of manslaughter." Brown v. State, 28 Ga. 200 (4-6); 1 Chitty, Criminal Law, 258.

2. HOMICIDE §255(2) — VOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER—EVIDENCE.

The evidence, while conflicting, authorized the inference that the defendant participated in the act of killing committed by the actual perpetrator of the homicide, but did not participate in the latter's intent to kill. The verdict of voluntary manslaughter was therefore authorized by the evidence.

3. HOMICIDE §340(4) — HARMLESS ERROR — DEGREE OF HOMICIDE.

The conviction in this case being for voluntary manslaughter only, it was not harmful to the accused for the trial judge to refuse to charge, as requested, that, "Even if one was present at the commission of a crime and mentally approved or consented to same, yet if that consent was unknown to the person committing the crime, the one so mentally approving could not be held guilty as a principal." The defendant having been convicted of voluntary manslaughter, the jury must necessarily have found that he was not guilty of consent and approval, and the failure to charge as requested, even if it could be considered as error, was harmless. Land v. State, 11 Ga. App. 761, 76 S. E. 78 (2).

4. REQUESTED CHARGES.

The other request to charge was fully covered by the general charge.

Error from Superior Court, Montgomery County; E. D. Graham, Judge.

SAVANNAH BANK &amp; TRUST CO. v. McQUEEN et al. (No. 1113.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 6, 1919.)

1. INJUNCTION  $\S$ 26(3) — PROSECUTION OF ACTION—SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION.

An equitable petition was filed in the superior court of Chatham county, Ga., by a manufacturer of naval stores residing in Liberty county, Ga., against a bank in Savannah, Ga., and a railroad company and a tanking company and the sheriff of the county. Among other things, the following was alleged in substance: Plaintiff, in the course of his dealing with a factor in the city of Savannah, consigned certain rosin and spirits of turpentine over the line of the defendant railroad company to the factor to whom bills of lading were sent. The factor was directed to "tank" the spirits of turpentine and hold that and the rosin for petitioner. The factor "tanked" the spirits of turpentine and received receipts from the tanking company therefor, and without plaintiff's knowledge or consent transferred both the rosin and spirits of turpentine to the bank as collateral security for his individual debt by assigning the bills of lading and tank receipts. The bank had notice that in attempting to secure a loan on the rosin and spirits of turpentine the factor was acting as an agent and not as an owner of the property, and the bank did not, by reason of the transfer to it, acquire any title to or interest in the rosin and spirits of turpentine, except in subordination to petitioner's title. The bank instituted bail trover suits in the city court of Savannah against the tanking company for the spirits of turpentine and the railroad company for the rosin, and the sheriff was about to take possession of the property. Plaintiff owed the factor a stated amount on account of advancements made on the consignments, which amount he "is ready, able, and willing to pay . . . at any time on the surrender to him of" the spirits of turpentine and rosin. The prayers were for injunction, etc., and that plaintiff's title to the property be set up by decree of the court, and that possession thereof be surrendered to him. The factor was not made a party to the suit. The bank demurred on general and special grounds and answered. The demurrer as amended was overruled. The case was submitted to a jury, and a verdict returned as follows: "We, the jury, find that the plaintiff is the true owner of the described personal property, subject to the payment of ($938.41) to the Producers' Naval Stores Company (the factor) and to such further amounts as may be due by McQueen to the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and the National Tank & Export Company for their charges on all said goods, and that the Savannah Bank & Trust Company be perpetually enjoined from prosecuting its suit in the city court of Savannah against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and the National Tank & Export Company." Upon this verdict a decree was rendered. The bank excepted to the judgment overruling the demurrer and to the decree based on the verdict and to the judgment denying a motion for new trial. Held:

The petition alleged a cause of action against the bank and was not subject to general demurrer or any of the grounds of special demurrer. First National Bank of Macon v. Nelson, 38 Ga. 391, 95 Am. Dec. 400 (1); Seago v. Pomeroy, 46 Ga. 227, 231; Cummings v. McDade, 118 Ga. 614, 45 S. E. 479.

(a) There was no special demurrer on the ground that there was no absolute tender of the amount admitted to be due the factor, and no ruling is made on the question of whether such a tender was necessary.

(b) The request to overrule on review the case of Bank of Macon v. Nelson, 38 Ga. 391, 95 Am. Dec. 400, is denied.

2. CUSTOMS AND USAGES  $\S$ 22—CHARGE—KNOWLEDGE.

The judge charged: "The bank further contends that, under a custom alleged to be generally recognized as prevailing in the city of Savannah, the factor had the right to pledge the rosin and spirits. I charge you that, if McQueen (the plaintiff) were a nonresident of Savannah at the time the goods were consigned to the factor, the alleged custom would not become, by implication, a part of the contract between the consignor and the consignee, unless there is proof that the custom alleged to prevail in Savannah was known to McQueen. If you find that the custom alleged is a mere local custom or business usage in a particular city, it is not binding except upon those who have recognized it in their dealings. The custom of the business or trade shall be binding only when it is of such universal practice as to justify the conclusion that it became, by implication, a part of the contract." Held, that the charge was not erroneous on the ground that the jury was instructed that the alleged custom would not be binding upon McQueen unless he had actual knowledge of it. Bacon Fruit Co. v. Blessing, 122 Ga. 369, 50 S. E. 139; McCall v. Herrin, 118 Ga. 522, 45 S. E. 442; Hendricks v. Middlebrooks, 118 Ga. 137, 44 S. E. 835; Horan v. Strachan, 86 Ga. 416, 12 S. E. 678, 22 Am. St. Rep. 471; Miller v. Moore, 83 Ga. 692, 10 S. E. 360, 6 L. R. A. 374, 20 Am. St. Rep. 329; American Sugar Co. v. McGhee, 96 Ga. 27, 21 S. E. 383 (2); Kelly v. Kauffman, 92 Ga. 105, 18 S. E. 363 (3); Chateaugay Ore Co. v. Blake, 144 U. S. 476, 12 Sup. Ct. 731, 36 L. Ed. 510; Clark on Contracts (3d Ed.) 496, § 217; 17 Corpus Juris, 454, § 15. The request to review and overrule the Georgia decision just cited is denied.

3. CHARGE.

The charge was not erroneous for any reason assigned.

4. TRIAL  $\S$ 343 — VERDICT — CONSTRUCTION.

Construing the verdict in the light of the pleadings, the factor (the Producers' Naval Stores Company) not being a party, and the petition against the bank alleging a willingness to pay the amount admitted to be due the factor upon surrender of the goods, the requirement of the verdict that plaintiff should pay to the Producers' Naval Stores Company a stated sum as a condition to his recovery is to be construed as requiring such payment to be made to the bank.

5. MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

None of the grounds of the motion for new trial shows cause for reversal.

6. FORM OF DECREE.

It is directed that a decree be entered, and that it be so molded as to provide that the amount to be paid by the plaintiff on account of his indebtedness to the Producers' Naval Stores Company be paid to the bank.

7. COSTS $\Leftrightarrow$ 234—PREVAILING PARTY.

The plaintiff in error having procured a substantial modification of the judgment of the trial court, it is ordered that he recover the costs.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; P. W. Meldrim, Judge.

ATKINSON, J. Judgment affirmed, with direction. All the Justices concur.

WATKINS v. WOODBERY et al. (No. 9856.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
July 17, 1919.)

1. DISMISSAL OF BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

Under the rulings made by this court in Arnold v. Water Power Mining Co., 22 Ga. App. 504, 96 S. E. 343 (1), and by the Supreme Court in the same case, on certiorari, 99 S. E. 382, the motion to dismiss the bill of exceptions in this case is overruled.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR $\Leftrightarrow$ 1050(2)—HARMLESS ERROR—IMMATERIAL EVIDENCE.

The first assignment of error in the bill of exceptions, complaining of the admission of certain evidence upon the ground that it was immaterial and irrelevant, is without merit, since the evidence admitted was relevant to show the history of the transaction involved; but, even if immaterial, its admission is not shown to have been harmful. Unless a reasonable likelihood of a prejudicial effect appears, the admission of evidence merely immaterial will not authorize the setting aside of a verdict and the grant of a new trial. Ar*mour Fertilizer Works v. Dwight*, 22 Ga. App. 144, 95 S. E. 746 (3).

3. CONTRIBUTION $\Leftrightarrow$ 9(6)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

The assignments of error as to the exclusion of certain testimony are without merit. Whether one of the plaintiffs in a suit for contribution may have in point of fact procured from one of the joint makers of the notes, other than the defendant, the amount contributed by him towards the discharge of the joint obligations, by giving to that joint maker his personal note therefor, and whether that note has ever been paid, are matters resting solely between the plaintiff and the one from whom he borrowed the money thus contributed. So far as the defendant here is concerned, the original joint obligations have been discharged, and he is no longer liable thereon, and whether the plaintiff borrowed the amount contributed by him, and, if so, whether it has ever been repaid to the one from whom it was borrowed, are questions with which the defendant has no concern. Larson v. Slette, 125 Minn. 267, 146 N. W. 1094, L. R. A. 1915A, 898, and note; Hillas v. Fuller (Sup.) 143 N. Y. Supp. 15; 13 C. J. 823, § 5, note 32 (e); Miller v. Perkerson, 128 Ga. 465, 57 S. E. 787 (3). The questions which the court refused to permit the witness to answer were propounded merely for the purpose of showing that the note given by the plaintiff for the money borrowed and contributed by him towards the discharge of the original joint obligations had never been paid, and not that the plaintiff had not actually contributed towards the discharge thereof the amount alleged.

4. CONTRIBUTION $\Leftrightarrow$ 9(6)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

The other excluded evidence offered by the defendant, tending to show an indebtedness upon the part of one of the plaintiffs to one of the banks for whose benefit the original joint obligations were incurred, was immaterial to the issues involved under the pleadings, and the court did not err in excluding it.

5. BILLS AND NOTES $\Leftrightarrow$ 96—CONTRIBUTION $\Leftrightarrow$ 4—EVIDENCE $\Leftrightarrow$ 589—CONSTRUCTION OF TESTIMONY—ACCOMMODATION PARTIES—CONSIDERATION—CONTRIBUTION.

Under the well-settled rule that, in a case where the plaintiff's or the defendant's testimony is contradictory in itself, vague, or equivocal, it must be construed most strongly against him (Bussey v. Grantham, 23 Ga. App. —, 99 S. E. 236), the evidence in this case demanded a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs, and the court did not err in so directing.

Error from Superior Court, Gilmer County; N. A. Morris, Judge.

Action by W. H. Woodbery and others against E. W. Watkins. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed. See, also, 96 S. E. 338.

A. H. Burtz, of Ellijay, and D. W. Blair, of Marietta, for plaintiff in error.

Wm. Butt, of Blue Ridge, and Tye, Peebles & Tye, of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

JENKINS, J. [1-5] It is only the fifth headnote which is thought to require elaboration. Sam Tate, W. H. Woodbery, and E. W. Butt brought suit against E. W. Watkins, alleging that the plaintiffs, together with the defendant, were joint makers of certain notes; that the plaintiffs, together with all the other makers except Watkins, had paid off the notes, while Watkins had paid nothing, and that by reason of these facts Watkins was liable to the plaintiffs in designated sums by way of reimbursement and contribution. Watkins admitted signing the notes, but denied liability thereon, alleging that he had never received any consideration, and alleged that he signed the notes at the solicitation of the plaintiffs, and with the understanding then had between him and the plaintiffs that "he was not to be liable" thereon, and that he was a mere accommodation maker or indorser. The present suit proceeded in the names of Woodbery and Butt only, it having been previously disposed of as to the plaintiff Tate. The record shows the four certain banks in North Georgia and one in Tennessee, among them being the North Georgia National Bank of Blue Ridge, Ga., and the Gilmer County Bank of Ellijay, Ga., were, in the fall of 1911, about to fail. The defendant was at the time a director and stockholder of the North Georgia National Bank, president of the Gilmer County Bank, and also a depositor. The plaintiffs and the defendant, together with 13 other persons, executed two notes, each dated November 1, 1911, one for $75,000 and the other for $25,000, for the purpose of raising money to preserve the solvency of these banks. The $100,000 was thus raised, and was used for the benefit of each of the five banks. This $100,000 indebtedness, evidenced by the two notes mentioned above, was renewed from time to time, by the giving of renewal notes, and finally payment was made of the last renewal notes, which were each joint and several notes, and each signed by said 16 persons, Watkins, the defendant, being one. To the payment of the $100,000 each of the 16 persons contributed, with the exception of the defendant, who has paid nothing. The contributions made by some of the 15 were quite small, three of them being insolvent. Tate paid $35,538.88, Woodbery $25,000, and Butt $11,000. These three were the only persons of the 15 who paid more than would have been their proportionate share, and they brought suit against Watkins for contribution. No question as to misjoinder of parties plaintiff was raised, and, as already stated, the case had been disposed of as to the plaintiff Tate, and this trial involved only the amounts claimed by Woodbery and Butt, being $1,445.58 and $278.91, respectively. At the conclusion of the introduction of the testimony the court, upon motion, directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs, and the defendant excepted.

That the plaintiffs, if entitled to recover at all, are entitled to the amounts claimed by them respectively is not questioned; the contention of the defendant being that he was merely an accommodation maker or indorser, that he received none of the consideration, and that he was induced to sign the notes by the representations of the plaintiffs that he would never have them to pay or be called upon to pay them. The fact that the banks for whom the money was borrowed (of one of which the defendant was a stockholder and director, and of another of which he was president and a depositor) received the money thus borrowed is undisputed. The defendant's plea of failure of consideration is therefore not supported by the evidence. Granting, for the sake of the argument only, that the defendant was merely an accommodation maker or indorser, when accommodation parties get for and through another the exact consideration which they contemplate it is the same as if they receive it themselves, and a plea of want of consideration is not good. Farrar v. Bank of New York, 90 Ga. 333, 17 S. E. 87. This leaves only the defense that the defendant was induced to sign the notes by the representations of the plaintiffs that he would never have the notes to pay.

Were this a suit against the defendant upon the notes themselves by the payees thereof, the defendant having admitted signing the unconditional promissory notes, and the undisputed evidence showing that he received the consideration contemplated at the time he signed them, the plea of the defendant, attempting to set up such a promise on the part of the payees, would constitute no valid defense to the action, for it would amount to nothing more than an effort to vary the terms of the unconditional written promise to pay, by setting up a contemporaneous parol agreement contrary thereto, with no allegation that such an understanding was omitted from the notes by fraud, accident, or mistake. See Boynton v. Twitty, 53 Ga. 214; Hirsch v. Oliver, 91 Ga. 554, 18 S. E. 354; Byrd v. Marietta Fertilizer Co., 127 Ga. 30, 56 S. E. 86; Proctor v. Royster Guano Co., 21 Ga. App. 617, 94 S. E. 821 (3); Rheney v. Anderson, 22 Ga. App. 417, 96 S. E. 217. But in a suit for contribution from his co-obligors by one who has paid the joint obligation, the right of contribution does not rest on the original contract, and the note thus paid is not the basis of the action for contribution. The right of action has no strict connection with the promissory notes, but arises out of the relation created thereby on a common obligation, and the contract implied therefrom of discharging the common obligation equally. The co-obligor's right of action for contribution arises at the time he parts with his money in discharging, in whole or in part, the joint liability, and the note may afford evidence of the sum of money advanced by the paying co-obligor, and afford a basis for determining the aliquot portion thereof for which the defendant may be liable by reason of his implied promise to pay. Sherling v. Long, 122 Ga. 797, 50 S. E. 935; Hall v. Harris, 6 Ga. App. 822, 65 S. E. 1086; McLin v. Harvey, 8 Ga. App. 360, 69 S. E. 123. There is no contention or issue made upon the proposition that the plea of the defendant, setting up a parol understanding to the effect that the defendant signed the notes by virtue and by reason of the verbal warranties and assurances of the plaintiffs that no injury or loss would accrue thereon, falls to set forth a good defense to the suit for contribution; and, without passing upon this proposition, which is not raised, direction is given to the case upon the ground that the evidence given in behalf of defendant was insufficient to sustain his plea as made.

As to the plaintiff Butt, there was absolutely no evidence to sustain the plea. As to the plaintiff Woodbery, while the defendant testified that Woodbery said to him, "Now you will never have a cent of it to pay, never even be called on," and, "But for the statement of Mr. Woodbery that I wouldn't be called on to pay these notes, I would not have signed them," and though he further testified, and in the same connection, "What caused me to sign these original two notes for $25,000 and $75,000 each was representations made by general talk and representations made by Mr. Woodbery. * * * As to inducements held out by Mr. Woodbery that induced me to sign these notes, Mr. Woodbery was addressing a crowd in the hall of the banking building, and I was very slow about signing, in fact I wasn't signing, he said, 'Now you will never have a cent of it to pay, never even be called on.' There were several in the room, I don't remember just who and when he said that. We had done quite a heap of talking about it heretofore, and it was understood that if we could get enough signers to make $100,000 for the purpose of taking care of the situation that we wouldn't have anything to pay, that it was only a matter of accommodation, that the banks would go on and make the interest, keep the interest paid as long as those banks wanted to carry it, and then the banks would pay it. That was the general talk among the directors [of whom defendant was one] generally. Then Mr. Woodbery, in order as I thought to convince me, says, 'You will never have a cent of that to pay—you will not even be called on to pay'—he further testified, "I couldn't say just who was present when Mr. Woodbery made these representations to me, but I think a good many of the directors were there. That was my idea, but I won't undertake to say just who. I think Mr. Tate was there, and I know several others. The talk and general supposition was that they thought they wouldn't have to pay these notes, as I suggested, the way Mr. Woodbery made the statement."

It will thus be seen that, taking the defendant's own testimony, which is vague and equivocal, and construing it most strongly against him, as we must, it is not shown that the statement of Woodbery was a positive assurance or guaranty, but it appears to have been merely a statement of his opinion, based upon the assumption that the banks themselves would be enabled to repay the money thus borrowed. It follows, therefore, that unless the money was paid by the banks, the signers of the notes must have known that they would be liable therefor, and must have so understood at the time the notes were signed. Furthermore, all this testimony as to these representations has reference to the time when the defendant signed the two original notes. The defendant does not claim that any such representations were made at the time he signed the renewal notes, the payment of which is the basis of the present suit, but, to the contrary, he testifies:

"I signed the renewals just anywhere—most of them up here. After I had signed one I thoroughly understood a renewal was quite necessary, because I was in for the money anyhow."

It is thus shown that at the time the defendant signed the renewal notes, no representations were made to him by the plaintiff Woodbery, but, so far as appears from the record, they were signed voluntarily by the defendant. See, in this connection, McKee v. Hurst & Co., 21 Ga. App. 571, 94 S. E. 886 (3). In our opinion the defendant failed to prove his defense as made, and the trial court properly directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs.

FARM v. STATE. (No. 10371.)

July 22, 1919.)

1. BURGLARY  $\Leftrightarrow$  18—BREAKING AND ENTERING RAILROAD CAR—SUFFICIENCY OF INDICTMENT.

An indictment charging a violation of the statutory crime codified in section 181 of the Penal Code of 1910 is sufficiently definite when the indictment is as follows: Did then and there, unlawfully and with force and arms, break and enter a railroad car in the possession of the Georgia Northern Railway Company at Boston, Ga., in said county, with intent to steal goods, wares, and freight in said car being, and, after breaking, did steal therefrom goods and freight, to wit, 2 caddies of chewing tobacco and 11 sacks of flour, the same being freight consigned to Massey Mercantile Company, Barwick, Ga." It "states the offense in the terms and language of this Code," and "so plainly that the nature of the offense charged may be easily understood by the jury." Pen. Code 1910, § 954; Camp v. State, 3 Ga. 417 (1). The indictment meets all the objects in requiring particularity in setting out the offense. Wingard v. State, 13 Ga. 396, 400 (2).

2. BURGLARY $\Leftrightarrow$ 23—BREAKING AND ENTERING RAILROAD CAR—DESCRIPTION OF GOODS.

When an indictment under section 181 of the Penal Code of 1910 alleges that the accused "did then and there, unlawfully and with force and arms, break and enter a railroad car * * * with intent to steal goods, wares, and freight in said car being," "no description, value, or ownership of any goods intended to be stolen need be alleged." Boyd v. State, 4 Ga. App. 273, 61 S. E. 134 (1); Lanier v. State, 76 Ga. 304 (1-a).

3. BURGLARY $\Leftrightarrow$ 22—BREAKING AND ENTERING RAILROAD CAR—INDICTMENT—OWNERSHIP.

Under the ruling in Gilbert v. State, 116 Ga. 819, 43 S. E. 47 (1), an indictment which charges that the accused did, "unlawfully and with force and arms, break and enter a railroad car in the possession of the Georgia Northern Railway Company," sufficiently alleges the ownership of the car to have been in such company. See Waters v. State, 15 Ga. App. 342, 83 S. E. 200 (1); Markham v. State, 25 Ga. 52 (1).

4. MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—DEMURRER TO INDICTMENT.

Under the above rulings there is no merit in any of the grounds of the amendment to the motion for new trial, and the demurrer to the indictment and the motion in arrest of judgment were properly overruled.

5. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

There was evidence to support the verdict.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS $\Leftrightarrow$ 250—CONDEMNATION OF VEHICLE—ACQUITTAL—EVIDENCE.

In a proceeding under the act of 1917 (Ga. Laws, Ex. Sess. 1917, p. 16) to condemn a vehicle for carrying intoxicating liquor, a verdict of acquittal, founded on the alleged illegal possession of the liquor by the defendant, was admissible as evidence in his behalf, and the court erred in excluding it. See Duncan v. State, 99 S. E. 612, decided June 14, 1918.

2. MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

The grounds of the motion for a new trial not dealt with above are without merit.

Error from Superior Court, Gwinnett County; Andrew J. Cobb, Judge.

Under the ruling of the Supreme Court in the case of Duncan v. State, 99 S. E. 612, decided June 14, 1919, that where a third person interposes a claim to a vehicle seized under the act of 1917 (Ga. Laws, Ex. Sess. 1917, p. 16), providing for the forfeiture of any vehicle in which spirituous liquors are carried on any public road or private way in this state, "the general rule is that the verdict of acquittal [of the defendant], though based on the same transaction, is inadmissible," in favor of the claimant, the court in this case did not err in refusing to admit in evidence the indictment against the defendant and the verdict of not guilty thereon.

Before a tenant can legally be convicted, under sections 720 and 721 of the Penal Code of 1910, of defrauding his landlord, it must appear from the evidence that the sale of the crops by the tenant was without the consent of the landlord, that loss to the landlord resulted from the sale, and that the tenant made the sale with intent to defraud the landlord. Unless all three of these essential elements of the offense are shown, the defendant's conviction is unauthorized. Morrison v. State, 111 Ga. 642, 36 S. E. 902; Reece v. State, 5 Ga. 1. MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

The first second, and fifth grounds of the motion for new trial are but amplifications of the general grounds.

2. AMENDED MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

There is no merit in the fourth ground of the amendment to the motion for new trial.

3. TRIAL  $\Leftrightarrow$  252(6)—ABSTRACT INSTRUCTION—REFUSAL.

The storm center of the case is around the third ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial, which complains of the refusal of the court to give certain requested instructions to the jury. In the order overruling the motion for a new trial the judge said in reference to this request: "The question on this motion is this: Did the court err in refusing to give the request set out in the third ground of the amended motion for new trial? As an abstract proposition the statement that, 'where agency is shown by proof of the relative situation of the parties, the agency is established no further than is necessary for the discharge of the duties ordinarily belonging to it; is correct. In fact, it is an excerpt from the decision in Wilde v. L. & N. Ry. Co., 118 Ga. 309 [42 S. E. 525]. I refused to give it, because I decided it to be inapplicable to the case as made, and calculated to mislead. It is elementary law that corporations are liable for the acts of their servants while such servants are engaged in the business of their principal. In the instant case the life insurance company was a corporation. Singfield, a witness for the defense, testified that 'he was the manager of the defendant company at Savannah, and instructed Perry to swear out the warrant.' Perry, a witness for the defense, testified that he was 'bookkeeper' for the company, and, 'under instructions from Singfield, swore out the warrant against McIntosh.' 'Singfield is the manager for the company for the Savannah district, and was in charge of the Savannah office.' The foundation of the warrant against the plaintiff was the wrongful conversion by him, as an employé of the company, of money belonging to the company which had been intrusted to him. Singfield, as manager, instructed Perry, the bookkeeper, to take out the warrant against McIntosh. Singfield was engaged, when he gave this instruction, in the business of his principal. The term "manager," as applied to a private corporation, indicates one who has the general direction and control of the affairs. . . . implies agency, control, and presumptively authority to bind the corporation.' [American Investment Co. v. Cable Co.] 4 Ga. App. 103 [60 S. E. 1037]. No issue was raised in the pleading, evidence, or argument as to the authority of Singfield. There was no denial that he was the manager for the Savannah district. The legal presumption is that he, as manager, had the authority to bind the company. There was not the slightest suggestion that he did not have the authority. I take it to be true that the court should not give in charge abstract principles of law, unless they are adjusted to one or more issues in the case. There was no issue to which the request was adapted." We agree with the learned judge in the conclusion reached by him in reference to this request to charge.

1. WEAPONS  $\Leftrightarrow$  12—CARRYING PISTOL—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE.

The statute prohibiting any one from carrying, outside of his own home or place of business, a pistol without first obtaining a license from the ordinary of the county in which he resides (Acts 1910, p. 134; Park's Ann. Pen. Code, §§ 348a, 348b), when properly construed as a whole, means that, where one gives the required bond and secures a license to carry a pistol, he is authorized thereby to carry only the identical pistol for which the license is issued. While this is true, and while the act requires the ordinary granting the license to keep a record of the name of the person taking out the license, the name of the maker of the pistol to be carried, and the caliber and number of the pistol, the act does not require that these facts (except, of course, the name of the person to whom the license is issued) shall appear in the license itself or in any certificate from the ordinary that he has issued such a license.

2. WEAPONS §12, 17(3)—LICENSE—DEFENSE—PAROL EVIDENCE.

Where, upon the trial of one charged with carrying a pistol outside of his own home or place of business, the defendant tendered in evidence a license from the ordinary of his home county authorizing the defendant to carry a 38-caliber S. & W. pistol, and also offered in evidence a certificate from the ordinary that he had issued this license, and the evidence showed that the pistol which the defendant was charged with carrying was a 38-caliber pistol of Smith & Wesson make, it was error for the court to exclude the license and the ordinary's certificate. This documentary evidence, while not presenting a complete defense, in that it failed to show the number of the pistol which the defendant was licensed to carry, and therefore did not affirmatively establish that he was authorized under the license to carry the identical pistol which he was charged with carrying, was nevertheless admissible as a link in his chain of defense. Under such circumstances, he would have the right, if he could do so, to prove by parol testimony, or by his statement (provided the jury saw fit to believe it), that the pistol he was charged with carrying was the same pistol referred to in the license.

3. EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

The error in excluding the documentary evidence referred to above requires a new trial of the case.

1. HOMESTEAD §216—SALE OF PROPERTY—RECOVERY.

The evidence of the plaintiff tended to prove every material allegation of her petition. The court, therefore, erred in granting a nonsuit.

2. HOMESTEAD §212—POSSESSION—RIGHT OF ACTION.

The beneficiary of a homestead, taken out by her husband, had such an interest in property purchased with proceeds of a homestead, and therefore homestead property, that she might bring an action against any one in possession holding adversely to her under a purchase of the property at a foreclosure of a third person's chattel mortgage thereof.

3. HOMESTEAD §216—POSSESSION—RIGHT OF ACTION.

That plaintiff's husband and the head of the family was at a chattel mortgage foreclosure sale of a horse purchased with proceeds of the homestead, and claimed a part of the money arising from the sale, was no ground for nonsuiting plaintiff in her bail trover action against purchaser at such sale.

Error from Superior Court, Taylor County;
G. H. Howard, Judge.

Bail trover action by Mrs. M. E. Thornton against G. O. Horton. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

C. W. Foy, of Butler, for plaintiff in error.

Jule Felton, of Montezuma, for defendant in error.

LUKE, J. [1] R. B. Thornton mortgaged a certain described horse to the First National Bank of Reynolds. The mortgage was foreclosed, and at a "short-order" sale the horse was sold to one Horton for $100. The proceeds of the short-order sale were claimed by J. H. Thornton, the father of R. B. Thornton, under a mortgage li. fa. in his favor, and he was successful in obtaining a portion of the money arising from the sale. Thereafter his wife brought this suit, a bail trover action, to recover the horse. At the close of the evidence introduced in behalf of the plaintiff, a nonsuit was granted, on motion of the defendant, and this is complained of in the bill of exceptions.

The evidence showed that the defendant was in possession of the property described in the suit, and that demand was made of him for the property, and he refused to deliver it. The evidence also established the value of the property, and the value of the hire. There was parol evidence, unobjected to, that the property belonged to the plaintiff by virtue of a homestead taken out by her husband, and that the property was sold by E. J. Pool, a constable, who was put on notice before the sale that it was homestead property.

In view of this proof, we think the court erred in granting a nonsuit. Civil Code (1910) § 3377, provides that property may be set aside as a homestead, and shall not be subject to any levy and sale. The evidence shows that the property in dispute was purchased with the proceeds of a homestead, and was therefore homestead property. "Land paid for with homestead land is homestead property." Broome v. Davis, 87 Ga. 584, 13 S. E. 749. See, also, Johnson v. Redwine, 105 Ga. 449, 453, 33 S. E. 676; Taylor v. James, 109 Ga. 327, 334, 34 S. E. 674; Johnson v. Thomason, 120 Ga. 534, 48 S. E. 137.

[2] In the case of Taylor v. James, 109 Ga. 327, 336, 34 S. E. 674, 677, it is said:

"The beneficiaries of the homestead, however, have such an interest in the property that they may bring an action" against any one "who is in possession holding adversely to them."

See, also, Eve v. Cross, 76 Ga. 693.

These cases are authority for the proposition that the plaintiff had the right to bring this suit in her name, as she was a beneficiary under the homestead taken out by her husband.

[3] We can see no reason why the nonsuit was granted, unless it was on the idea that J. H. Thornton, the husband of the plaintiff and the head of the family, was at the judicial sale and claimed a portion of the money arising from the sale of the property sought to be recovered in this trover suit. In Phillips v. Taber, 83 Ga. 565, 10 S. E. 270 (4a), it is said:

"It could be recovered by the plaintiff as the head of the family, though he was present at the sale and received the surplus from the sheriff."

To sum up the whole matter, it appears to us that this suit could be maintained by the plaintiff, since she was a beneficiary under the homestead; that there could have been no legal sale of the property which was purchased with the proceeds of a homestead, and consequently no legal title passed, there being, of course, no proof that the sale was made under any of the exceptions to the general rule.

Judgment reversed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW §826 — REQUESTED CHARGE—CONSIDERATION ON APPEAL.

This court cannot consider exceptions to the refusal of the trial judge to comply with a written request to charge, unless it is made to appear that it was tendered to the court before the jury retired to consider the case. Seaboard Air Line Ry. v. Barrow, 18 Ga. App. 261, 89 S. E. 383 (4). In the instant case it is not shown that the written request to charge was so tendered.

2. CRIMINAL LAW §564(3)—VENUE—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

The venue can be established by circumstantial, as well as direct, evidence. Dumas v. State, 62 Ga. 59 (4).

3. CRIMINAL LAW §564(1) — VENUE — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence as to the venue, though slight, is sufficient where there is no conflicting evidence. Johnson v. State, 62 Ga. 300 (1), 301; Porter v. State, 76 Ga. 658 (2), 660. In the instant case, under the above rulings, the evidence as to the venue was sufficient.

4. CRIMINAL LAW §1159(4) — INTENT — FINDING OF JURY—REVIEW.

The intent with which an act is done is peculiarly a question of fact for determination by the jury, and, although a finding by the jury that the accused had the intent to commit the crime charged may be supported by evidence which is exceedingly weak and unsatisfactory, the verdict will not be set aside on that ground. Johnson v. State, 9 Ga. App. 409, 71 S. E. 507 (3). In the instant case the evidence as to whether the defendant had the intent to commit an assault with intent to rape, or had the intent to commit fornication merely, is weak and not altogether satisfactory; but under the ruling just cited, and especially when the tender years of the little girl involved are considered, the verdict, having been approved by the trial judge, will not be set aside.

The various grounds of the demurrer are without substantial merit, and the trial judge did not err in overruling the same.

2. BILLS AND NOTES §498—TRIAL §253 (10)—DEFENSE — BURDEN OF PROOF—FLORIDA STATUTES.

The court erred in charging the jury that, "under the statute of the state of Florida which the defendant has pleaded as a defense to the note sued upon, the burden is upon the defendant to show by a preponderance of the evidence that notice of dishonor of the note sued upon was not given to him. Placing such notice in the mails for transmission to him within the time required by the statute so pleaded would be a sufficient compliance with the law as to notice." Under the laws of the state of Florida pleaded by the defendant, when a person not otherwise a party to an instrument places thereon his signature in blank before delivery, he is liable as an indorser; and before an indorser can be held liable on a note it is necessary that notice of dishonor by the maker be given him. The burden was therefore on the plaintiff to establish that notice of dishonor was given the defendant, and the charge complained of, having placed this burden on the defendant, was such error as to require a reversal. See in this connection the following cases, in which a Georgia statute similar to the Florida statute was construed: Allen v. Ga. Nat. Bank, 60 Ga. 347; Apple v. Lesser, 93 Ga. 749, 21 S. E. 171.

(a) The uncontradicted testimony of the defendant that notice of dishonor was never received by him was sufficient proof under the Florida law; and the charge complained of was subject to the criticism that it conveyed to the jury the impression that the defendant must prove not only that he never received notice of dishonor, but that such notice was never mailed him—a burden impossible to carry unless he made the plaintiff a witness for himself.

ROBINSON v. McCOMMONS-THOMPSON-BOSWELL CO. (No. 10281.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1. July 17, 1919.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR — 843(2) — EXCEPTION TO REFUSAL TO NONSUIT—REVIEW.

This was a suit upon an account, brought by McCommons-Thompson-Boswell Company against Philip Robinson. The defendant in his answer denied indebtedness, and for further plea alleged that he never purchased or authorized any one to purchase for him any of the articles in the account sued on; that some time prior to the date of the first item he borrowed a stated sum of money for the purpose of paying cash for all purchases made by him; that "he informed plaintiffs of this, and expressly told some member of their firm, in the presence of their then bookkeeper [named], that he would pay cash for everything in future, and instructed them to charge nothing to him, and told them that if after this anything was charged to him he would not be responsible for nor pay for the same." Upon the trial of the case the manager of the plaintiff company testified that the account sued on was past due, true, and correct; that he had asked the defendant if he would not pay the account; that he did not then have the account with him, but had a memorandum of the amount, and that the defendant promised to pay the same several times; that the defendant, his wife, and their two minor children bought the articles sued for in the account. The defendant testified substantially to the facts alleged in his plea and answer, and denied that he had ever promised to pay the account, but further testified that he could not point out a single item of the account that he, his wife, and family did not receive and get the benefit of. There was no evidence that any of the items of the account were not necessities suitable to the condition and habits of life of the defendant's wife and family. Held:

"An exception based upon the refusal of the court to award a nonsuit will not be considered, where, subsequently thereto, the case is submitted to the jury, and, a verdict being rendered against the defendant, a motion for a new trial is made which presents the complaint that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, and without evidence to support it." Dudley v. Isler, 21 Ga. App. 615, 94 S. E. 827 (1).

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE — 232(1) — NECESSARIES—WIFE'S POWER TO CONTRACT—PRESUMPTION.

Cohabitation and joint use of the goods purchased is presumptive evidence of the wife's authority to contract, and it is for the husband to rebut the presumption by showing that the goods were supplied under such circumstances that he is not bound to pay for them. Such presumption can only be rebutted by positive and unequivocal evidence that the articles furnished were, not necessities, or that the seller had either actual or constructive notice of an allowance to the wife by the husband, either permanent or temporary, sufficient to enable her to procure necessities without obtaining them upon her husband's credit. Civ. Code 1910, § 2996; Connerat v. Goldsmith, 6 Ga. 14; Mitchell v. Treanor, 11 Ga. 324, 56 Am. Dec. 421; Green v. Coast Line R. Co., 97 Ga. 15, 35, 24 S. E. 814, 33 L. R. A. 806, 54 Am. St. Rep. 379; Adler v. Morrison, 15 Ga. App. 139, 82 S. E. 783. The court did not err, therefore, in giving in charge to the jury the section of the Code cited above, and for the same reason the third special ground of the motion for a new trial is without merit.

3. EVIDENCE — 376(13)—BOOKS OF ACCOUNT—CORROBORATION.

The books of account of any merchant doing a regular business and keeping daily entries thereof may be admitted in evidence in corroboration of his testimony as to the correctness of such accounts, upon proof being made by his customers that he usually kept correct books, even though no proof is made that no clerk was kept, or that he was unable to testify (Civ. Code 1910, § 5769, subd. 3; Shields v. Carter, 22 Ga. App. 507, 509, 96 S. E. 330), and in this case the trial judge did not abuse his discretion in allowing the plaintiff to introduce its books of account in evidence after both sides had closed and argument commenced. Wooten v. Solomon, 139 Ga. 433, 77 S. E. 375; Watson v. Barnes, 125 Ga. 733, 54 S. E. 723 (2).

4. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

There was sufficient evidence to authorize the verdict, and the court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Greene County; J. B. Park, Judge.

Suit by the McCommons-Thompson-Boswell Company against Phillip Robinson. Judgment for plaintiff, motion for a new trial overruled, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

1. CRIMINAL LAW — § 878(2) — ROBBERY BY FORCE—CONSTRUCTION OF VERDICT.

Where an indictment charges robbery by force and robbery by intimidation, and a general verdict of guilty is returned, it will be construed as a verdict finding defendant guilty of the graver offense, robbery by force.

2. ROBBERY — § 6, 7—"ACTUAL FORCE"—"INTIMIDATION."

"Actual force," in our definition of 'robbery,' implies personal violence. If there is any injury done to the person, or if there is a struggle to retain possession of the property, before it is taken, it is the force of our Penal Code."

(a) "'Intimidation,' in our Code, is the same with 'putting in fear' at common law, and is constructive force."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Actual Force; Intimidation.]

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

3. ROBBERY — § 24(5)—FORCE—EVIDENCE.

Evidence that the two defendants conspired to rob a certain person, and that one defendant put a pistol in his face and commanded him to hold up his hands, and that after he held up his hands the other defendant, without the consent of such person, took money from his pockets, did not show a "robbery by force."

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; John D. Humphries, Judge.

John Tanner and another were convicted of robbery, their motion for a new trial was denied, and they bring error. Reversed.

H. A. Allen, Ernest G. Bentley, W. C. Cousins, and W. I. Heyward, all of Atlanta, for plaintiffs in error.

John A. Boykin, Sol. Gen., and E. A. Stephens, both of Atlanta, for the State.

BLOODWORTH, J. The evidence in this case shows that the accused, Tanner and Washington, conspired to rob Smith, and, with no one else except the three present, Washington put a pistol "right in" the face of Smith, commanded him to hold up his hands, and, while his hands were up, Tanner, without the consent of Smith, put his hands in the pockets of Smith and took therefrom money belonging to Smith. The indictment charged Tanner and Washington with robbery "by force and intimidation." There was a general verdict of guilty. A motion for a new trial was overruled, and the movants excepted. It was insisted that this verdict should be "construed as a verdict finding the defendants guilty of the graver offense, to wit, robbery by force," and "that this verdict was not supported by the evidence, and was, therefore, contrary to law."

[1] 1. We agree with both of these contentions. In Moran v. State, 125 Ga. 35, 53 S. E. 806, the Supreme Court said:

"There was a general verdict of guilty, which would be applied to that count in the indictment which charged robbery by force."

In Story v. State, 12 Ga. App. 644, 645, 77 S. E. 914, 915, this court said:

"It is well settled, of course, that robbery by force and robbery by intimidation, being each merely different grades of the same offense, may be joined in the same count, and that the defendant may be convicted of either, according to the proof. Long v. State, 12 Ga. 293; Fanning v. State, 66 Ga. 167; Lampkin v. State, 87 Ga. 516, 13 S. E. 523. It is equally well settled that, where the indictment is of this character, and a general verdict of guilty is returned, it will be construed to be a verdict finding the defendant guilty of the graver offense, to wit, robbery by force. Harris v. State, 1 Ga. App. 136, 57 S. E. 937, and citations."

These decisions settle the first insistence of the plaintiffs in error.

[2, 3] 2. Is there any evidence to show robbery by force? No. The salient facts of the case are set out above. These facts show the "intimidation," but not the "force" contemplated by our statute. Judge Powell, speaking for this court in Johnson v. State, 1 Ga. App. 730, 57 S. E. 1056, said:

"The 'force,' in our definition, is the same as the 'violence' of the common-law definition; and the 'intimidation' in ours is synonymous with the 'putting in fear' in the common law."

The ninth and tenth headnotes of the decision in the case of Long v. State, 12 Ga. 294, are as follows:

"(9) 'Actual force,' in our definition of 'robbery,' implies personal violence. If there is any injury done to the person, or if there is a struggle to retain possession of the property, before it is taken, it is the force of our Penal Code.

"(10) 'Intimidation,' in our Code, is the same with 'putting in fear' at common law, and is constructive force. When a party is put in fear of an injury to his person or his property, or to his character, by a charge of an unnatural crime, it is robbery by intimidation."

While the twelfth headnote in that case is as follows:

"If the transaction be attended with such circumstances of terror, such threatening, by word or gesture, as in common experience are likely to create an apprehension of danger, and to induce a man to part with his property for the safety of his person, he is put in fear of his person, and it is robbery,"

It must be borne in mind that—

"At common law it is held that, if property is taken by either of these means, against the will of the party, such taking will be robbery. At common law, therefore, there was but one offense, and fear was held to be constructive violence." Long v. State, supra, 12 Ga. 315.

Hence the robbery referred to in the twelfth headnote just quoted from the Long Case would, under our law, be robbery by intimidation. In discussing the definition of robbery in our Code, Judge Nisbet in that case (12 Ga. pp. 314, 315) said:

"Does the Code make two offenses? We think not, but creates one offense, to wit, robbery, and makes two grades of that offense—one robbery by force, which is the highest grade, and punishable with the longest term of imprisonment in the penitentiary; and the other robbery by intimidation, which is the lower grade, and punished with a shorter term of imprisonment. It defines robbery thus: 'Robbery is the wrongful, fraudulent, and violent taking of money, goods, or chattels, from the person of another, by force or intimidation, without the consent of the owner.' Prince, 678. The offense is single; and it is robbery if committed by force, and not the less robbery when perpetrated by intimidation. Force is the ruling element in the offense. When the Code speaks of force, it means actual violence; and when it speaks of intimidation, it still means force, not actual and direct, but exerted upon the person robbed by operating upon his fears—the fear of injury to his person, or property, or character. The law considers, however, that actual violence is attended with more immediate and serious consequences than violence by intimidation; and therefore it is that a distinction is made in the punishment. The former constitutes the offense with greater enormity. The offense, I conclude, is single, for the reason stated, and the element of force is necessary to constitute it in either case. It was so considered at common law."

The brief of the solicitor general in the instant case says:

"Ours is the usual case, and exactly like the case of Harris v. State, 1 Ga. App. 136, 57 S. E. 937 (2)."

The Harris Case is distinguished from this case by the fact that in that case, while one of the conspirators, at the point of a pistol, forced the person robbed to stand still and hold up his hands, the other seized him and went through his pockets and took his money. The fact that in the Harris Case the person robbed was seized adds the element of force not found in this case. In the Harris Case the two persons were acting together, and the force of one was the force of the other, as the intimidation by one was intimidation by the other. In that case it was properly held that—

"These joint acts are sufficient to constitute the crime of robbery both by force and by intimidation."

For lack of evidence to show force in this case, the court erred in refusing a new trial. See Barksdale v. State (No. 10387), 100 S. E. 45, this day decided.

It is unnecessary to pass specifically on the assignments of error in the amendment to the motion for a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

1. CRIMINAL LAW — 878(2)—ROBBERY BY FORCE—CONSTRUCTION OF VERDICT.

Where one is indicted for the offense of robbery by force as well as by intimidation, a general verdict of guilty will be applied to the count in the indictment charging robbery by force, since the latter is the higher grade of the offense. Moran v. State, 125 Ga. 35, 53 S. E. 806.

2. ROBBERY — 6—ROBBERY BY "FORCE"—EVIDENCE.

"Force," in the sense in which it is used in defining the offense of robbery, consists in personal violence or that degree of force that is necessary to remove articles so attached to the person or clothing as to create resistance, however slight. 2 Bishop's Criminal Law, § 1167. In the absence of any evidence of such "force," the verdict finding the defendant guilty of robbery by force is without evidence to support it.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Force.]

3. ROBBERY ⚡24(5)—ROBBERY BY FORCE—INTIMIDATION.

Evidence that the defendant held a pistol in a threatening and intimidating manner over the victim of an alleged robbery, while his confederates ran their hands through the pockets of the victim, and without violence relieved the latter of his money and other loose valuables unattached to the person or clothing, authorizes a conviction of robbery by intimidation, but not of robbery by force; such robbery having been accomplished without "force." See Tanner v. State, 24 Ga. App. —, 100 S. E. 44.

4. ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR.

The assignment of error upon an excerpt from the charge of the court contained in the only ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial is without merit.

5. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The verdict is without evidence to support it, and the court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial.

2. RELEASE ⚡28(1) — COVENANT NOT TO SUE—CONSTRUCTION.

A covenant not to sue one jointly liable will not release any one other than the one with whom the covenant is entered into.

Where by accident, mistake, or fraud a writing does not speak the truth, it may be reformed and corrected and be made to speak the truth.

4. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS ⚡44, 46—EVIDENCE—ORIGINAL WRITING—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Defendants may introduce in evidence the original writing as well as other competent evidence by way of attack on the reformed and alleged corrected covenant not to sue, making a question for jury as to whether plaintiff released, as pleaded by defendant, or merely covenanted not to sue.

Error from City Court of Madison; K. S. Anderson, Judge.

Action by Mrs. A. G. Roy against the Georgia Railroad & Banking Company and others. Demurrers to plaintiff's amended petition sustained, and verdict directed for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Percy Middlebrooks, of Madison, and Sam'l H. Sibley, of Union Point, for plaintiff in error.

McDaniel & Black, of Atlanta, and Cumming & Harper, of Augusta, for defendants in error.

LUKE, J. The plaintiff in this case has had a long and no doubt an anxious fight with those who she claims have by their negligence damaged her. This court in Roy v. Georgia Railroad & Banking Co., 17 Ga. App. 34, 86 S. E. 328, gave her hope by determining her suit to be good as against demurrer, in so far as several of the defendants were pleaded liable. When her case in due course came on for trial, the defendants amended their defenses and claimed that she had released a joint tort-feasor by entering into the following agreement:

"In consideration of the sum of two hundred fifty ($250) dollars received by me this 2d day of October, 1913, I hereby release and discharge Empire Cotton Oil Company, Madison, Ga., of and from any and all claims which I now have or may have hereafter by reason of personal injuries sustained by my son, J. A. Roy, resulting in his death on or about the 11th day of September, 1913, or of any cause, matter, or thing whatsoever. Witness my hand and seal. Release. Mrs. A. G. Roy [L. S.] C. L. C. Thomas, Witness, Madison, Ga. P. B. Speed, Jr., Witness, Madison, Ga."

Demurrers to the pleas were overruled, and the plaintiff offered an amendment to her petition, in which amendment she alleged that her agreement and receipt to Empire Cotton Oil Company, while purporting to be a release, was in fact not a release, for the reason that neither she nor the Empire Cotton Oil Company ever regarded the death of her son as due to any negligence of his employer, the Empire Cotton Oil Company, and that the money received by her as evidenced by her written receipt was but a gratuity, and not an effort to release or sell her claim, and at most was only a covenant not to sue; and in the amendment she sought a reformation of the receipt given so as to make it speak the truth. Demurrers to the amendment were sustained. She then filed a petition in the superior court, praying the aid of equity, to the end that the receipt be reformed, modified, and molded so as to speak the truth and not be such a release as would defeat her remedy against the others she was suing for the tort committed. In the meantime the Empire Cotton Oil Company agreed with her contention, and in lieu of the first writing the following writing was entered into as a reformation of the first:

"Whereas, on October 2, 1913, Mrs. A. G. Roy gave to Empire Cotton Oil Company a paper in words as follows: 'In consideration of two hundred and fifty dollars ($250) received by me this 2d day of October, 1913, I hereby release and discharge Empire Cotton Oil Company, Madison, Ga., of and from any and all claims which I now have or may have hereafter by reason of personal injuries sustained by my son, J. A. Roy, resulting in his death on or about the 11th day of September, 1913, or of any cause, matter, or thing whatsoever. Witness my hand and seal. Release. Mrs. A. G. Roy. C. L. C. Thomas, Witness. P. B. Speed, Jr., Witness.' And whereas, at said time it was not considered that said Empire Cotton Oil Company was liable to Mrs. A. G. Roy in the premises, nor was it the purpose of either party to appraise her injury or satisfy the same, but it was the purpose of the Empire Cotton Oil Company to pay her said sum in the nature of a gratuity, asking only that she agree not to sue or hold said Empire Cotton Oil Company responsible, and an agreement having the effect of relieving said Empire Cotton Oil Company from any suit by Mrs. Roy without affecting her right to hold others responsible for her son's death that might be responsible therefor was intended by both parties, but by accident and mistake of both parties, as to the legal effect and operation of the words used, the language above quoted was used, which it is now claimed operates to release the persons really responsible, if any persons are responsible:

"Now, in consideration of the premises, and in voluntary reformation of said instrument to express the true intent of the parties thereto, the same is made to read as follows: 'In consideration of two hundred and fifty dollars ($250) received by me this 2d day of October, 1913, I hereby agree not to sue Empire Cotton Oil Company, Madison, Ga., on account of any or all claims which I may have or may hereafter have against it by reason of personal injuries sustained by my son, J. A. Roy, resulting in his death on or about September 11, 1913, or any other matter or thing whatsoever, not relieving or releasing any other person who may be liable therefor. Witness our hands and seals this August 8, 1916. Empire Cotton Oil Co., by H. E. Watkins, Vice Pres. [L. S.] Mrs. A. G. Roy. [L. S.] M. E. Keller, Secty. Empire Cotton Oil Co. [Corporate Seal].'"

This branch of her cause then by due course was determined by the Supreme Court, and in the decision of that court (147 Ga. 349, 94 S. E. 218) it was said:

"The plaintiff applied to the Empire Cotton Oil Company for a voluntary reformation of the contract, and that company promptly executed an instrument in conformity with the alleged intentions of the parties to the original contract of release, which the plaintiff alleges was a mere agreement not to sue or hold the Empire Company responsible. The contract as thus reformed was duly pleaded in the city court, and the plea was rejected. The case now stands for trial in the city court of Madison. At that stage of the litigation the plaintiff filed an equitable petition in the superior court, seeking: (1) To enjoin the defendants from interposing the alleged release as a defense in the city court of Madison; (2) that the release be reformed 'as against the railway companies, in accordance with the voluntary reformation thereof by the Empire Cotton Oil Company'; (3) that the controversy pending in the city court of Madison be tried and determined in the superior court of Morgan county, and that plaintiff have a general judgment against the defendants. While the Empire Cotton Oil Company is named as one of the defendants in the equitable petition, no relief of any kind is prayed against that company. The petition specifically alleges that the Empire Company has voluntarily reformed the instrument. The defendants filed demurrers and answers attacking the petition for failure to state a cause of action. They also denied the jurisdiction of the court, on the ground that neither of the defendants against whom substantial relief is prayed is domiciled in Morgan county, one company having its domicile in Richmond county, and the others being nonresidents of the state, with no office or agent in Morgan county.

"The primary purpose of the equitable proceeding is to reform the release. Without this it is manifest, and indeed must be conceded, that the suit would be barren and purposeless; for in other respects it can be tried as favorably to the plaintiff in the tribunal first selected as in the last. Without reformation the paper would be as fatal to the recovery in the one court as in the other; and therefore, unless the reformation can be had, there is no basis for the equitable jurisdiction of the superior court. The paper having been voluntarily reformed already in accordance with the original intention of the parties, a court of equity could do no more than has been done. It would be a vain thing for a court of equity to solemnly decree that third parties must do that which has been voluntarily done. A court of equity cannot adjudicate what shall be the effect of a contract as to third persons who took no part in executing the same, by decreeing a reformation as to them. The railroad companies were not parties to the alleged release. It is so alleged in the petition. It was a paper executed between the plaintiff and the Empire Cotton Oil Company. Reformation can go no further than to insert what was by mistake omitted, or to strike what was by mistake unintentionally included in the original paper. Therefore there is nothing for a court of equity to do. What effect the change in the contract as made by the plaintiff and the Empire Cotton Oil Company in their voluntary reformation will have upon the other defendants is to be determined upon the trial of the case."

The cause came on again for trial, and by amendment the reformed writing was pleaded by the plaintiff, and by her construed to be not such a release as would defeat her right to recover her alleged damages against the defendants.

[1-4] A covenant not to sue one jointly liable will not serve to release any one other than the one with whom the covenant not to sue is entered into. Where by accident, mistake, or fraud a writing does not speak the truth, it may be reformed and corrected so that it may be made to speak the truth. In this case the defendants may introduce in evidence the original writing as well as such other evidence as may be competent by way of attack on the reformed and alleged corrected covenant not to sue, and it is for the jury to say, under appropriate instructions from the court, whether the plaintiff in fact did release as pleaded by the defendant, or whether she merely entered into a covenant not to sue. Viewing the case as we do, we are of the opinion that it was not error to overrule the demurrers to the defendants' answer, and that it was error for the court to sustain the demurrer to the plaintiff's amended petition. In other words, the plaintiff may attack the release pleaded by the defendant, and the defendants may attack the alleged reformed writing by the introduction of the writings themselves, and such other evidence as may be admissible, for the discovery of the truth.

The court having struck the plaintiff's amendment to her petition wherein she pleaded the reformation of the original receipt, and by such order made it impossible for her to recover, and the judgment of this court being that the sustaining of the demurrer to her amendment was error, everything occurring thereafter was nugatory, and the question raised by the Southern Railway Company and the Virginia & Southwestern Railway Company as to their release by reason of a stipulation in the record as to their liability as determined by the law of this case upon the former adjudication upon the question of the merits of the petition is not now passed upon. For the reason that the court erred in sustaining the demurrers to the plaintiff's amended petition, the judgment of the court in directing a verdict for the defendants is reversed.

Judgment reversed.

CORY. (No. 9080.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

VACATING ORDER TO CONFORM TO DECISION OF SUPREME COURT.

This case (22 Ga. App. 424, 96 S. E. 335) was carried by writ of certiorari to the Supreme Court, and that court made the following rulings: "A railway company over whose road a passenger train, including a sleeping car, is operated, is liable for damages which are the approximate results of negligence on the part of the employees in charge of the sleeping car in failing to notify a passenger occupant thereof of the train's arrival at his destination. This is true, though the company may not own the sleeping car or the train, since those having them in charge become its agents and employees as to duties due such passenger while the train is being operated over its road. Where the passenger in the sleeping car had no notice of the train's arrival at his destination, he being ignorant of this fact by reason of the darkness of the night, and the train, together with the sleeping car occupied by him, at that place, in accordance with its regular course and schedule, but without his knowledge, switched from the line of road over which he held passage onto the line of road of another and different company, and, after being transported for some 20 miles over its road he was required by its conductor and the conductor of the sleeping car to leave the train during the night, in freezing weather, at a small station, where he was unable to secure accommodation, by reason whereof he contracted an illness which caused him much physical pain and mental anguish, held: (a) The company over whose line he held passage and traveled to his destination was not liable in damages for his illness, for the reason that it was not the proximate result of such company's negligence in failing to notify him of arrival at his destination. (b) There were no aggravating circumstances in failing to give notice of arrival at the destination, so as to authorize a recovery of exemplary or punitive damages. (c) Nor were damages for loss of time and expense incurred by reason of being carried, without notice, beyond the destination, recoverable, when not specially sued for, nor the amounts claimed therefor specifically set forth. (d) The petition set forth cause for recovery of nominal damages." (For full opinion of the Supreme Court, see 149 Ga. —, 99 S. E. 881.)

Under the latter ruling the petition set forth facts which authorized a recovery of only nominal damages on account of the alleged negligence of the defendant company in failing to notify the plaintiff of the approach of the train to his destination; and the ruling of this court on this question having been reversed in so far as it relates to damages other than nominal, the judgment originally entered by the Court of Appeals is vacated, and the judgment of the Supreme Court is made the judgment of this court.

—NEW TRIAL ¶39, 41(2), 125 — TRIAL
¶260(1)—CHARGE OF COURT—VERBAL IN-ACCURACIES—RESIDENCE—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—PROVINCE OF JURY.

There is some evidence to support the verdict, which is approved by the trial judge. The motion for new trial points out no error of law, and was properly overruled.

Error from Superior Court, Calhoun County; W. M. Harrell, Judge.

Attachment proceeding by B. H. Askew against B. T. Melvin, administrator, with affidavit of illegality by defendant. Judgment adverse to the illegality, motion for new trial overruled, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

W. I. Geer, of Colquitt, for plaintiff in error.

E. B. Askew, of Moultrie, and Pope & Bennett, of Albany, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. An attachment was levied and an affidavit of illegality filed containing a number of grounds. When this case was before the Supreme Court (see 144 Ga. 348, 353, 87 S. E. 278, 280, where the facts are set out), that court said: "There were 24 grounds of the affidavit of illegality. Some contained repetitions in various forms of the matters above discussed. Some included in one ground reference to several matters. None of them were meritorious, except in so far as they attacked the judgment for want of jurisdiction in Calhoun superior court to render it. All the rest of the allegations, except those relative to the subject of jurisdiction, should be stricken (including the plea filed after judgment), and direction is given accordingly." The issue raised by the ground of illegality not eliminated by the Supreme Court was submitted to a jury, the verdict was adverse to the illegality, a motion for a new trial was filed and overruled, and the movant excepted.

1. The first ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial complains that the judge erred in stating the contentions of defendant and telling the jury that the execution was proceeding illegally "for the reason that the superior court of Calhoun county, from which said execution was issued, did not have jurisdiction of the defendants E. E. Stone and L. V. Stone, against whom said execution issued as principals, for the reason that said defendants nor either of them are residents of Calhoun county, Georgia, but that they are residents of Dublin, Laurens county, Georgia"; whereas the affidavit of illegality alleged that the defendants at the time of the institution of the suit, the levy of the attachment, were residents of Laurens county, Georgia. (Italics ours.) The use of the word "are" by the judge in the above quotation from the charge was only a slip of the tongue, and could not have misled the jury. They had out with them the pleadings, which showed the contentions of the parties. "Verbal inaccuracies in the charge, not calculated to mislead or obscure the meaning of the court, will not require a new trial." Savannah, Augusta & Northern Ry. Co. v. Williams, 133 Ga. 679, 66 S. E. 942 (2); Cochran v. State, 9 Ga. App. 824, 72 S. E. 281 (2). Besides, the judge charged the jury: "I charge you further that you may take into consideration all the facts and circumstances in this case, to determine where their domicile was at the time this suit was brought," and "on the other hand, if you should believe from the evidence in the case that E. E. Stone and L. V. Stone did not reside in Calhoun county at the time this suit was instituted or brought, but that they resided in Laurens county or at some other place, then and in that event you will find in favor of the defendants."

2. Under the facts of this case it was not error harmful to the plaintiff in error for the judge to give in charge to the jury that portion of section 2182 of the Civil Code of 1910 of which complaint is made in ground 2 of the amendment to the motion for a new trial.

3. Error is assigned on the following instruction:

"If you believe there is any evidence in this case as to their having registered in Calhoun county, Georgia (and it is contended by the plaintiff in this case that they did register and that they voted in this county), if there is any evidence of their having voted and registered in this county, I charge you that would be a circumstance that the jury might consider as to determining the domicile of the defendants."

In this we see no error.

4. The principles embraced in the requests to charge contained in grounds 4 to 10, inclusive of the motion for a new trial, so far as correct, pertinent, and applicable, were sufficiently covered by the charge given.

5. Even if the evidence complained of in the eleventh ground of the motion for a new trial, that the defendants stated that they voted in a certain election "down here," was improperly admitted, the error was not of sufficient gravity to require the grant of a new trial. Evidence in practically the same language from another witness was admitted without objection, and there was no denial by the defendant of the correctness of the statement. Besides, every ground of a motion for a new trial must be complete within itself and without reference to other parts of the record; and it would be necessary to refer to the evidence to ascertain where "down here" is, and the year in which the election referred to took place.

6. The court did not err in refusing to exclude the testimony complained of in the twelfth ground of the motion for new trial, for the reasons alleged.

7. The thirteenth and fourteenth grounds of the motion for a new trial are without merit. It is not for a witness to say whether or not other witnesses testified truthfully or falsely; that is for the jury to determine.

8. There is some evidence to support the verdict, which has the approval of the trial judge, no error of law is pointed out, and the judgment is affirmed.

DAVIS v. STATE. (No. 10383.)

June 27, 1919. Rehearing Denied July 16, 1919.)

1. MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

The first, second, third, and fourth special grounds (the two latter grounds being erroneously numbered sixth and seventh) of the motion for a new trial, complaining of the admission of evidence, are too indefinite and incomplete within themselves to be considered by this court.

2. LARCENY §77(4) — RECENT POSSESSION — CHARGE.

It was not error to charge the jury as follows: "Now, I charge you the law concerning the recent possession: Where a larceny is shown to have been committed, that is to say, where the principal fact that a larceny has been committed and a person is found to have been in the recent possession of the goods that were stolen, why that possession creates a presumption of fact which would authorize the jury to convict, if the possession isn't satisfactorily explained to the jury. It is not a presumption of law, but a presumption of fact." This charge was substantially correct, and in immediate connection therewith the judge charged as follows: "[This presumption of fact] may be rebutted by any explanation which may be presented to the jury consistent with innocence that the jury may believe. Of course, where the explanation is made consistent with innocence and the jury believes it, the fact that a person is in possession of it is no presumption that he is the person who stole the property alleged to have been stolen. Now, you are the judges of the fact of the recent possession and of the explanation of that possession; that is a question for you to determine, and the truthfulness of the explanation and all of those things are questions for you to determine. As I said awhile ago, if you believe from the evidence and the explanation, if you believe that that explanation was consistent with innocence, and you believe that explanation, if it is satisfactory to you, why then you would not be authorized to find a verdict of guilty in the case. If you are not entirely satisfied as to the explanation, you may consider that explanation along with the other testimony in the case on the question of a reasonable doubt." Holliday v. State, 23 Ga. App. 400, 98 S. E. 386, and authorities there cited.

3. CRIMINAL LAW §761(9) — CHARGE — ASSUMPTION OF FACTS — STATUTE.

Complaint is made of the following charge: "All of those questions are for you to determine, but if the explanation made is consistent with the hypothesis of innocence, or with innocence, if you believe it to be true, why you wouldn't be authorized to find a verdict of guilty on the fact that he was found in the recent possession of the property shown to have been stolen." Under the facts of the case, conceding that the judge in this charge assumed that the cow (the subject-matter of the larceny charged) had been stolen, a new trial is not required, since this fact was established by the undisputed evidence, and not denied, but virtually treated as true, by the defendant in his statement to the jury. The undisputed evidence showed that the prosecutor's cow had been stolen by some one, and that shortly thereafter it was found in the possession of the defendant, and there was nothing in the defendant's statement to dispute this evidence; but his defense rested solely upon the contention that he did not participate in the theft, but had bought the cow, not knowing that it was stolen property.

Under these circumstances the provisions of the so-called "dumb act" (Pen. Code 1910, § 1058; Civ. Code 1910, § 4863) were not violated by the judge in assuming that the property had been stolen by some one before it came into the defendant's possession. Marshall v. Morris, 16 Ga. 368; Springfield v. State, 125 Ga. 281, 54 S. E. 172; Robinson v. State, 129 Ga. 336, 58 S. E. 842; Georgia, Florida & Alabama Ry.

4. CRIMINAL LAW §784(4, 7)—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE—CHARGE.

"While in every criminal case, where it is sought to show the guilt of the defendant by circumstantial evidence alone, the jury should be instructed and cautioned that he should not be convicted on circumstantial evidence, unless the proven facts exclude every possible reasonable hypothesis save the guilt of the defendant, still it is immaterial what language is employed to convey this instruction. If all possible hypotheses arising from the circumstantial evidence which are favorable to the defendant be presented in concrete statement to the jury, and the jury are told that if they believe any one of these hypotheses the defendant should be acquitted, the principle above referred to would be sufficiently presented. And where, as in the present case, only two inferences can be drawn from the evidence—the one of innocence, and the other of guilt—and the hypothesis consistent with innocence is fully and fairly stated to the jury, and the jury are instructed that if they are satisfied that the hypothesis consistent with innocence is true, or if they have a reasonable doubt as to its truth, the defendant should be acquitted, the rule above stated is substantially complied with." Mangum v. State, 5 Ga. App. 445, 63 S. E. 543 (2); Barrow v. State, 80 Ga. 191, 5 S. E. 64 (3); Richards v. State, 102 Ga. 569, 27 S. E. 726; Jones v. State, 105 Ga. 649, 31 S. E. 574; Bush v. State, 23 Ga. App. 126, 97 S. E. 554; Reynolds v. State, 23 Ga. App. 369, 98 S. E. 246. Especially is this true where the judge fully instructs the jury upon the subjects of a reasonable doubt and the presumption of innocence.

5. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The verdict was authorized by the evidence, and the court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Stephens, J., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Liberty County; W. W. Sheppard, Judge.

T. Y. Davis was convicted of larceny, his motion for new trial was overruled, and he brings error. Affirmed.

O. C. Darsey, of Hinesville, and Jas. R. Thomas, of Jesup, for plaintiff in error.

J. Saxton Daniel, Sol. Gen., of Claxton, for the State.

BROYLES, P. J. Judgment affirmed.

BLOODWORTH, J., concurs.

STEPHENS, J. (dissenting). The defendant was tried for the larceny of a cow. The state relied for a conviction upon the recent possession by the defendant, unsatisfactorily ly explained, of the cow alleged and claimed to have been stolen. Among other things, the defendant, in his motion for a new trial, excepted to an alleged expression of opinion upon the facts by the trial judge, which the defendant contends necessitates the granting of a new trial. The excerpt complained of is as follows:

"All of those questions are for you to determine, but if the explanation made is consistent with the hypothesis of innocence, or with innocence, if you believe it to be true, why you wouldn't be authorized to find a verdict of guilty on the fact that he was found in the recent possession of the property shown to have been stolen."

It is contended that this charge was error, in that the judge stated as a fact that the property was shown to have been stolen, and also stated as a fact that the property alleged to have been stolen was in fact found in the possession of the defendant.

While it is true, as Judge Bleckley says in Yarborough v. State, 86 Ga. 396, 12 S. E. 650 (2), that "to declare the law applicable to a given state of facts is no expression or intimation of opinion as to whether any of the facts referred to do or do not exist in the case on trial," yet "when the charge of the court assumes certain things as facts, and is in such shape as to intimate to the jury what the judge believes the evidence to be, and that they made defendant guilty, a new trial will be granted." Whitley v. State, 38 Ga. 50 (4). To ascertain the true meaning of this excerpt, and to determine whether or not the expression referred to amounts to an expression of opinion, it is necessary to consider it in connection with the entire charge, and particularly with reference to all of that part of the charge dealing with presumption of guilt arising from recent unsatisfactorily explained possession of the property alleged to have been stolen. That the entire charge may be considered in properly arriving at the construction of the excerpt complained of is a sound principle of hermeneutics. See in this connection Hanvey v. State, 68 Ga. 615; Moon v. State, 68 Ga. 697. The only conclusion that can be drawn from a consideration of the entire charge is that the trial judge expressed and intimated, in the excerpt complained of, an opinion on the facts as claimed by the defendant. The other portions of the charge shedding light upon this question are as follows:

"Now, the defendant in this case, gentlemen, sets up in his defense that the particular cow alleged in this indictment was purchased by him from one John Johnson, and that his connection with that cow came about in that way; in other words, the question of the recent possession of property shown to have been stolen, the defendant accounts for this possession by showing or undertaking to show that his possession and connection with it came about by buying it from another party. Now, I charge you the law concerning the recent possession: Where a larceny is shown to have been committed, that is to say, where the principal fact that a larceny has been committed, and a person is found to have been in the recent possession of the goods that were stolen, why that possession creates a presumption of fact which would authorize the jury to convict, if the possession is not satisfactorily explained to the jury. * * * Where the explanation is made consistent with innocence and the jury believe it, the fact that a person is in possession of it is no presumption that he is the person who stole the property alleged to have been stolen. Now, you are the judges of the fact of the recent possession and of the explanation of that possession; that is a question for you to determine, and the truthfulness of the explanation and all of those things are questions for you to determine. * * * If you believe from the evidence and the explanation, if you believe that that explanation was consistent with innocence, and if you believe that explanation, if it is satisfactory to you, why then you would not be authorized to find a verdict of guilty in this case. If you are not entirely satisfied as to the explanation, you may consider that explanation along with the other testimony in the case on the question of a reasonable doubt, and give the testimony such weight in determining the guilt or the innocence of the prisoner at the bar, beyond a reasonable doubt. [Here follows the excerpt complained of.] All of these questions are for you to determine; but if the explanation made is consistent with the hypothesis of innocence, or with innocence, if you believe it to be true, why you wouldn't be authorized to find a verdict of guilty on the fact that he was found in the recent possession of the property shown to have been stolen. If, on the other hand, you do not believe that the explanation is the truth of the case, why then the recent possession of the goods shown to have been stolen would be a circumstance from which you would be authorized under the law to infer guilt, if not satisfactorily explained. * * * Now, gentlemen, in your consideration of this case, you are to look to the allegations in the indictment, and if you find that the defendant, T. Y. Davis, in the county of Liberty and state of Georgia, on the 1st day of April, 1917, or within four years prior to the date this indictment was found—I say you are to look to the indictment and evidence, and find, beyond a reasonable doubt, that T. Y. Davis, in the county of Liberty and state of Georgia, on the date alleged in the indictment, or within four years prior to the finding of the bill of indictment, unlawfully, wrongfully, and fraudulently took and carried away, with intent to steal it, one yellow butt-headed cow of the value of $25, or some other value, the property of H. D. Quinnip, if you find all of these facts to exist under the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, why then, gentlemen of the jury, it would be your duty to find the defendant guilty, but if under the evidence and law as given you in charge you find that the defendant has satisfactorily explained his connection with it, you would not be authorized to find the defendant guilty. If, after considering all the facts and circumstances of the case, you have a reasonable doubt of his guilt, it would be your duty to give him the benefit of the doubt and acquit him. You may retire." (Italics mine.)

Nowhere did the judge submit to the jury the issue whether or not the cow had been stolen. This was a most essential fact in the case. It was the corpus delicti. While the failure of the judge to so charge is not complained of, it is to be considered in determining what impression the charge must have made upon the jury, and as demonstrating the fact that the whole tenor of the charge assumed that the cow in question had, as a matter of fact, been stolen, and the jury could but infer that the judge was of the opinion that the cow in question had, as a matter of fact, been stolen. As evidence that the charge eliminated from the jury's consideration of any issue as to whether or not the cow in question had been stolen, and narrowed the consideration of the case to the question of recent possession, attention is called to the final expression in the charge before the jury retired, in which the judge stated:

"If, under the evidence and the law as given you in charge, you find that the defendant has satisfactorily explained his connection with it [With what? Necessarily the stolen cow], you would not be authorized to find the defendant guilty." (Italics mine.)

As to what constitutes an expression of opinion on the facts, see the following from the opinion of Judge Bleckley, in Kinnebrew v. State, 80 Ga. 232, 239, 5 S. E. 56, 59:

"No doubt there is danger of intimating an opinion, or of leading the jury to think that an opinion is intimated, though the purpose be only to discriminate between legal and logical sufficiency; and this danger is not lessened, but rather increased, by the fact that in most instances the one kind of sufficiency exists wherever the other does. But danger is no interdict on duty, and a charge is not erroneous for pointing out that the jury are authorized to infer one thus and so from another thus and so, provided they believe from the evidence that the first thus and so is established, and provided they further believe that the second thus and so is a reasonable and proper inference to be drawn from the first." (Italics mine.)

See, also, Pitts v. State, 15 Ga. App. 436, 83 S. E. 673 (2); Henderson v. State, 14 Ga. App. 672, 82 S. E. 61; Davis v. State, 91 Ga. 167, 17 S. E. 292 (2); Holtzendorff v. De Renne, 129 Ga. 226, 58 S. E. 710; Rawls v. State, 97 Ga. 186, 22 S. E. 529; Kettles v. State, 145 Ga. 6, 88 S. E. 197 (3).

While the defendant's main line of defense was that he bought the cow in question from some one other than the alleged owner, and in his statement to the jury, he confined himself largely to this issue, and did not expressly deny that the cow had been stolen as alleged, it is contended here that his failure thus to deny the allegation of the theft of the cow amounted to an admission on his part of the alleged larceny as a matter of fact, and, that, if the trial judge intimated or expressed an opinion as to the truth of such allegation, it was harmless and the defendant cannot now complain. This contention is untenable. When the trial judge in his charge to the jury expresses an opinion on what has or has not been proved, it is mandatory on this court to set the verdict aside, regardless of any view which we may entertain as to the harmless effect of the charge. Penal Code, § 1058; Phillips v. Williams, 39 Ga. 597. While it has been held that the inhibition upon the trial judge expressing or intimating an opinion upon the facts applies only to incidents where the alleged fact is in dispute and about which the parties are at issue, it has been held that in a criminal case, even though the testimony offered in behalf of conviction is undisputed and uncontradicted by other testimony, every allegation in the indictment and the evidence offered in support of it are put in issue by the defendant's plea of not guilty. In determining whether the parties are at issue upon any alleged fact, the rule in criminal cases is different from that in civil cases, due to the differences in pleading and other fundamental differences between the two classes of cases. In a criminal case the defendant's plea of not guilty denies every allegation in the indictment against him, as well as the case made under the evidence, though uncontradicted by other testimony. The defendant is presumed to be innocent, and this presumption remains with him throughout the trial. His plea of not guilty and this presumption of innocence, therefore, continue throughout the entire trial to challenge and deny the case of the state alleged in the indictment and made by the evidence. Where there is no admission in judicio an issue of fact is made upon every allegation in the indictment and the evidence offered to sustain it. In Phillips v. State, 131 Ga. 426, 62 S. E. 239, it was held:

"The defendant's plea of not guilty put in issue every material allegation in the bill of indictment charging him with the offense of murder."

In Cooper v. State, 2 Ga. App. 730, 59 S. E. 20, it was held that—

"A plea of not guilty, by one accused of crime, is an express contention on his part antagonistic to every fact necessary to be proved by the state in order to establish his guilt; and unless the accused admits one or more of the facts which it devolves upon the state to prove, such fact must be established by evidence. To assume that an important fact in the case on trial has been admitted, and to so instruct the jury when no such admission has been made, is reversible error."

In Southern Express Co. v. State, 1 Ga. App. 700, 58 S. E. 67, it was held that—

"To assume in a criminal case that the testimony for the state is the truth, though such testimony be not contradicted by evidence for the defendant, and to charge the jury that such testimony is the truth and that there is no contention to the contrary, is violative of section 4334 of the Civil Code [Civil Code (1910) § 4863; Penal Code, § 1058], and demands a new trial. The plea of not guilty, filed by the defendant, is a contention on his part as to every material and essential fact necessary to establish his guilt, and implies a denial of every such fact."

In the case of Young v. State, 125 Ga. 584, 54 S. E. 82 (5), the accused made a statement in which he in so many words admitted that there had been a homicide, making no reference, however, either by way of admission or denial, to the manner in which such homicide was committed, but resting his defense solely upon an alibi. The Supreme Court in that case held that—

"The indictment having alleged that the deceased was murdered by the use of a gun, these were material and essential averments, and the defendant's plea of not guilty put both of them in issue. There was nothing in the evidence or the prisoner's statement, nor was there any admission by his counsel, which authorized a charge to the effect that the defendant's contention was that while there was a homicide, and while the deceased was killed with a gun and under circumstances which may show an unlawful killing, he was not the person who perpetrated the offense, and that he did not commit the homicide or fire the gun that killed the deceased, and that the jury would be relieved to some extent in their investigation of the questions that ordinarily arise in criminal cases. This charge requires a reversal."

From the opinion of the court beginning on page 587 of 125 Ga., on page 83 of 54 S. E., the following is taken:

"The court charged the jury as follows: 'His [defendant's] contention is that while there was a homicide, while Gus King was killed with a gun and under circumstances which may show it was an unlawful killing and was murder, that he was not the person that perpetrated the offense, that committed the homicide, that he did not fire the gun that took the life of Gus King; and you would be relieved to some extent in your investigation of the questions that ordinarily arise in criminal cases. There is no dispute in this case that the homicide was committed. There is no dispute that Gus King was killed, and killed with the gun, as charged in the bill of indictment. These facts are not disputed facts in this case. The main question for the determination of the jury in this case, the real question for your determination, relates to the identity of the person who took the life of Gus King. The question for your determination in this case is whether or not the defendant now on trial was the person that fired the gun, as charged in this indictment—that took the life of Gus King.' The defendant excepts to that charge, and assigns error thereon, among other things, for the reason that there was no admission by the defendant or his counsel that the deceased was murdered, or killed with a gun or that it was an unlawful killing. There is nothing in the record which pretends that counsel for the accused admitted on the trial the things mentioned in the charge as not being in issue. The only words in the defendant's statement tending to admit those things are as follows: 'Anybody that knows directly how that man was killed, they killed him. * * * Aug Hardy did not know that man was killed unless he killed him himself. * * * It is impossible for me to tell how that man was killed.' The most that could be said of these words is that they could be construed into an admission that the defendant was killed. There is no admission that the killing was under such circumstances as to make the homicide murder, nor do they admit that the homicide was accomplished by the use of a gun. It was alleged, in the indictment, that the deceased was 'murdered' by the use of a 'gun.' These were material and essential averments in the indictment. The defendant's plea of not guilty put both of them in issue. Being placed in issue, there was no way to avoid the issue, except by withdrawal by the defendant personally, or by his counsel for him. There was no such withdrawal; and the court in so instructing the jury as to withdraw from them the determination of those issues committed error. The court may have been of the opinion that the evidence in the case was overwhelmingly against the defendant on these issues, but such would not have authorized him to withdraw the issues from consideration of the jury. If the court could withdraw these issues, there is no principle which would prevent the withdrawal of any other issue in the case. It may as well be said that all issues may be withdrawn, and that where the court thought the evidence demanded the conviction of the defendant, the court could direct a verdict of guilty. It will hardly be contended that this could be done in any criminal case, in the absence of a statute. Certainly it could not be in a felony case, with or without a statute."

While there was a dissent in the Young Case just referred to, the dissenting opinion called attention to the defendant's statement, wherein he said that "that man [meaning deceased] was killed; they killed him;" and in the opinion it was said that "the evidence, while circumstantial in its character, pointed to the accused as the perpetrator, with a certainty which authorized the verdict of the jury," and that "this is the third conviction of the defendant for the same offense."

In Ryder v. State, 100 Ga. 528, 28 S. E. 246 (9), 38 L. R. A. 721, 62 Am. St. Rep. 334, the Supreme Court held:

"The court in some of its instructions referred to the homicide as 'the act which the accused had committed,' and thus at least intimated an opinion that the killing was done by him; and although many of the requests to charge practically conceded that this was true, yet as it was not distinctly admitted that the accused did commit the homicide, expressions embracing such language as that above quoted should not have been used."

While the charge there was held to be error, the court held that it was not sufficient to authorize the granting of a new trial, since counsel for the accused had, in a written request to charge, which was refused, sought to induce the trial judge to use the language complained of. See 100 Ga. 536, 28 S. E. 246, 38 L. R. A. 721, 62 Am. St. Rep. 334. The judgment was reversed, however. In that case, apparently, no statement was made by defendant. This fact, however, does not affect the principle of law invoked. The Young and Ryder Cases have never been overruled or departed from by the Supreme Court. The civil cases, for reasons already stated, are not authority upon this proposition. Besides the Cases of Springfield, Robinson, and Taylor, relied on in the majority opinion, are cases in which the defendant in his statement made some declaration that was equivalent to an admission of the alleged fact concerning which the trial judge was alleged to have expressed or intimated an opinion. See Springfield v. State, 125 Ga. 281, 54 S. E. 172; Robinson v. State, 129 Ga. 336, 58 S. E. 842; Taylor v. State, 135 Ga. 622, 70 S. E. 237. In Jones v. State, 130 Ga. 274, 60 S. E. 840, it was held that, as the defendant's own evidence proved a certain fact, he could not complain that the judge, in the charge to the jury, stated such fact as true. Here there was also a dissenting opinion. The reasoning contained in the dissenting opinion, on page 288 of 130 Ga., 60 S. E. 840, is, in my opinion, the better view.

There was nothing in defendant's statement in the case at bar that can be construed into an admission that the cow had been stolen. He did state something to the effect that he had some suspicion about the title to the cow when he bought it, but this can hardly be considered as admitting a larceny. Neither did the defendant's evidence prove a larceny. The instant case, therefore, does not fall within the ruling of the majority of the court in Jones v. State, supra.

Since there was an issue made by the pleadings, which was not removed by an admission upon the part of the defendant or his counsel, or defendant's evidence, upon the question whether or not the cow found in defendant's possession had been stolen, it was error for the trial judge to express or intimate an opinion upon this issue.

The defendant's conviction depended entirely upon circumstantial evidence. It necessarily depended upon the inference that he was the alleged thief, drawn from the circumstance, if true, that he was in the recent possession of a stolen cow, which possession was unsatisfactorily explained by him. It was therefore error on the part of the trial judge to fail, even in the absence of a request, to charge the law relative to the degree of proof necessary to convict upon circumstantial evidence. Kinard v. State, 19 Ga. App. 624, 91 S. E. 941; Harris v. State, 18 Ga. App. 710, 90 S. E. 370. See my views upon this question and criticisms upon the cases relied on by the majority of the court expressed in Reynolds v. State, 23 Ga. App. 369, 98 S. E. 246. To authorize a conviction upon circumstantial evidence the evidence must "exclude every other reasonable hypothesis save that of the guilt of the accused." Penal Code, § 1010. Assuming that the trial judge, in every case where a conviction must depend entirely upon circumstantial evidence, whether the evidence convincingly establishes a defendant's guilt, or is weak and doubtful, fully complies with his duty in respect to charging the law relative to the degree of proof necessary to convict upon such evidence when he properly submits to the jury the law relative to all of the hypotheses of innocence, he failed in this case to submit to the jury the hypothesis of the defendant's innocence based upon the fact that no larceny at all had been proved. It is conceivable that a jury might be inclined for some reason to discredit the testimony of the sole witness relied upon by the state for a conviction, even though this testimony be disputed only by defendant's plea of not guilty, and not by other testimony, but would, upon the trial judge's intimation or assumption that the fact solely testified to by this witness was the truth, yield to this opinion out of implicit confidence in, and respect which the jury might have for, the trial judge and his ability, after long experience in the trial of cases, to correctly determine the truth of testimony and the credibility of witnesses. Under the Mangum and Bush Cases, cited by the majority of the court, it is stated that—

"If all possible hypotheses arising from the circumstantial evidence which are favorable to the defendant be presented in concrete statement to the jury, and the jury told that if they believe any one of these hypotheses the defendant should be acquitted, the principle above referred to—i. e., the law relative to circumstantial evidence—would be sufficiently presented."

In the present case all of the hypotheses favorable to the defendant were not presented, and the charge failed to measure up to the rule laid down in the Mangum and Bush Cases.

Without passing upon the other questions raised, I am of the opinion that, for the foregoing reasons, the judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

HENDRIX v. STATE. (No. 10390.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
July 3, 1919.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW §775(2)—INTOXICATING LIQUORS §139 — POSSESSION — ALIBI — CHARGE.

Where one is indicted for having, controlling, and possessing prohibited liquors, and the evidence relied upon to convict is the finding of such liquors in the defendant's residence, it is not necessarily a complete defense to such charge that the defendant was not at his place of residence at the time such liquors were found, and had not been there since the time such liquors were placed in his residence. One may have, control, or possess liquor in violation of law, and at no time be present at the place of storage, or have such liquor in his physical possession. The trial judge, therefore, did not err in failing to charge the law relative to alibi as a defense, especially since the defendant made no request for such a charge.

2. CRIMINAL LAW §823(14), 828 — CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE—CHARGE.

Conceding that the defendant's conviction depended entirely upon circumstantial evidence, the failure of the judge, in the absence of a timely written request, to charge the jury the precise language of section 1010 of the Penal Code, was not error. The judge presented in a concrete statement to the jury the only possible hypothesis arising from the evidence or from the defendant's statement which was consistent with his innocence, and instructed the jury that if they found this hypothesis to be true the defendant should be acquitted. The principle of the law of circumstantial evidence was sufficiently presented by these instructions.

3. CRIMINAL LAW §1178—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—ABANDONMENT OF GROUNDS.

The other special ground of the motion for a new trial, not being insisted upon either in the oral argument or in the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error, will be treated as abandoned.

4. INTOXICATING LIQUORS §236(5)—UNLAWFUL POSSESSION—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence amply authorized the verdict, and the court did not err in refusing to grant a new trial.

Stephens, J., dissenting in part.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; P. W. Meldrim, Judge.

P. M. Hendrix was convicted of unlawfully having, possessing, and controlling spirituous liquors, his motion for a new trial was denied, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Robt. L. Colding, of Savannah, for plaintiff in error.

Walter C. Hartridge, Sol. Gen., of Savannah, for the State.

STEPHENS, J. [1, 3, 4] The opinion of the majority of the court is as follows:

[2] "The second headnote alone needs elaboration. The defendant was tried and convicted of unlawfully having, controlling, and possessing spirituous liquors. The undisputed evidence showed that 188 pints of rye whisky were found in the defendant's private residence. When the whisky was found he was absent, but his wife was present in the house. The defendant and his wife resided in the lower apartment of an apartment house, and the evidence does not disclose that any one else lived there with them. A portion of this whisky was found in five suit cases. There were also three empty suit cases, and the remainder of the whisky was found standing upon the floor of the bathroom and upon the floor between the bathroom and the bedrooms. The whisky was found about 6:45 a. m. on the morning of October 7, 1918. A witness for the state testified that about 5 o'clock on the same morning he saw the defendant unloading upon the front porch of his residence the same suit cases found in the house. It is true that other evidence showed that at that hour the defendant was locked up in the police station. However, the jury were authorized to believe the testimony of that witness, or to believe that he was mistaken as to the time that he saw the defendant unloading the suit cases. But, even if the testimony of this witness be entirely eliminated, the remaining undisputed evidence in the case, as to the finding of 188 pints of whisky in the defendant's private residence, was sufficient to exclude every other reasonable hypothesis save that of the defendant's guilt.

"In this state the husband is recognized by law as the head of his family, and, where he and his wife reside together, the legal presumption is that the house and all the household effects, including any intoxicating liquors, belong to the husband as the head of the family. This presumption, of course, is rebuttable. Young v. State, 22 Ga. App. 111, 95 S. E. 478, and authorities cited. In the instant case there was no attempt, either by the introduction of evidence or by the defendant's statement, to rebut this presumption. It will be borne in mind that the defendant was not charged with or convicted of placing the whisky upon his front porch at 5 o'clock in the morning, or at any other time; he was only charged with, and convicted of, having, controlling, and possessing whisky. Upon the trial the defendant introduced no evidence, and his entire statement was as follows: 'Gentlemen, the statement that Mr. Coleman made is absolutely false. I was not at home at all that night, and know nothing at all about the whisky. Mr. Coleman claims that he saw me unloading the whisky at the house at 5 o'clock, at which time Lieut. Bentley will tell you I was under arrest at the police station. I think Lieut. Evers and Detective Murphy and Mr. Bentley will tell you that they would not believe that man on his oath. I know absolutely nothing about it at all.' Eliminating the evidence of the state's witness Coleman (who testified to seeing the defendant unload the suit cases upon his porch), which was not necessary to convict the defendant (in view of the undisputed evidence as to the finding of the whisky in the defendant's residence), the only contention made in the defendant's statement, besides the immaterial statement that he was not at home that night, was that he knew nothing about the whisky being in his residence. In other words, the only hypothesis favorable to the accused, raised by the evidence and by the defendant's statement, was that he did not have, control, or possess the whisky found in his house. Upon this issue the court charged as follows: 'I charge you that if the proof satisfies you, beyond a reasonable doubt, that this defendant either had or procured or possessed spirituous liquors, or that he procured, commanded, aided, or abetted, or knowingly participated in having, controlling, or possessing spirituous liquors, he would be guilty of the crime charged. On the other hand, if he did not knowingly participate in having it, if he did not aid, or abet, or procure in having it, or if he did not have, control, or possess them, of course he would not be guilty.'

* * * The issue for you to determine in this case is whether this defendant did have, or did he control, or did he possess, spirituous liquors. If, under the rules given you in charge, you come to the conclusion that he did have, or that he did control, or did possess, you should find the defendant guilty. If you do not so believe, it will be equally your duty to find him not guilty.'

"In Mangum v. State, 5 Ga. App. 445, 63 S. E. 543, paragraph 2 of the decision is as follows: 'While in every criminal case, where it is sought to show the guilt of the defendant by circumstantial evidence alone, the jury should be instructed and cautioned that he should not be convicted on circumstantial evidence, unless the proven facts exclude every possible reasonable hypothesis save the guilt of the defendant, still it is immaterial what language is employed to convey this instruction. If all possible hypotheses arising from the circumstantial evidence which are favorable to the defendant be presented in concrete statement to the jury, and the jury are told that if they believe any one of these hypotheses the defendant should be acquitted, the principle above referred to would be sufficiently presented. And where, as in the present case, only two inferences can be drawn from the evidence—the one of innocence, and the other of guilt—and the hypothesis consistent with innocence is fully and fairly stated to the jury, and the jury are instructed that if they are satisfied that the hypothesis consistent with innocence is true, or if they have a reasonable doubt as to its truth, the defendant should be acquitted, the rule above stated is substantially complied with.' See, also, to the same effect, Barrow v. State, 80 Ga. 191, 5 S. E. 64; Richards v. State, 102 Ga. 569, 27 S. E. 726; Jones v. State, 105 Ga. 649, 31 S. E. 574; Bush v. State, 23 Ga. App. 126, 97 S. E. 554; Reynolds v. State, 23 Ga. App. 369, 98 S. E. 246; Davis v. State (No. 10383, June 27, 1919), 99 S. E. 50. In the instant case the court also sufficiently charged upon the presumption of the defendant's innocence, and fully instructed the jury upon the subjects of reasonable doubt, and of the defendant's statement. It is our opinion that the court sufficiently presented in concrete form the sole hypothesis, favorable to the accused, arising from the evidence or from the defendant's statement. Under the undisputed evidence in this case, leaving out entirely the evidence of the witness Coleman, the conviction of the defendant was clearly and convincingly proved, and the charge of the court as to the amount and character of proof requisite to the defendant's conviction was such as to leave no room for doubt that the verdict would have been the same, even if the court had, in the precise terms of the statute, stated to the jury that in order to warrant a verdict of guilty the evidence must not only be consistent with the guilt of the accused, but inconsistent with every other reasonable hypothesis. Toler v. State, 107 Ga. 682, 33 S. E. 629."

Speaking for myself alone, I concur in the first headnote, but dissent from the ruling announced in the second headnote. There is no direct evidence that defendant had, controlled, or possessed any liquors. He had, some time in the nighttime, come in an automobile from the railroad yards, under circumstances that were suspicious. He was seen later unloading from an automobile some suit cases onto the front porch of his residence; but there was no evidence as to the contents of these suit cases. That was necessarily left to inference from other circumstances. A few hours afterwards, and in defendant's absence, some of these identical suit cases were found, filled with intoxicating liquor, in his house. There is no direct proof that he knew of the presence of the liquor in his house, nor as to when it was placed there. It is only an inference, from the circumstance that it was his home, that he brought the liquor and deposited it there a few hours before it was found there in the suit cases which he had been seen unloading from the automobile. There is no direct proof that the suit cases, when they were unloaded, contained any liquor. This can only be inferred from the circumstances under which the car came from the railroad yards, and the finding of the liquor a few hours afterwards in the suit cases, after they had been deposited by the defendant himself upon the porch of his house. The conviction of the defendant, therefore, necessarily depended entirely upon circumstantial evidence (Lewis v. State, 6 Ga. App. 205, 64 S. E. 701), and unless the trial judge charged the law relative to the degree of proof necessary to convict upon such evidence, whether requested to do so or not, the conviction should be set aside (Harden v. State, 13 Ga. App. 34, 78 S. E. 681), unless it can be brought within the doctrine of Barrow v. State, 80 Ga. 191, 5 S. E. 64, and the authorities following it, relied upon by my colleagues in the majority opinion. I do not think that this doctrine is applicable here. See my views expressed in my dissenting opinions in Reynolds v. State, 23 Ga. App. 369, 98 S. E. 246, and Davis v. State, 24 Ga. App. —, 100 S. E. 50. The doctrine of the Barrow Case, and the authorities following it, applies only when the guilt of the accused, dependent upon circumstantial evidence, "is clearly and convincingly proved, and the charge as to the amount and character of proof requisite to a lawful conviction is such as to leave no room for doubt that the verdict would have been the same, even if the court had in terms stated to the jury that, in order to warrant a verdict of guilty, the evidence must not only be consistent with the guilt of the accused, but inconsistent with every other reasonable hypothesis." (Italics mine.) Toler v. State, 107 Ga. 682, 33 S. E. 629. It seems that where guilt is well established by circumstantial evidence, and it is apparent that another trial would not produce a different result, a charge which fully and liberally instructs the jury as to reasonable doubt and presumption of innocence fully measures up to the doctrine of the Barrow Case, supra, and the authorities following it.

As I understand it, the charge of the court now under consideration does not, in view of the facts of the case, measure up to the standard laid down by these authorities and relied upon by the majority of this court. While the evidence, taken most strongly against the defendant and in favor of the state, points rather strongly towards the defendant's guilt, yet, in view of the impeaching testimony and the defendant's contention that it is a case of mistaken identity, it cannot with certainty be said to "clearly and convincingly" prove the defendant's guilt (Toler Case, supra), or to "clearly show the guilt of the accused" (Richards Case, supra). See, also, Jones v. State, supra. Nor did the judge charge the jury that the defendant entered the trial with the presumption of innocence in his favor, and that this presumption remained until the state rebutted it by proof, and that if the state failed to do so he should be acquitted. Barrow Case, supra. The only reference made by the trial judge to the presumption of innocence was in these words:

"Every person accused of crime is presumed to be innocent until guilt is proven beyond a reasonable doubt."

This language was not as full and as ample as Georgia judges are accustomed to use in this connection, and did not measure up to the well-recognized legal standard. Reddick v. State, 11 Ga. App. 150, 74 S. E. 901; Coffin v. United States, 156 U. S. 432, 15 Sup. Ct. 394, 39 L. Ed. 481. It made no reference to a presumption of innocence remaining with the defendant throughout the entire trial. While I am not prepared to say that this omission should work a reversal of the judgment if properly excepted to, yet it certainly was not a very liberal and full instruction upon the law of presumption of innocence, and can hardly compensate for the trial judge's omission to specifically charge the law relative to the degree of proof necessary to convict upon circumstantial evidence.

In the Bush Case, cited and relied upon in the majority opinion, it is held:

"While in every criminal case, where it is sought to show the guilt of the defendant by circumstantial evidence alone, the jury should be instructed and cautioned that he should not be convicted on circumstantial evidence, unless the proven facts exclude every possible reasonable hypothesis save the guilt of the defendant, still it is immaterial what language is employed to convey this instruction, if all possible hypotheses arising from the circumstantial evidence which are favorable to the defendant be presented in concrete statement to the jury, and the jury are told that if they believe any one of these hypotheses the defendant should be acquitted. This rule is substantially complied with where, as in the present case, only two inferences can be drawn from the evidence, the one of innocence and the other of guilt, and the hypothesis consistent with innocence is fully and fairly stated to the jury, and the jury are instructed that if they are satisfied that the hypothesis consistent with innocence is true, or if they have a reasonable doubt as to its truth, the defendant should be acquitted."

The ruling in Reynolds v. State, supra, was to the same effect. If the rule here stated by the Court of Appeals is in conflict with the rule laid down by the Supreme Court in the authorities cited by the majority of this court, it, of course, must yield to the higher authority. Be that as it may, the charge falls also to measure up to the standard laid down in the Mangum and Bush Cases, since "all the hypotheses arising from the circumstantial evidence which are favorable to the defendant" were not "presented in concrete statement to the jury." Several of the hypotheses favorable to the defendant's innocence were not presented in any form to the jury. It was an hypothesis consistent with innocence that the suit cases, when unloaded on defendant's porch, did not contain liquor. It was an hypothesis consistent with innocence that the defendant was not the person seen unloading the suit cases from the automobile. The defendant stated that he had not been at home that night. According to the police officer's testimony, the defendant was arrested prior to the time that the state's main witness testified that he saw the defendant unloading the suit cases, and must have been in jail at the time. It was an hypothesis consistent with innocence that the state's main witness did not speak the truth when he stated the time at which he saw defendant unloading the suit cases, this testimony having been contradicted by another witness, the police officer. It was an hypothesis consistent with innocence that the defendant, by reason of his absence from home, had no knowledge of the presence of liquor in his house. None of these hypotheses were specifically called to the jury's attention. The law as to impeachment of witnesses was not charged. It being undisputed that the defendant was absent from home when the liquor was discovered there, it was absolutely essential to his guilt, predicated upon the fact that the liquor was found at his house, that he knew of its presence, and allowed it or caused it to be there, or to remain there after becoming aware that it was in his house. Nowhere did the judge charge that such guilty knowledge was essential to defendant's conviction. For these reasons I do not, after consideration of all the authorities, believe that the charge of the court, as applied to this case, measured up to the standard laid down in the authorities supra, which hold that the law relative to the degree of proof necessary to convict under circumstantial evidence was substantially given in charge.

I take it that, from all the authorities, the true rule is that, where a conviction depends entirely upon circumstantial evidence, the trial judge should, whether requested or not, give in charge to the jury the law relative to the degree of proof necessary to convict in such cases, viz.:

"To warrant a conviction on circumstantial evidence, the proved facts must not only be consistent with the hypothesis of guilt, but must exclude every other reasonable hypothesis save that of the guilt of the accused." Penal Code, § 1010.

But, where the judge fails to so charge, "such failure will not require another trial, when the guilt of the accused is clearly and convincingly proved, and the charge as to the amount and character of proof requisite to a lawful conviction is such as to leave no room for doubt that the verdict would have been the same, even if the court had in terms stated to the jury that, in order to warrant a verdict of guilty, the evidence must not only be consistent with the guilt of the accused, but inconsistent with every other reasonable hypothesis" (Toler v. State, supra); "such amount and character of proof" being outlined to the jury in ample instructions as to presumption of innocence, reasonable doubt, defendant's statement, etc. (Barrow Case, supra); or, irrespective of the strength of the testimony tending towards conviction, the law relative to conviction upon circumstantial evidence is sufficiently stated to the jury when their attention is sufficiently called to all issues made by the evidence and the law relative thereto is submitted in charge, and when every possible reasonable hypothesis of innocence deducible from the evidence is submitted in "concrete statement" to the jury, a total aggregate of single instances being equivalent to the whole. This rule is based upon the doctrine of harmless error and substantial compliance. Harmless error is often dangerous doctrine, and substantial compliance is often bad law. These exceptions to the general rule should be cautiously applied.

For the above reasons, and without passing upon the other assignments of error, I think the conviction should be set aside and a new trial granted.

Judgment affirmed.

(112 S. C. 234)

SAVANNAH GUANO CO. v. FOGLE.
(No. 10250.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 15, 1919.)

1. TRIAL §59(1)—INTRODUCTION OF WRITTEN INSTRUMENT—ORDER OF PROOF.

Where defendant set up an instrument in his answer as a basis of counterclaim, plaintiff had the right to introduce it in anticipation of the defense, without recognizing it as a binding contract, to show that defendant had acknowledged in writing that such instrument was not to be a binding contract until approved by an executive officer of the plaintiff corporation, and that there had been no contract growing out of previous communications between the parties.

2. EVIDENCE §441(1) — PAROL — ADMISSIBILITY.

Where defendant set up an instrument in his answer as a basis of a counterclaim which contained a provision that it would not be a binding contract until approved by executive officer of plaintiff, and that there had not been a contract growing out of previous communications between the parties, and, upon proof that such contract had not been approved, undertook to shift his ground and prove a previous oral contract, testimony as to the previous oral contract was incompetent on the ground that the defendant had admitted that previous negotiations were merged in the proposed contract.

3. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT §119(2) — AUTHORITY OF AGENT—BURDEN OF PROOF.

The burden was on customer of a guano company to prove that a sales agent of the company was authorized to agree that the company would sell fertilizer to the customer if he would pay what money he could on note then due on fertilizer sold him the previous year, and that the company would carry the balance of the indebtedness for the prior year.

4. SALES §19, 20—CONSIDERATION.

Payment of a part of an existing debt for fertilizer previously bought was no consideration for a contract to sell the debtor more fertilizer.

5. CONTRACTS §25 — AGREEMENT TO MAKE CONTRACT IN FUTURE.

A party is not liable in damages for refusing to make a contract, even though he has promised to do so, when the terms of the contract have not been agreed upon.

Gary, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Orangeburg County; W. H. Townsend, Judge.

Action by the Savannah Guano Company against B. T. Fogle. Judgment for plaintiff and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Moss & Lide, of Orangeburg, and John F. Williams, of Aiken, for appellant.

E. B. Friday, of North, and Raysor & Summers, of Orangeburg, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. The Chief Justice is mistaken in saying that plaintiff put in evidence the instrument which was relied upon by defendant as the basis of his counterclaim. The record shows that plaintiff introduced only the notes sued on. While the instrument was in plaintiff's possession, as explained in the opinion of the Chief Justice, and was carried to court and produced by plaintiff, the record shows that nothing was said about it until it was brought out on cross-examination of plaintiff's witnesses, and it appears in the record under the head of "Defendant's Exhibits."

[1-3] However, it is of no consequence whether it was put in evidence by plaintiff or defendant. For when defendant set up that instrument in his answer, as the basis of his counterclaim, plaintiff had the right to introduce it, in anticipation of the defense (however doubtful might be the policy of undertaking to disprove an adversary's case, in advance of his making out a prima facie case), without recognizing it as a binding contract, but merely to show that defendant had acknowledged in writing that it was not to be a binding contract until approved by an executive officer of the company, and that there had been no contract growing out of the previous communications, oral or written, between the parties. Subsequent events showed the wisdom of inserting that provision, for, although defendant sets it up as the basis of his counterclaim, when it became perfectly clear that it had not been approved by an executive officer of the company and defendant had been promptly notified, as he was, that it would not be approved, and was not, therefore, a contract, defendant undertook to shift his ground and prove a previous oral contract, and that is the testimony to which plaintiff's attorney (Mr. Friday) objected. The testimony was admitted, though it was subsequently ruled incompetent, on the ground that defendant had admitted that all previous negotiations were merged in the proposed contract, and therefore there was no other contract for the breach of which plaintiff was liable. That ruling was correct. But even if it should be conceded that defendant's testimony was competent to prove a previous contract, which was not merged in the written proposals. It utterly fails to prove one. He says nothing more than that Mr. Condon, plaintiff's sales agent, told him in March that, if he would pay what money he could on the notes then due for the fertilizer sold him in 1914, he would sell him fertilizer for 1915, and carry the balance of the 1914 indebtedness, and that he promised to come back in a week or ten days and take his order for the fertilizer for 1915, but never did so. Was that a contract? Certainly not.

In the first place, though it appears that Mr. Condon was only a sales agent, there was not a particle of testimony tending to prove that he had any authority to make such an agreement, and clearly the burden was upon defendant to prove that he had such authority.

[4] Second, there was no consideration for it. Payment of a part of an existing debt then due was no consideration for the alleged contract, for in making the payment defendant did only what he was bound in morals and in law to do. He had no legal or moral right by withholding payment to attempt to coerce plaintiff into financing his speculation in holding his cotton for a better price. Plaintiff had furnished him the fertilizer to make the cotton, and it was his duty to pay the debt, when it became due, without regard to the price of cotton.

[5] Third, defendant's own testimony shows that there was no contract, but only a promise to make one. Can a party be mulcted in damages for refusing to make a contract, even though he has promised to do it, when the terms of the contract have not been agreed upon? Until the terms have been agreed upon, there can be no contract. Here no terms were specified or agreed to. The parties had not agreed as to the quantity of fertilizers to be furnished, the brand or quality, the price thereof, the time within which it should be furnished, or the time of payment, or the security to be given. Not a single element of a valid contract was proved.

Fourth, if all the necessary elements of such a contract had been proved, it would have been obnoxious to the statute of frauds, which says:

"No contract for the sale of any goods, wares and merchandise for the price of fifty dollars or upwards shall be allowed to be good except the buyer shall accept part of the goods so sold and actually receive the same, or give something in earnest to bind the bargain, or in part payment, or that some note or memorandum in writing of the said bargain be made and signed by the parties to be charged by such contract, or their agents thereto lawfully authorized."

It follows that the judgment is right, and ought to be affirmed.
Judgment affirmed.

WATTS, FRASER, and GAGE, JJ., concur.

GARY, C. J. (dissenting). This is an action upon two promissory notes. The defendant set up a counterclaim for damages alleged to have been sustained on account of the failure of the plaintiff to furnish certain fertilizers in accordance with the terms of the contract between the said parties. The appeal is from an order directing a verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff introduced in evidence the following instrument of writing:

"7. This contract, to be binding upon us, must be approved by one of the executive officers of this company. All previous communications between us, either written or verbal, with reference to the subject-matter of this contract, are hereby abrogated, and no statements or representations on your part, or of any agent of yours, or of any agent of ours, nor any modification of this agreement, shall be binding upon us, or either of us, unless the same shall be in writing duly accepted by you and approved by an executive officer of this company.

"For own use—You are to give us a security for the payment of this fertilizer, and also as security for the payment of your two notes, dated April 7, 1915, for $196.50, due Sept. 15, 1915, and Oct. 1, 1915, for $196.89, which are renewals of my 1914 notes, a lien on your crop of cotton and cotton seed to be planted by you on 50 acres of land, Goodland township, Orangeburg county, S. C., belonging to D. A. Thaxton and known as the Brodie place; this lien being subject to rental of $100.00. Yours truly, Savannah Guano Co. [in print], per J. J. Conlon.

"Approved:

"To B. T. Fogle, Springfield, S. C.

"Savannah Guano Company, Savannah, Ga.

"I accept your contract on the terms set forth in the foregoing. [The above in duplicate.]

"B. T. Fogle."

When the said instrument was offered in evidence by the plaintiff, the name of B. T. Fogle was not on it, as this signature had been cut off by the plaintiff and returned to him, but the plaintiff kept the agreement.

The following is the testimony of the defendant B. T. Fogle, also the rulings of his honor the presiding judge:

"I operated a farm during 1914 and 1915 of about five horses, and bought fertilizer during the former year from the respondent, through his salesman Mr. Conlon; my entire transaction being with him, having given him my order, and the respondent having shipped the goods. I gave him a note for 1914. I made plenty of cotton, but could not get any sale for it, selling a few bales at 5 and 6 cents a pound. I tried to give him cotton for my account, but he refused it and came to see me, towards the end of the year. I had the cotton in the warehouse, and he told me that, if I would pay him what money I could from the sale of my cotton, he would sell me fertilizer for 1915 and carry the balance of my 1914 account. This arrangement was made before I paid him any money. Pursuant to this, and relying upon it, I paid him $280 or $240.

"Q. What was your arrangement with Mr. Conlon at that time? A. I told Mr. Conlon that I would not be able to pay him the whole amount, but that I was going to pay him what I could, and he said to pay him what I could and he would carry the rest over, and furnish me fertilizer the next year.

"Mr. Friday. We object; I don't think that would be competent, unless he shows Mr. Conlon's connection with the company, and that he had authority to make these arrangements.

"The Court. He has shown that Mr. Conlon is a salesman.

"Mr. Friday. He is testifying here to an oral contract.

"Mr. Lide. Mr. Conlon was the only agent that he knew as representing the company. The question of agency would be a question for the jury.

"The Court. I think that question might be a question for the jury. The contract that you put in about the sale of fertilizer is a contract in writing.

"Mr. Summers. That is a contract in writing between the parties and would be competent.

"Q. When was this conversation with Mr. Conlon? A. That was in March.

"The Court. It seems to me that, when this agreement was reduced to writing, that would be the contract.

"Mr. Lide. The witness testified that he told Mr. Conlon that he would raise all the money that he could, and Mr. Conlon then said that he would let him have the fertilizer.

"The Court. I think that the contract was reduced to writing, and that is the only thing to be considered here. In that view the testimony would have to be excluded as incompetent. He says that this was in March before the written agreement, and all these agreements were done away with by the written contract.

"Mr. Lide. The point that we wanted to get at was that this April contract was the result of this agreement that they had in March.
* * *

"The Court. Whatever agreement they had was done away with and merged in this written contract. * * *

"Mr. Williams. We want to show that he told him that he would sell him the fertilizer.

"The Court. I think that might tend to contradict the terms of the written contract."

At the conclusion of the testimony, his honor the presiding judge said:

"Mr. Foreman and gentlemen of the jury, a motion has been made in this case asking the court to direct a verdict on the ground that there are no issues of fact in the case which you are to pass upon. Under the view that I take of the testimony and evidence which has been introduced, there is only one conclusion to be drawn from the testimony as to the amount due by the defendant to the plaintiff upon the notes sued upon and the amount sued upon in these two notes is $537.52. The right of the defendant to recover upon his counterclaim depends upon the construction placed by the court upon the written contract or order for sale of fertilizer dated April 13, 1915, and, under the view that I take of the case and of this contract, it is necessary for the defendant to show that this written order or contract was approved by one of the executive officers of the company before the defendant can recover upon his counterclaim. I find no testimony in the case tending to show that this contract or order of April 13, 1915, was ever approved by any executive officer of the plaintiff company, and I therefore direct you to find a verdict for the plaintiff for the sum of $522.13."

The defendant appealed upon the following exceptions:

First. "His honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in ruling that conversations and negotiations leading up to the giving of the order for the fertilizer were inadmissible; whereas he should have held that they were not contradictory, and that they were pertinent, especially when the answer pleaded that the entire scheme on the part of the agents and representatives of the plaintiff was advised, for the purpose achieved, knowingly, and that such conduct was negligent, willful, and fraudulent, the cause of action presented in the counterclaim being not only for the failure to furnish the fertilizer, but based upon representations of the plaintiff's agents that the fertilizer would be furnished, the defendant was misled to his injury, appellant having contracted with the agent within the apparent scope of his authority for the fertilizer."

Second. "His honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in holding that the oral contract merged into the written application, and that the oral agreement could not be established; whereas he should have held that the question of the oral agreement and the misrepresentation and deception as to the entire transaction were questions for the jury, and should have been submitted."

Third. "His honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in directing a verdict on the ground that there was no testimony for the jury; whereas he should have submitted the case to the jury, and allowed them to pass upon the issues raised by the pleadings, especially so when the testimony developed the issues of waiver, fraud, and agency."

Mr. Friday, the plaintiff's attorney, interposed the following objection to the testimony of the plaintiff:

"We object. I don't think that would be competent unless he shows Mr. Conlon's connection with the company, and that he had authority to make these arrangements."

His honor the circuit judge did not sustain this objection, but excluded the testimony on the ground that whatever previous agreement the parties may have had was done away with and merged in the written contract. The written contract was introduced in evidence by the plaintiff, who made use of it for the purpose of destroying the previous agreement between the parties. The plaintiff thus recognized it as a binding and existing contract, thus enabling the defendant also to rely upon those provisions that conferred rights upon him. After the contract had subserved the plaintiff's purpose, the plaintiff could not change front and ask for a nonsuit, on the ground that it had not approved the contract, and that it was therefore a nullity.

When his honor the circuit judge reached the conclusion that the contract was without force and effect, the defendant had the right to rely upon the previous agreement unless there was some other objection to it.

For these reasons, I dissent.

STATE v. LESESNE et al. (No. 10243.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 15, 1919.)

1. ASSAULT AND BATTERY  $\S$ 91 — COMMON DESIGN—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence that four defendants all attempted to escape when officers endeavored to arrest them for gambling, etc., held to sustain jury finding that defendants had formed a common design to escape before time one of their number committed an assault and battery on one of the officers.

2. CRIMINAL LAW  $\S$ 829(1)—REQUESTED INSTRUCTIONS.

Refusal of a requested instruction which was only a corollary of a proposition already charged, and which the court stated he thought was covered by other portions of his charge, held not reversible error.

Hydrick, J., dissenting.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Sumter County; Thos. S. Sease, Judge.

Ben Lesesne, Mat Hannibal, John Richardson, and Cunningham White were convicted of assault and battery, and appeal. Appeal dismissed.

The following facts are set forth in the record:

The defendants, Ben Lesesne, Mat Hannibal, John Richardson, and Cunningham White were jointly indicted with one Harrison Price for assault and battery of a high and aggravated nature. On the night on which the indictment charges the crime was committed the five defendants named in the indictment were playing "skin," a negro card game, at the home of Harrison Prince, a few miles from Mayesville, in Sumter county. Three officers and three assistants raided the game. At the inception of the raid the light in the house was extinguished. All the occupants of the house were taken. The woman was not placed under arrest. It was then discovered that one of the officers, Mr. H. A. Boykin, had received a wound on the head, which the state charged was inflicted by a frying pan in the hands of the defendants. There was no evidence tending to establish who, if any one, struck Mr. Boykin. The frying pan was found on the floor near Mr. Boykin with a piece broken out, but witnesses for the state testified that the break was an old one.

The house was surrounded. Mr. H. A. Boykin testified that he went to the front door; that a negro woman was sitting in the front door, and as he walked up the front step, they all made a break and ran; that he didn't know who broke first, but that the woman was sitting near him, and she blew the light out; that he ran in and caught hold of two negroes; that he was struck, but that he could not say whether by one of his captives. He testified:

"A. One of them hit me in the head with a pan, iron of some kind, a frying pan, and knocked me unconscious. Q. Could you tell whether one of the two negroes that you had your hand on? A. No, sir; I could not. Q. Was it in the dark? A. Yes, sir. Had a small fire in the fireplace, and he was standing between me and the fire, and when he hit me, he stooped down and picked it up by the fire."

Another officer, Mr. Bradley, testified that he met one negro at the door on the opposite side of the house and seized him; and that he caused a light to be made, and found one negro up on the wall at the side of the house, and another hid in the corner.

The defendants pleaded guilty in the magistrate's court at Mayesville to the charge of gambling, and four of them paid each a fine of $30 and one $20. Prior to the trial under the indictment in this action one of the defendants, Harrison Prince, pleaded guilty, and was sentenced to pay a fine of $100 or serve three months at hard labor. The remaining four defendants, the respondents herein, entered pleas of not guilty, and the four being tried jointly, upon a verdict of guilty (their motion for new trial upon the grounds appearing in the exceptions being overruled) were sentenced each to pay a fine of $200 or serve six months at hard labor. From this sentence all within due time gave notice of appeal.

At the close of the evidence for the state the defendants moved for a direction of verdict upon the grounds appearing in the exceptions. The motion was overruled.

All four of the defendants were sworn as witnesses. At the close of all the evidence the motion for direction of verdict was renewed upon the same grounds, and was again overruled.

His honor was requested to charge the jury as set forth in the exceptions. Whereupon he charged the jury in the language also set forth in the exceptions.

In his general charge his honor charged the following propositions:

"If you find that another person on that occasion did commit the assault and battery, and you find that one or more or all of these four defendants aided and abetted another person giving assistance in the assault and battery, then they would be as guilty as the person who did it, whether the person is on trial at this term or not. If it has been proven beyond a reasonable doubt to you that these defendants acted in concert amongst themselves and in pursuance of a common design previously entered into to commit the offense alleged in the indictment, then all would be guilty."

The motion for new trial was made upon the grounds set forth in the exceptions, and was overruled.

The appellant's attorneys submitted that his honor, the circuit judge, erred in the following particulars:

I. In overruling appellants' motion for direction of verdict made upon the following grounds: That the defendants were jointly indicted as principals, and that there was no proof: (1) That any particular one of them committed the crime; or (2) that the crime was committed in the pursuance of any joint or common enterprise or undertaking.

II. In refusing to charge at the request of the defendants: "Is there anything further you wanted charged?"

"Mr. McLemore: I think we would be entitled to have them charged that, even where they might have been found to have been in a common undertaking or design, if any one or more of the defendants originally before the court departed from the common design or undertaking or enterprise, and formed his own independent design, and in pursuance of that independent design he did it, he alone would be responsible for his act.

"Court: I think that is covered by this proposition, Mr. McLemore, that is, if the offense alleged to have been committed started before the officers got there, being a misdemeanor and not a felony, the common design or common undertaking or enterprise that I have instructed about is directed solely to the proposition contained in this indictment, to wit, assault and battery. Take the record."

And if the language of his honor be considered a modification of the defendants' request, then it was error so to modify the request.

III. In overruling motion for new trial made upon the following grounds: (1) There is no evidence that the act charged in the indictment was committed by the defendants, or any of them. (2) There is no evidence that the act charged in the indictment was committed by the defendants, or any of them, or by any other person then and there present, in pursuance of any common undertaking or design entered into by them. (3) The defendants, it is respectfully submitted, were entitled to have the jury charged that if the defendants engaged in a common undertaking or design, and thereafter any one of them departed from the common plan, and in pursuance of his own design committed the act charged, then only such one so committing the act would be guilty thereof.

Lucian W. McLemore, of Sumter, for appellants.

Frank A. McLeod, Solicitor, of Sumter, for the State.

GARY, C. J. [1] Practically there are but two questions presented by the exceptions, the first of which is whether there was any testimony from which a reasonable inference could be drawn by the jury that there was a common design on the part of the defendants to make their escape prior to the time when the assault and battery was committed.

It may be stated as a general proposition that, if parties are engaged at night in the commission of an unlawful enterprise common to them all, they will endeavor to escape arrest, provided there are reasonable grounds for supposing that their attempt may be successful. In such cases, the attempt to escape arrest may be regarded as incidental to the commission of the common and unlawful design.

In the case under consideration, however, there are facts from which a reasonable inference may be drawn that the defendants planned, before the officers appeared, to make their escape, in case of an attempted arrest. A negro woman was sitting at the front door apparently on guard, for she blew out the light. When the officer walked up the front step, all the defendants made a break and ran. The unanimity with which the defendants attempted to make their escape indicated either that they were obeying the impulse natural to them, or that they had planned to escape, before the arrests could be made by the officers.

The exceptions raising this question are overruled.

[2] The next question is whether his honor, the presiding judge, charged the jury as requested by the appellants' attorney. This question is raised by the second exception. His honor, the presiding judge, certainly did not, in express terms, refuse to charge the request. On the contrary, he stated that he thought it was covered by other parts of his charge. Furthermore, the request was but a corollary of the proposition, which he had already charged.

Appeal dismissed.

WATTS, FRASER, and GAGE, JJ., concur.

HYDRICK, J. (dissenting). I agree with the Chief Justice that the evidence is sufficient to warrant a reasonable inference that appellants were guilty of conspiracy to gamble and to avoid arrest by flight, if the officers of the law should come upon them while gambling. But that is not the issue to be decided. They were not indicted for a conspiracy to avoid arrest, if, indeed, that is indictable, but for assault and battery. The real issue, therefore, is whether proof of facts and circumstances which warrant an inference of a common design to avoid arrest for gambling by flight is sufficient to warrant the further inference of a common design to commit an assault and battery upon an officer who might attempt to arrest them; for upon that theory alone they were convicted, since there is no evidence that either of them aided, abetted, or encouraged the one who actually committed the assault and battery, who was, no doubt, the one that pleaded guilty. The question, therefore, is, Can a conspiracy to commit an assault and battery be legally inferred from proof of a common purpose to avoid arrest by flight? I think it clear, on reason and authority, that it cannot. Bishop in his work on Criminal Law (section 634, vol. 1) says:

"Even where persons are unlawfully together, and by concurrent understanding are in the actual perpetration of some crime, if one of them of his sole volition, and not in pursuance of the main purpose, does a criminal thing in no way connected with what was mutually contemplated, he only is liable. Thus if, in England, poachers join in an attack on the gamekeeper, and leave him senseless, then, if one of them returns and steals his money, this one alone can be convicted of the robbery. So, if two have committed a larceny together, and one suddenly wounds an officer attempting to arrest both, the other one cannot be convicted of this wounding, unless the two had conspired, not only to steal, but to resist, also, with extreme violence any who might attempt to apprehend them."

Again:

"Sec. 635. If several are out committing a felony, and, on alarm, run different ways, and one to avoid being taken maims a pursuer, the others are not guilty parties in the mayhem."

At section 637, he says:

"If two combine to fight a third with fists, and death accidentally results from a blow inflicted by one, the other also is responsible for the homicide. But if the one resorts to a deadly weapon without the other's knowledge or consent, he only is then liable."

In People v. Knapp, 26 Mich. 112, Knapp was charged with the murder of a young woman on the following facts: He with several others carried deceased into a house owned by Knapp for immoral purposes. While there, she either fell or was thrown from a window, and sustained injuries from which she died. There was no testimony that Knapp himself did the act, and he was convicted on the theory that he was responsible for the conduct of those who did it. The trial court charged the jury that, if defendants combined for the purpose of inducing the deceased to go into the house for immoral purposes, and, while there, in order to avoid arrest or exposure, threw her out of the window, without intending to kill her, it would be manslaughter, because they were engaged in an act against public morals, and unlawful; and refused to charge that, if the act was done, under the circumstances stated without the concurrence of Knapp, he should not be convicted; and, also refused to charge that if the parties attempted to escape, and one of them, without the knowledge or consent of the others, helped or threw deceased out of the window, then only the one who actually did the act is responsible. Upon this evidence and charge Knapp was convicted of manslaughter. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed the conviction saying:

"The effect of these rulings was practically to hold that parties who have combined in a wrong purpose must be presumed, not only to combine in some way in escaping arrest, but also to be so far bound to each other as to be responsible severally for every act done by any of them during the escape.

"It is impossible to maintain such a doctrine. It is undoubtedly possible for parties to combine in order to make an escape effectual, but no such agreement can lawfully be inferred from a combination to do the original wrong. There can be no criminal responsibility for anything not fairly within the common enterprise, and which might be expected to happen if occasion should arise for any one to do it. In other words, the principle is quite analogous to that of agency, where the liability is measured by the express or implied authority. And the authorities are quite clear, and reasonable, which deny any liability for acts done in escaping which were not within any joint purpose or combination. Rex v. Collison, 4 C. & P. 565; Reg. v. Howell, 9 C. & P. 437; Rex v. White, R. & R. 99; 1 Bishop's Cr. L. (5th Ed.) §§ 633-642."

If appellants were lawfully convicted upon the evidence adduced, the necessary logical result is that, if the officer had been killed, appellants could have been convicted of murder. Would this court sustain a conviction of murder upon such evidence? If not, the judgment should be reversed.

CARLSBAD MFG. CO. et al. v. KELLEY et al. (No. 3593.)(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 13, 1919. Rehearing Denied Sept. 17,
1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES ⇨271(3), 278
(1)—RELATIONSHIP OF PARTIES—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Generally the burden of proof rests on him who charges fraud, and not on him whose conduct is charged to be fraudulent. But where the transaction alleged to be fraudulent is between persons whose relationship by blood or marriage is so intimate as fairly to create the presumption of their susceptibility to influences prompting favoritism by the one towards the other, the burden of establishing freedom from fraud as against creditors shifts to him who is charged therewith.

2. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES ⇨104(3), 277
(3)—HUSBAND AND WIFE—TITLE IN NAME OF WIFE—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where property is alleged to have been purchased by a wife during coverture, the burden is upon her to prove distinctly that she paid therefor with means not derived from her husband; and, in the absence of clear proof to that effect, the presumption is that it was acquired with his means and it is liable for his debts. But if she furnish evidence clearly showing that it was not acquired with her husband's means, it will not be liable for his debts.

3. EQUITY ⇨41—CONTRACTS BETWEEN HUSBAND AND WIFE—EMPLOYMENT OF HUSBAND.

The marital relation does not prevent the employment of the husband by the wife, upon a reasonable monthly salary, to assist in the management of a store which is her own separate property. But equity does not permit such an agreement or arrangement between them, when fraudulent, to operate to the prejudice of the creditors of either or both of them.

4. EQUITY ⇨46—JURISDICTION.

Generally, where a court of equity has once obtained jurisdiction of a cause, it will retain it for all purposes and administer complete relief. But in order to authorize relief obtainable in an action at law, some substantial ground must exist to confer equitable jurisdiction, and, if the pleadings or proof fail to establish a basis for such relief, a court of equity is without jurisdiction to award other relief by way of recovery upon a purely legal demand, unless it appears that the remedy at law is inadequate.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Bill by the Carlsbad Manufacturing Company and others against J. M. Kelley and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

James A. Bent and E. A. Bowers, both of Elkins, for appellants.

Samuel T. Spears, of Elkins, for appellees.

LYNCH, J. The object sought by plaintiffs' original and amended bills and the petitions filed during the pendency of the cause was to set aside and annul as fraudulent certain transfers by the defendant Clarence Kelley of a stock of merchandise owned by him in 1908, and by him sold in bulk to John R. Crickard November 14th of the same year, and by Crickard to W. L. Snyder about nine months thereafter, and by Snyder to J. M. Kelley, the wife of Clarence, December 4, 1909, and a deed by Anna Swecker and E. E. Simmons conveying to J. M. Kelley a lot located at Valley Head, Randolph county, and one or two other lots or parcels of land sold but not conveyed to her by Mary and Harman Conrad at the same place, and to subject to sale the merchandise and lots, and apply the proceeds to the satisfaction of the debts of Clarence Kelley. The right to this relief the decree complained of upon this appeal by plaintiffs denied, and dismissed the bills, and with them the petitions.

Logically the first question presented for decision is whether the sale and transfer of the stock of merchandise to Crickard was fraudulent and void as to the creditors of Clarence Kelley. Whatever may have been his purpose and intention does not matter unless Crickard had knowledge or notice of such purpose and intention at the time of the transfer, or notice or knowledge of such facts and circumstances respecting it as would then indicate a wrongful intention on the part of Kelley towards his creditors. Respecting this intention, as later developed and made clear beyond question as regards the object of the sale and its effect upon the creditors, and the competency of Kelley to disregard his legal and moral obligation to them, there is no room to doubt, and hence it is unnecessary to attempt to relate in detail what he subsequently did to protect some of them, and failed to do to protect others whose claims were equally just and meritorious. This conduct on his part is not important or significant unless, as we have said, Crickard knew or wrongfully failed to ascertain the true status of the affairs of Kelley at the date of the transaction as regards the sale and transfer of the merchandise. The Bulk Sales Act of this state had not then been enacted. It was not passed and did not become effective until the year 1909. Section 3a, c. 74, Code (sec. 3832). Nothing concerning or chargeable to these transfers by Crickard to Snyder and Snyder to Mrs. Kelley appears in any manner warranting recourse to its provisions, except the $900 note executed by Snyder to Crickard, and it is involved only indirectly in this controversy. And unless it appears that the transfers were made otherwise than upon the payment of or agreement to pay a valuable consideration, and that the purchaser had notice of the fraudulent intent of his immediate grantor, nothing in that chapter, except the section respecting sales of merchandise in bulk in disregard of its provisions, can affect the title of such purchaser, according to section 1 of that chapter (sec. 3829).

This is the second suit involving the same transaction, in each of which the sales and transfers to Crickard, Snyder, and Mrs. Kelley were assailed as fraudulent, and to which the purchasers were parties, except that Crickard was brought in not by the original, but by the amended, bill filed in this suit, and in each of them he filed an elaborate and unequivocal answer, specifically and serially denying every allegation made therein in any wise affecting the bona fides of his connection with the acquisition of the property, his intent and purpose in acquiring it, and his lack of knowledge of any fraudulent design of Clarence Kelley. And in each case the court held valid and unimpeachable Crickard's purchase of the property. Although he did not testify as a witness in his own behalf or at all, notwithstanding the general replication to his answer, it was not necessary that he should do so, because no witness called by any other party to the suit spoke or was asked to speak a word tending in any degree to impeach the validity of the transfer to him, or in derogation of his business or financial ability, character, or integrity. The charges in any wise reflecting on him—and to sustain them no proof of any consequence was offered—are first, an obscure and virtually meaningless allegation in the pleadings that he had seen the ups and downs of the mercantile business at Valley Head; and, second, an alleged inadequacy of price, evidenced by the payment of $4,500 for merchandise said to have been worth between $8,000 and $9,000, but the original cost of which was not proved to have been more than $6,000, and from each of which unsustained charges we are asked to assume his participation in a scheme or design to defraud creditors. But granting the sufficiency and materiality of the charge respecting his previous business failures, Crickard, while confessing the misfortune, attributable, he says, to lack of experience, subsequently, according to the specific declarations of his answer, satisfied and discharged every liability so incurred. And as to the second charge, we cannot assume as inadequate the consideration paid for goods whose original cost the proof shows not to be in excess of $6,000, the difference between them being explained by him as due to an allowance for depreciation and deterioration of the stock.

be fraudulent, rests the burden of proof. 6 Michie, Enc. Dig. 659. Well-recognized exceptions to the general rule exist, it is true, in certain cases, as where the parties to a transaction charged to be fraudulent are susceptible of influence through sinister motives, as in dealings between kindred or persons standing in confidential relations to one another. But no such relationship or connection or sinister motives or invalidity due thereto appear anywhere in this case as regards Crickard. The $4,500 paid for the merchandise he delivered to Kelley in money, and Kelley swears he received it and applied it to the liquidation of his debts and liabilities, reserving no part of it for his immediate personal use. What he did with the money did not in the least concern Crickard or tend to the impeachment of the transfer. No fact or circumstance proved tended to trace to the latter any information or notice sufficient to impute to him knowledge of any fraudulent intent of Kelley before or at the time the deal was consummated. If, as we have seen and hold, Crickard acquired an unimpeachable title to the stock of merchandise, he could and did make a valid sale thereof to Snyder, and the character and good faith of this transaction is assailed only by the pleadings, the allegations of which are supported by no proof whatsoever, nor was there any attempt to prove the fact to be as alleged.

[2] The important inquiry remaining for discussion and decision relates to the sale by Snyder to Mrs. Kelley. Between them there is some relationship, he being a half-brother of her father; but to her he owed no duty other than to deal justly and fairly with her. It was she, not he or her husband, or any other kindred of either, who first made the initial advancement to enter into the negotiations culminating in the purchase of the property. She and Snyder personally and alone dealt and treated with each other in regard to the sale, agreed upon the terms, amount, time, and manner of payment. The consideration was $4,000, of which she paid $2,500 in currency, and for the residue executed to him her personal notes, one for $600, the other for $900, both otherwise being unsecured, the first of which she paid before the institution of this suit, and the second of which he assigned to Crickard in lieu of the note held by the latter as evidence of a balance due him from Snyder on the sale to him by Crickard. This note remains unpaid.

No part of the consideration for the last transfer of the property is traced to the husband of the purchaser. Clearly he had no money and no means of acquiring it, no friends willing to loan him any, and no credit to permit him to borrow or procure indorsers therefor if he could in that manner obtain it. She seems to have had the character and credit which he so grossly lacked. While his father, Albert Kelley, apparently did not deem his son worthy of confidence or assistance, or perhaps entertained a suspicion of the son's lack of ability or honesty, he did render material help and assistance to the son's wife in the transaction under investigation. To consummate it, he loaned her the amount of the cash payment to Snyder, took her note therefor, part of which she repaid, and the balance he bestowed upon her as a gift, perhaps because he discovered her ability to manage the property successfully, as she seems to have done. No one questioned Albert Kelley's financial ability to loan his daughter-in-law that amount of money, or that he made the loan, or that she executed to him her note therefor, and these matters the evidence clearly and unequivocally establishes. He owned timber land near Valley Head, and sold the timber standing thereon about the time he loaned Mrs. Kelley the money used by her in the purchase of the goods, and when he delivered that amount to her he had in the bank to his credit more than $5,000, whether derived from the sale of the timber or from some other source, the evidence does not definitely show. The amount of the deposit in the bank to his credit is proved by Bing, the cashier, and his statement is not impeached, and doubtless could not be, and was not questioned. It is argued, but not proved, that the money so credited to the father belonged to the son; wherefore the latter, and not the former, thereby enabled Mrs. Kelley to acquire the property. If this were true, and the proof established the fact to be as stated, the argument would avail to support the charge of fraud. But the argument rests only upon mere suspicion, not upon proof, of which some might have been furnished if it existed. The failure to produce it warrants assumption of its nonexistence.

The other persons from whom Mrs. Kelley borrowed money either to purchase the property or to meet the expense incurred in its management bear undisputed testimony to support these transactions, and credit her with repaying them, in whole or in part, according to her undertaking in that regard, and express no dissatisfaction with the result.

[3] As indicative of ownership, appellants emphasize in argument the joint participation by the Kelleys in the conduct and management of the store. As regards this claim the proof is equally clear and satisfactory. Clarence Kelley's connection therewith is that of an employé upon a monthly salary which is shown not to exceed the amount paid for a like service in the same community under similar circumstances at that time. The legal right of a wife so to employ her husband upon the payment of a reasonable compensation seems no longer a controverted legal proposition. Trapnell v. Conklyn, 37 W. Va. 242, 16 S. E. 570, 38 Am. St. Rep. 30; Board of Education v. Mitchell, 40 W. Va. 431, 21 S. E. 1017. The only qualification is that such an agreement or arrangement between them will not be permitted to operate to the prejudice of the creditors of either or both of them. Boggess v. Richards' Adm'r, 39 W. Va. 567, 20 S. E. 599, 26 L. R. A. 537, 45 Am. St. Rep. 938. The mere employment, though upon a fairly compensatory monthly salary, in this case $50, does not suffice to cast suspicion upon the validity of Snyder's transfer to Mrs. Kelley. Besides, the greater part of the payment was devoted to the maintenance of the household expenses, according to undisputed proof.

This, as we have said, is the second suit involving the property of Clarence Kelley, and the final decree in the first of the two is relied on as showing a former adjudication of all matters in issue in this litigation. Whether the decree foreclosed the right to prosecute this suit we deem it unnecessary to decide, in view of the conclusion clearly indicated by what has already been said upon the merits of the cause.

Counsel for the claimants also complain of the failure to decree against Clarence Kelley the debts contracted by him with McCrea Mills Company, duly verified, which, with interest from the date they became due and payable, aggregate $597.01. The inclusion of this debt in the decree of dismissal was not asked for in the court below. Whether the lower court erred in dismissing that claim depends upon the further question whether, after holding insufficient the proof of fraud, the charge which alone conferred authority to hear the cause and determine the rights of the parties in reference thereto, there still remains jurisdiction sufficient to warrant relief not within the contemplation of the parties when the suit was brought. Their right to relief depended upon an adjudication of the issue involving the fraudulent character of the transactions in controversy. The adjudication against them upon that question obviously terminated the litigation and effected an exhaustion of the powers of that tribunal to take further steps in the cause. The same limitation applies to this court. As was said in Home Gas Co. v. Mannington Window Glass Co., 63 W. Va. 266, 274, 61 S. E. 329, 332: "The ultimate end of the case here, as it should have been in the circuit court, is to adjudge the plaintiff not entitled to the relief prayed for, the fraud alleged not having been proven, and to dismiss the bill." Virtually the same thing was said in Amick v. Ellis, 53 W. Va. 421, 44 S. E. 257, a suit to enforce specific performance of an unacknowledged contract for the sale of the separate real estate of a married woman, performed in part by the plaintiff, who asked in the alternative for repayment of the money received by her. The language there used was: "We cannot apply the rule [the rule contended for here] that, having jurisdiction for one purpose, full relief or alternative relief will be given. There is jurisdiction neither to compel a deed nor for [the payment of] money." While cases may be found holding otherwise upon the same subject, the preponderance of opinion upholds the view herein expressed, and, as sometimes stated, "where a case for relief in equity fails, a court of equity is without jurisdiction to award other relief by way of disposing of the entire controversy, unless, indeed, it appears that the remedy at law will be inadequate. Otherwise, as the courts have frequently pointed out, a litigant, by a pretended claim for equitable relief, might deprive his opponent of advantages incident to an action at law." Johnston, etc., Bros. v. Bunn, 108 Va. 490, 62 S. E. 341, holds to the contrary; but the annotation to the case, found in 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1064, uses the language above quoted and cites numerous authorities to the same effect.

[4] The case of Evans v. Kelley, 49 W. Va. 181, 38 S. E. 497, seems to announce a contrary doctrine. Point 3 of the syllabus is: "Equity having acquired jurisdiction of a cause for one purpose, although the relief sought be finally denied, any relief, legal or equitable, justified by the pleadings and tending to end litigation between the parties, will be granted." To support that conclusion the opinion cites Walters v. Bank, 76 Va. 12; Hotchkiss v. Plaster Co., 41 W. Va. 361, 23 S. E. 576; 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 201. The Virginia cases adopt the minority rule, as we have seen, and are not in consonance with the countervailing weight of authority on the subject. There are but two cases cited in 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, supra, for the doctrine therein stated, and Hotchkiss v. Plaster Co., supra, reiterates only the well-established rule; inapplicable here, that when equity has jurisdiction for one purpose, the court will determine all matters involved in the litigation, unless some good reason for not doing so is made to appear. That case, therefore, is not an authority for the proposition stated in Evans v. Kelley, supra. Besides, our later decisions, cited, adhere to the principle heretofore announced, and virtually, though not expressly, overrule that case. While not directly in point, the recent decision of this court in Deming National Bank v. Baker, 98 S. E. 438, affords another illustration of this rule, and accords with the generally expressed opinion of the legal authorities dealings with the subject. 10 R. C. L. p. 372; 16 Cyc. 111.

What has been said renders unnecessary the expression of an opinion upon other questions discussed by counsel. Perceiving no error, we affirm the decree.

WATRING v. GIBSON et al. (No. 3633.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 13, 1919. Rehearing Denied
Sept. 17, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. LOGS AND LOGGING ⇨3(15)—SALE OF TIMBER—MISTAKE OR FRAUD—RECOVERY OF MONEY PAID.

Equity has jurisdiction of a suit by the purchaser to recover back a portion of the purchase money paid to the vendor for timber on a boundary of land, estimated to be a certain number of feet stumpage, when such estimate is much more than the actual quantity, and the mistake was caused by the false representations of the vendor, or his agent, respecting the acreage of the boundary.

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⇨138(10)—PRINCIPAL AND AGENT ⇨115(1)—AGENT'S REPRESENTATION—LIABILITY OF PRINCIPAL—MARRIED WOMEN.

A principal is bound by representations as to existing facts, made by his agent, in regard to a transaction intrusted to him; and this rule applies to the transactions of an agent for a married woman, respecting those matters concerning which married women are permitted by law to contract.

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⇨137(1), 138(9)—HUSBAND'S AGENCY FOR WIFE—AGENT'S FRAUDULENT REPRESENTATIONS.

The marital relation does not prevent a husband from acting as agent for his wife, and when she permits him to act as her agent in negotiating a sale of her separate real estate and afterwards signs and acknowledges a written contract in pursuance thereof, in the execution of which he joins, and she receives the consideration therefor, she is bound by the fraudulent representations of her agent respecting the acreage and is liable to account to the purchaser for the shortage.

4. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⇨138(8)—HUSBAND'S AGENCY FOR WIFE—FRAUDULENT REPRESENTATIONS—LIABILITY.

Where a married woman receives the consideration which a purchaser of her property has been induced to pay, in reliance upon the fraudulent representations of her agent, equity will not permit her to retain the benefits thereof and repudiate the liability arising out of such fraudulent representations of her agent, even though she did not authorize the agent to make them.

5. JUDGMENT ⇨622(2)—SET-OFF AND COUNTERCLAIM ⇨15—TRESPASS ON THE CASE—MERGER AND BAR.

Where the vendor of certain kinds of growing timber brings an action of trespass on the case against the purchaser for the cutting of certain other kinds, not included in the contract of sale, the purchaser is not thereby estopped from suing in equity to recover back part of the purchase money, paid on account of false representations by the vendor or his agent, on the truth of which the purchaser relied and was thereby induced to buy. The matters averred in the bill cannot be offset against such action at law nor pleaded in defense thereof.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR §162(1)—PAYMENT OF DECREE—ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR.

A party to a cause, who has paid a money decree against him, cannot, after the cause has been appealed by the opposite party, cross-assign as error the rendering of such decree.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

7. APPEAL AND ERROR §162(2)—ACCEPTANCE OF BENEFITS OF DECREE—APPEAL FROM DENIAL OF SPECIAL RELIEF—WAIVER.

Although a plaintiff has accepted the benefit of that part of the decree in his favor, he may appeal from that part of it denying the special relief prayed for, where decree expressly provides that acceptance of amount decreed shall not prejudice right of appeal, as such provision prevents application of doctrine of waiver, which might otherwise defeat his right of appeal.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Suit in equity by S. H. Watring against Virginia S. Gibson and husband, to recover for shortage in quantity of standing timber paid for, and to enjoin defendant's action at law. Decree for defendant as to shortage, and for plaintiff against defendant Virginia S. Gibson, and plaintiff appeals. Decree denying relief on account of shortage reversed, and decree entered for complainant, and otherwise affirmed.

Samuel T. Spears, of Elkins, for appellant.
Leroy See, of Elkins, and A. M. Cunningham, of Parsons, for appellees.

WILLIAMS, J. This suit in equity was brought by S. H. Watring against Virginia S. Gibson and J. A. Gibson, her husband, to recover back $1,125 of the purchase price paid Virginia S. Gibson for standing timber, on account of a shortage in the quantity purchased and paid for, and to enjoin her from prosecuting an action at law, brought against this plaintiff to recover damages for cutting dead timber, which was interspersed with the green timber purchased, but which was not included in the terms of the contract of sale.

The contract bearing date April 22, 1915, was signed, sealed, and acknowledged by both Mrs. Gibson and her husband and showed a sale of "all the green hemlock and spruce timber 10 inches and over in diameter standing and being on that certain tract of land containing 410 acres," at the price of $3 per M feet stumpage. It gave the location of the tract and the terms of payment, which have been fully complied with and are not now material, the entire sum paid for the timber being $4,500, determined upon the basis of an estimated stumpage of 1,500,000 feet. The stumpage was not ascertained when the contract was signed, but it was therein provided that it should be determined in the following manner: Each party was to select an estimator and these two an umpire, in case they failed to agree, who were to make the estimate "in the tree according to the standard rule of lumbermen, and said estimate to be final and complete and to constitute the basis of settlement." Only a comparatively small portion of the 410-acre tract had any green spruce or hemlock on it, and it formed a practically contiguous boundary, irregular in shape, fringed and interspersed with dead, standing spruce and hemlock, and with fallen trees of the same kind that had been blown down by windstorms. All the negotiations and transactions concerning the sale and ascertainment of the stumpage were had between plaintiff and J. A. Gibson, who acted for and on behalf of his wife. All she did was to sign and acknowledge the contract in her own proper person, and receive the purchase money, either directly from the purchaser or through her husband as her agent. Plaintiff and J. A. Gibson each selected an estimator, and all four of them went upon the ground, and the two estimators proceeded to make their estimate in the following manner: They marked off an acre in what they considered the heaviest timbered part of the boundary and another acre in the lightest timbered part of it, estimated the quantity of timber on each of these acres, and took one-half the sum of the two as being a fair average of the quantity per acre on the timbered boundary. They did not, however, measure or determine in any manner the number of acres in the boundary, but both of them swear they relied on the representations made to them at the time by J. A. Gibson, that he had measured the green timbered boundary and found it contained 60 acres, and that they relied on his representations as being true, and ascertained the stumpage on the entire boundary by multiplying the estimated stumpage of one acre, 25,000 feet, by 60. Oscar Latt, the estimator selected by plaintiff, says he agreed the quantity was 1,500,000, "only if there was 60 acres." George Phares, estimator selected by Gibson, swears Mr. Latt remarked two or three times to Mr. Gibson, or in his presence, that he did not think there were 60 acres, and that Mr. Gibson said "him and some one else, I don't remember who, had run across one end and down one side, and figured up what was in it, 60 or 61 acres." He further says: "We didn't know anything about it ourselves, we were going by what Mr. Gibson said about the number of acres." Plaintiff's own testimony is to the same effect. After the timber had been paid for on the supposition that the boundary was 60 acres, and after all, or nearly all, of the timber had been cut, and before bringing this suit, plaintiff procured an accurate survey of the boundary to be made by a surveyor and learned thereby that it contained but 45 acres.

Three and a half acres of dead, standing timber was included in the boundary, which Gibson told plaintiff and the estimators they might include with the green timber, and they say they did include it in making the average of 25,000 feet per acre. Plaintiff cut and manufactured this dead timber, and it was to recover for this trespass that Mrs. Gibson brought the action at law which plaintiff prayed to have enjoined. On final hearing upon bill, answer, replication, and depositions of numerous witnesses, the court entered a decree refusing to grant plaintiff any relief on account of shortage in the acreage, for the reason, stated in a written opinion printed with the record, that the court was of the opinion Mrs. Gibson should not be held responsible for the representations of her husband as to the number of acres in the boundary, notwithstanding the learned chancellor found the fact, "established by the proof," to be that Gibson had made such declarations. In addition thereto, both the estimators swear they did not estimate the acreage, did not know what the boundary contained, and relied on the statement of Gibson as true, and determined the quantity of timber on the whole boundary accordingly. Plaintiff's testimony is to the same effect, that no measurements were made by the estimators to ascertain the acreage, and that Gibson stated several times that the boundary of green timber contained 60 or 61 acres. In view of the established fact that Gibson did represent that he and another man had measured the boundary and found it contained 60 or 61 acres, and the undisputed testimony of the surveyor, who afterwards surveyed it, that it contained only 45 acres, considered in connection with the uncontradicted testimony of the estimators, to the effect that they relied on Mr. Gibson's statement as true and made their estimate accordingly, we think the court erred in denying plaintiff relief on account of the shortage. However, the court decreed plaintiff a recovery of $834.96 on account of the dead timber which Gibson had assumed to authorize him to cut and which had been included in the estimate, because he had paid Mrs. Gibson for it, and the court had refused to enjoin her from suing to recover the value of it, in effect, holding she had a right to recover on the ground that it was not included in the description of the timber sold, and that standing timber, whether living or dead, was a part of Mrs. Gibson's land, which could be disposed of only in the manner provided by the statute regulating the disposition of lands of married women, in which views we are inclined to think the court was entirely correct. But these questions are not involved in this appeal, and are not among those decided in this opinion. Neither do they affect the question to be decided, which is whether plaintiff has a right to recover back a part of the purchase price on account of a shortage in the estimated quantity of timber, caused by the fraudulent representations of the vendor's agent as to the acreage in the timber boundary.

[1] The bill seeks to recover back money which plaintiff was induced to pay because of the fraudulent representations made by defendant's husband and agent, on the truth of which he relied and was thereby misled, the very kind of a wrong that a court of equity delights to correct, notwithstanding courts of law may furnish a concurrent remedy. See numerous cases cited in 6 Encyc. Dig. Va. & W. Va. Cases, 476.

Where a vendee has been induced, by the false and fraudulent representations of the vendor or his agent, to accept a conveyance for land, and afterwards discovers it contains a materially less quantity than represented, equity will give relief by abating the purchase price, or rescinding the contract and restoring the parties to their former status. Crislip v. Cain, 19 W. Va. 438; Smith v. White, 71 W. Va. 639, 78 S. E. 378, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 623.

[2-4] The marital relation does not prevent a husband from acting as agent in the management of his wife's property. Trapnell v. Conklyn, 37 W. Va. 242, 16 S. E. 570, 38 Am. St. Rep. 30. No rule of law is better settled and more universally applied than the rule which holds a principal bound by the declarations and representations as to matters of fact, not mere expressions of opinion, made by his agent respecting a transaction intrusted to him. Nutter v. Brown, 51 W. Va. 598, 42 S. E. 661. "Where the acts of the agent will bind the principal, there his representations, declarations, and admissions respecting the subject-matter will bind the principal, where made at the same time and constituting a part of the res gestæ." Coyle v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 11 W. Va. 94. This rule applies to married women respecting those matters concerning which they are authorized by law to contract. Mrs. Gibson could sell and convey her timber by deed, acknowledged by her, her husband joining therein, and did dispose of her timber in that manner. She would also be liable for any fraudulent representations made by her in respect thereto. 2 Bishop's Law of Married Women, § 490; 21 Cyc. 1425. The fraudulent representations of which plaintiff complains were made by Mrs. Gibson's husband while acting as her agent, after the written contract had been fully executed by her, and were made in her interest for the purpose of increasing the amount of money she was to receive under the contract, and must, therefore, be regarded as having been made by herself. 21 Cyc. 1425. It does not appear that she authorized him to make those statements, or that she even knew he had made them, before receiving the money for the timber. Still she cannot be permitted to retain the benefits of the contract, procured for her by her husband, and at the same time repudiate any liability arising out of his fraudulent conduct in relation thereto. Dewing v. Hutton, 48 W. Va. 576, 37 S. E. 670; Quarg v. Scher, 136 Cal. 406, 69 Pac. 96; Knappen v. Freeman, 47 Minn. 491, 50 N. W. 533; Keith v. Keith, 26 Kan. 26; and Adams v. Mills, 60 N. Y. 533. All these cases, except Dewing v. Hutton, are cases in which the husband acted as agent for his wife. See, also, Danser v. Johnsons, 25 W. Va. 380.

[5] Having held her husband out as her agent in negotiating the sale of her timber, and having signed and acknowledged a written contract therefor, executed in the manner provided by law for the sale of married women's real estate, and having received the benefits thereof, she is estopped to deny his agency. 13 R. C. L. 1169.

Counsel for defendant cross-assign the following errors in their brief:

First, they insist plaintiff should have litigated the matters set up in his bill, in defense of the action at law which he asked to have enjoined. That was an action of trespass on the case for cutting timber, an action foreign to the contract, and while the matters complained of in the bill might have formed the basis of an action at law, either in tort for the deceit, or in assumpsit for money had and received, still our procedure does not admit of set-off in an action of tort; hence they could not have been litigated in defense of that action.

Second, in not sustaining the demurrer in its entirety to the plaintiff's bill. At a term previous to the one at which the final decree was rendered, the court sustained the demurrer to the bill in so far only as it prayed for an order enjoining prosecution of the action at law. The bill is clearly good in respect to the other relief prayed for.

[6] The third cross-assignment of error relates to the decree against Mrs. Gibson for the repayment of the money, paid on account of the dead timber not included in the written contract of sale. The decree in that respect was clearly right. She could not be permitted to retain the money actually paid for the timber, and at the same time recover for the trespass committed in cutting it; that would be unjust and inequitable. But, even if the decree in that respect were erroneous, defendant, by paying plaintiff the amount decreed him on that account, has waived her right to appeal. Payment ended the litigation in respect to that claim.

The decree gave plaintiff a recovery against Mrs. Gibson for $834.96 on account of the dead timber, which had been included in the estimate of green timber, for the whole of which, both green and dead, plaintiff had paid $4,500. Mrs. Gibson should have credit for the amount decreed against her, thus reducing the amount which plaintiff actually paid for the green timber, on the estimated boundary, to $3,665.04, one-fourth of which he is entitled to recover back from her, as the shortage of 15 acres is one-fourth of the acreage which Gibson had represented in the boundary.

In so far as the decree appealed from denies plaintiff relief on account of the shortage in the estimated amount of timber, it will be reversed, and a decree entered here in his favor for the sum of $916.26, with interest thereon from April 22, 1915, and in all other respects the decree will be affirmed, with costs to appellant.

GLEATON v. WRIGHT et ux. (No. 1201.)(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 16, 1919.
Rehearing Denied Sept. 5, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER ⇨226(2), 231(1)
—"BONA FIDE PURCHASER"—EQUITY RULE —STATUTES—RECORDED BOND FOR TITLE—UNRECORDED SENIOR DEED.

Under the rule in equity, to constitute one a bona fide purchaser in the full sense, three conditions must concur: He must pay the purchase money, or at least place himself in a position where he is in all events bound to pay the purchase money; he must get title; and he must pay the purchase money and get title before notice of the rights of third persons.

(a) The rule in equity is applicable in the construction of the act of 1900 (Acts 1900, p. 68; Civil Code 1910, § 4213 et seq.), providing for the registry of bonds for title. The primary intent and purpose of the act was to give notice to all persons dealing with the obligor, from the date of the filing of the bond, "of the interest and equity of the holder of such bond in the property therein described," so that any one acquiring a lien on or title to the property after the filing of the bond would take the property subject to the interest and equity of the obligee in the bond.

(b) The obligee in a recorded bond is protected to the extent of purchase money actually paid before notice of the rights of a grantee in a senior unrecorded deed from the obligor in the bond. The recorded bond for title does not take priority over the unrecorded senior deed to the extent of the entire estate purchased.

2. DIRECTED VERDICT — CANCELLATION OF DEED.

Under the pleadings and evidence, the court did not err in directing a verdict for the defendants.

*(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER ⇨226(2)—BOND FOR TITLE—"DEED."

A bond for title is not a "deed," within the meaning of Civ. Code 1910, § 4198, providing that a deed may be recorded at any time.

Error from Superior Court, Worth County; R. Eve, Judge.

Suit by M. M. Gleaton against G. R. Wright and wife. Directed verdict for defendants, and plaintiff accepts and brings error. Affirmed.

On October 31, 1902, Mary D. Harris, in consideration of $390, conveyed to G. R. Wright the north half of lot of land No.

222 in the fourteenth district of Worth county. On December 12, 1902, G. R. Wright, in consideration of love and affection, conveyed the same land to Mrs. G. R. Wright, his wife. The deed was properly executed and attested, but was not recorded. Eight years after the execution and delivery of the deed from Wright to Mrs. Wright, Wright executed and delivered to M. M. Gleaton, the plaintiff, a bond for title to the land; Gleaton paying $25 in cash, and giving his note to Wright for the balance of $2,175, payable at a future date, to wit, 2 months and 28 days after the date of the bond. The bond for title was attested as a deed and admitted to record. Wright and his wife lived upon the land at the time of the execution and delivery of the bond for title to Gleaton. When the note given by Gleaton to Wright matured, the latter went to the home of Wright for the purpose of paying the note. He was then advised by Mrs. Wright that she was the owner of the land, and that her husband had no authority to make a sale of the same. (According to the plaintiff's testimony he made a tender of the purchase money before he received knowledge of Mrs. Wright's claim.) Mr. Wright was not at home, but a short time thereafter Gleaton tendered to Wright $2,175, according to the terms of the bond for title. Wright declined to accept the money, and stated to Gleaton that title to the land was in Mrs. Wright, and that she refused to ratify the sale made by him to Gleaton and refused to convey the land. Gleaton filed suit against Mr. and Mrs. Wright, praying for specific performance of the contract, and for the cancellation of the deed made by Wright to Mrs. Wright. There was no alternative prayer for damages. Upon the trial of the case it appeared that at the time of the execution and delivery of the bond for title Gleaton had no notice or knowledge of Mrs. Wright's claim to the land. It also appeared that the mother of Mrs. Wright furnished and paid for Mrs. Wright a part of the purchase price of the land in controversy. The note given by Gleaton to Wright was never transferred to any person. Both the note and the $25, with interest, were tendered to the plaintiff before the beginning of the trial of the case, and as a continuing offer both were, under the order of the presiding judge, deposited for the plaintiff with the clerk of the court. At the conclusion of the evidence the court directed a verdict for the defendants, and the plaintiff excepted.

GEORGE, J. [1] Mr. and Mrs. Wright (husband and wife) were in the actual possession of the land in controversy. The record title was in the husband. Presumptively he was the owner of the land. He offered to sell, and executed to the plaintiff in error his bond for title, conditioned to convey the land upon the payment of the agreed purchase price. Mrs. Wright's possession did not constitute notice, under section 4528 of the Civil Code, of her right and title to the land. Austin v. Southern Home Building & Loan Association, 122 Ga. 439, 50 S. E. 382; Dix v. Wilkinson, 149 Ga. —, 99 S. E. 437. The plaintiff in error did not have actual notice of Mrs. Wright's deed to the land at the time of the execution and delivery to him of the bond for title. The question presented, therefore, is whether, under our registry laws, a subsequent purchaser of land under a recorded bond for title, who has made a partial payment, without notice, actual or constructive, of a prior unrecorded deed, acquires title superior to the title of the grantee in the deed.

[3] It is insisted that a bond for title is a deed within the meaning of section 4198 of our Code; the contention being that a bond for title is a "deed of bargain and sale," vesting the holder of the bond with the ownership of the land, subject only to the payment of the balance of the purchase money, and that the holder in the instant case was a "purchaser without notice" of Mrs. Wright's deed. Section 4198 of the Civil Code provides that a deed may be recorded at any time, "but such deed loses its priority over a subsequent recorded deed from the same vendor, taken without notice of the existence of the first." In a sense a bond for title "under seal," and executed with the formality prescribed for the execution of a deed to land, is "a deed of bargain and sale." See Allen v. Holding, 29 Ga. 485, 489; Latham v. Inman, 88 Ga. 505, 514, 15 S. E. 8. It is not, however, a deed within the meaning of section 4198 of the Code. It is said, however, that the act of 1900 (Acts 1900, p. 68; Civil Code, § 4213 et seq.), providing for the registry of bonds for title, placed them on the same footing as deeds, and therefore that the rights of the plaintiff under his recorded bond for title were the same as though he had procured a deed, instead of a bond for title. The part of the act of 1900 material here is as follows:

"Bonds for title to land or any interest therein shall, when executed with the formality now prescribed for the execution of deeds to land, be admissible to record in the county where the property therein described is located. Such record shall, from the date of filing, be notice of the interest and equity of the holder of such bond in the property therein described."

Prior to this act there was no law in this state authorizing the recording of bonds for titles. Veverly v. Burke, 9 Ga. 440 (1), 54 Am. Dec. 351; Powell's Actions for Land, § 279. The primary intent and purpose of the act, where the vendor remained in possession, was to give notice to any and all persons dealing with the vendor or obligor, from the date of the filing of the bond, of the interest and equity of the obligee in the particular property, so that any one acquiring a lien on or title to the property after the filing of the bond would take such property subject to the interest and equities of the obligee in the bond. The act did not change the legal status of bona fide purchasers. Whatever may be the rule elsewhere, in this state a senior unrecorded deed, taken for value, loses its priority over a junior recorded deed from the same vendor, when the junior deed is taken without knowledge or notice of the senior deed. Civil Code 1910, § 4198; Wadley Lumber Co. v. Lott, 130 Ga. 135 (2), 139-141, 60 S. E. 836; Payton v. Payton, 143 Ga. 486, 97 S. E. 69. Our recording acts, being "in derogation of the rights of property," are construed strictly. Hackney v. Rome, 33 Ga. 231, 234. Under the facts in this case, Mrs. Wright's deed is not a voluntary conveyance; in order to give the bond for title priority over her deed, the plaintiff in error must occupy the position of a bona fide purchaser for value. Unquestionably he is a bona fide purchaser, so far as the cash payment of $25 is concerned. His note, given for practically the full purchase price of the property, was never transferred, but was tendered to him on the trial of the case.

Equity regards the plaintiff in error as having a property right from the moment of his contract; but in order for him to be considered a bona fide purchaser in the full sense three conditions must concur: He must pay the purchase money; he must get title; and he must pay all the purchase money and get title before notice of the rights of the grantee in the unrecorded deed. Clark's Equity, § 85. This is the doctrine announced by this court and sustained by the weight of authority. In Donalson v. Thomason, 137 Ga. 848, 851, 74 S. E. 762, 763, Presiding Justice Evans, speaking for the court, said:

"It is a rule in equity that a bona fide purchaser without notice, to be entitled to protection, must be so, not only at the time of the contract or conveyance, but until the purchase money is actually paid. * * * A partial payment of the purchase money before notice, although not sufficient to invest the vendee with the character of a bona fide purchaser as regards the entire estate purchased, will entitle him to invoke the aid of the equitable principle that he who asks equity must do equity and reimburse the amount actually paid."

The Georgia cases cited in support of this doctrine are Phinzy v. Few, 19 Ga. 66, Mackey v. Bowles, 98 Ga. 733, 25 S. E. 881, and Carter v. Pinckard, 68 Ga. 817. In Losey v. Simpson, 11 N. J. Eq. 246 (4), the rule is stated as follows:

"Actual payment of the purchase money is, in general, necessary to the character of a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, and the giving of a security, or executing an obligation for payment, will not be sufficient."

Had Wright transferred the note given by the plaintiff in error to an innocent purchaser for value, so that the plaintiff in error would in all events have been compellable to pay the note, he would have occupied the position of a bona fide purchaser for value. The rule of equity discussed above is the rule at law, and is applicable in the construction of our registry acts. It is not sufficient that the plaintiff in error made his contract to purchase without notice of Mrs. Wright's title to the land. He must have paid the purchase money without notice of her deed. Whether the tender by him of the balance of the purchase money was made before or after notice of Mrs. Wright's deed is, in our view of the matter, immaterial. The fact is that he has not paid the purchase money and that he has knowledge of Mrs. Wright's deed. Equity will not permit him to better his condition by the tender or the payment of the purchase money after actual notice of Mrs. Wright's deed. The tender of his note, together with the $25 cash payment, with interest on the latter, is the full relief to which the plaintiff in error was entitled, under the evidence in this case. It must be borne in mind that this is not a case of competition between a junior recorded bond for title and a senior unrecorded bond; the common obligor remaining in possession.

[2] No question of estoppel is involved under the facts in the record. It unequivocally appears from the evidence that Mrs. Wright knew nothing of the transaction between the plaintiff in error and her husband and did not ratify the same. The jury would not have been authorized to find that Mrs. Wright never accepted the deed from her husband. A contrary finding was demanded. Nor was the plaintiff entitled to have damages against either of the defendants. The suit was simply one for specific performance. There was no alternative prayer, and the evidence did not authorize a verdict for damages against either of the defendants. There was no error in directing a verdict for the defendants.

Judgment affirmed.

WOOD et al. v. CITY OF ROME. (No. 10422.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division 2.
July 22, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ~~§~~ 536—PAVING ASSESSMENT—AFFIDAVIT OF ILLEGALITY—CONSTRUCTION—SUFFICIENCY.

When the affidavit of illegality is construed as a whole, and most strongly (as it must be) against the pleader, the facts therein stated show by clear implication that some amount must be due from the affiants to the city of Rome for the paving of the street upon which their property abutted; and, it not being alleged therein that such amount had been paid or tendered, the affidavit of illegality was properly dismissed on the general demurrer interposed. See Laws Ga. 1909, p. 1317, § 71 (e). This is true, although it is alleged in the affidavit that "no part of the sum for which said fi. fa. was issued is due," and it is "expressly denied" that deponents are "legally chargeable with any portion of the cost of said pavement." These allegations, in the light of the affidavit as a whole and the facts therein stated, are mere conclusions of the affiants, and are without any basis of fact to rest upon. See, in this connection, Hardwick v. Dalton, 140 Ga. 633, 79 S. E. 553; Burns v. Atlanta, 22 Ga. App. 381, 96 S. E. 11; s. c. (affirmed) 148 Ga. 549, 97 S. E. 536.

(a) The conclusion of the affiants that no amount is due cannot be supported by the fact stated in the affidavit that their property has been damaged in an amount larger than the amount of the fi. fa. against them by a change of grade in the street. This is "merely an attempt to set up an unliquidated demand against a judgment demand," and this could not be done in the affidavit of illegality in this case. Hawkins v. County of Sumter, 57 Ga. 166; Leavel v. Frey, 133 Ga. 723, 66 S. E. 916.

PLEADING ¶8(15) — CONCLUSIONS — FRAUD.

A complaint charging fraud by name, but stating no facts from which fraud is inferable, held insufficient to confer equitable jurisdiction.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; W. H. Townsend, Judge.

Action by Sarah F. Drennan and others against Charles O. Brown and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Appeal dismissed.

Barnard B. Evans and Henry F. Jennings, both of Columbia, for appellants.

Benet, Shand & McGowan, of Columbia, for respondents.

GAGE, J. The action is at law to recover the possession of 728 acres of land just out of Columbia, in Center township, and alleged by the complaint to be in the possession of the defendant. The defendant denied plaintiff's title, and set up title in himself by adverse possession.

There is no element in the pleadings which smacks of the jurisdiction of a court of equity. It is true the complaint charges fraud by name; but it states no facts from which fraud is inferable. The circuit court has heard the cause by consent, and found all the facts, and the law, of course, for the defendant. That is an end of the case.

The appeal is dismissed.

SOUTHERN STOVE WORKS v. CON-
VERSE SAV. BANK. (No. 10230.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 14, 1919.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶110—ORDERS AP-PEALABLE—GRANTING NEW TRIAL.

An order granting a new trial upon ground that error had been committed in charge to jury is appealable.

2. PAYMENT ¶25 — WHAT CONSTITUTES — BANK ENTRIES.

Fact that a bank to which a check had been sent for collection charged the drawer with amount of check and credited such amount to account of its correspondent bank does not constitute a payment precluding bank from later changing entry upon drawer's failure to pay the check.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; Thos. S. Sease, Judge.

Action by the Southern Stove Works against the Converse Savings Bank. From an order granting a new trial after a verdict for plaintiff, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The check in question was drawn by the Turner-Setzler Furniture Company in favor of plaintiff on defendant bank, deposited by plaintiff in the Old State National Bank of Evansville, Ind., and sent by that bank to defendant for collection.

A portion of the court's charge reads as follows:

"I charge you that a payment may be made by a check, a transfer of credits, as well as by cash, and if the defendant charged the account of the Turner-Setzler Furniture Company with the amount of the check and credited the account of its correspondent bank with the amount of the collection in good faith, that was a payment of the check so far as the payee is concerned, and the defendant could not relieve itself of its duty to remit the proceeds of the check simply by charging it off the account of the drawer and charging the amount off of the credit account of the correspondent bank. The defendant knew, or could have known, whether or not the drawer of the check had sufficient funds on deposit to pay the check when it was paid, if so paid. And after they paid said check or charged it against the account of the drawer and in favor of the account of its correspondent bank, that was a payment, and the defendant could not revoke it by afterwards changing its books or charging it off of the account."

Cornelius Otts, of Spartanburg, for appellant.

Brown & Boyd, of Spartanburg, for respondent.

WATTS, J. [1] This is an appeal from an order granting a new trial, after jury had found a verdict in favor of plaintiff, by his honor Judge Sease, who had tried the case. His honor based his order on the ground that he had committed error in his charge to the jury. He granted the order, not as a matter within his discretion, because he did not approve of the verdict, but on the ground that he had misdirected the jury as to the law of the case. This makes the matter appealable; and the sole question is: Did the judge err in stating to the jury the law applicable in the case? If he did, the case must be affirmed, and appeal dismissed.

[2] His honor committed error when he instructed the jury that payment and entry on the books were the same; he confused the jury when he instructed them that entry on the book of the bank of the item received from the collecting bank constituted payment of the item. This was error, and practically amounted to a peremptory instruction to find for the plaintiff. It is the custom of the banks to make such entry that does not constitute payment. Such entry stands when the item is actually paid. When not paid or collected, the bank has the right to charge it off. When a check or draft is drawn and handed to the bank, the bank credits its customer with that amount. If the draft, check, or item is not collected or paid, the bank has the right to deduct it from the customer's account. The entry by the bank is simply one of convenience to keep the customer's account straight. The instruction of the court in this particular was erroneous. He repeatedly and erroneously charged the jury in this particular that entry on the book of the item received from the collecting bank constituted payment of the item. His honor confused the terms of payment and entry on the books being the same. When the check was entered on the books of the bank, and forwarded for collection, it was not a payment until actually paid. His honor erroneously instructed the jury and was right in setting aside the verdict rendered and granting a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

Ex parte WARREN. (No. 13.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 10, 1919.)

HABEAS CORPUS  $\Leftrightarrow$  113(12)—REVIEW—CUSTODY OF MINOR—BEST INTEREST OF CHILD.

In a habeas corpus proceeding to determine the custody of an infant, although under Revisal 1905, §§ 1762, 1765, respondents may have the right to custody under deed from the mother as natural guardian, yet, the court also having found on sufficient testimony that the best interest of the child requires that it remain with respondents, the judgment will be affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; Devin, Judge.

Petition by Mattie Ethel Kearns in habeas corpus against Charlie Swain, to obtain the custody of Daisy Bell Warren, a minor. From a judgment denying the petition, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Ward & Grimes, of Washington, N. C., for appellant.

Small, MacLean, Bragaw & Rodman, of Washington, N. C., for appellee.

HOKE, J. It appears that, about 6 years ago, the petitioner, then Mattie Perry, resident of Nash and Pitt counties, about 15 years of age, gave birth to an illegitimate child, the subject of this controversy; that about 18 months after this birth, finding it difficult, owing to reputation and conduct, to obtain any suitable abiding place, she executed a written instrument, under seal, conveying to respondents, C. E. Swain and wife, now resident in Beaufort county, the right of control and natural guardianship, conditioned upon good treatment, until said child became 21 years of age; that about 6 or 7 months thereafter the petitioner, having removed to the city of Charlotte and procured employment, there intermarried with Mr. A. J. Kearns and has one child, now living, born of the marriage. At the hearing, and on competent testimony, the court finds the following facts as more directly relevant to the inquiry:

"That the petitioner, Mrs. Mattie Kearns, was before her marriage known by the name of Mattie Perry. That she was a woman of disreputable character and gave birth to an illegitimate child, the said Daisy Perry. That when the child was about a year old that petitioner was then working in the cotton mill in Greenville, but her conduct there was bad, and she was required to leave. Thereupon she went to this respondent, Mr. Charlie Swain, and gave him the custody of the said child until she should become 21 years of age, and executed in the presence of witnesses a paper writing setting out the fact of her having so renounced the custody of her child in favor of the said Swain, copy of which said paper is hereto attached. Said Swain at that time had only known petitioner a short time, and did not know her reputation, or that the child was illegitimate. Petitioner then left, and went to Smithfield, and from there to Charlotte. That at Charlotte she married her husband, A. J. Kearns, and seems to have since her marriage led a correct life, and there is no evidence of improper conduct upon her part since that time, except her conduct in Washington last summer, when she was seen riding on the handle bars of a bicycle with one Robert Satterthwaite. That the husband of said petitioner is a man of good character, and they are living in Charlotte in a good neighborhood and members of the church. Mr. Kearns earning a living as clerk in a store, and petitioner has borne two other children. That the respondents are now living in the county of Beaufort, about six miles from the town of Washington, in a good home, in a neighborhood where the surroundings are favorable, close to church and school, and that the respondent Swain is a man of good character, and well suited and qualified to nurture and rear the child. That the respondents have no children, their only child having died in infancy some years ago. That they love the said Daisy Perry as their own child, and state that they propose to adopt the said child formally and give her their name. That they have had the custody of the said child for about four years, the child being now about five years of age, and the ties of affection between them and the said child have grown to be on both sides such as are usual between parent and child. And the court finds that the best interests of the child would be served by permitting the child to remain in the custody of the respondents."

It is fully recognized in this state that parents have prima facie the right of custody and control of their infant children, the father preferably, when both are equally worthy, and it is held also in several decisions, dealing directly with the question, that this parental right is not universal and absolute, but may and will be made to yield, when it is shown that the welfare and best interest of the child clearly requires it. In re Means, 178 N. C. 307, 97 S. E. 39; Atkinson v. Downing, 175 N. C. 244, 95 S. E. 487, this last case citing, among other authorities, In re Mercer Fain, 172 N. C. 790, 90 S. E. 928; In re Alderman, 157 N. C. 507, 73 S. E. 126, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 988; In re Mary Jane Jones, 153 N. C. 312, 69 S. E. 217, 138 Am. St. Rep. 670; In re Turner, 151 N. C. 474, 66 S. E. 431; In re Samuel Parker, 144 N. C. 170, 56 S. E. 878; Newsome v. Bunch, 144 N. C. 15, 56 S. E. 509; Latham v. Ellis, 116 N. C. 30, 20 S. E. 1012. In Atkinson's Case, the basic principle with the suggested limitation upon it, is stated as follows:

"The prima facie right of parents to the care and custody of their infant is a natural and substantive one, which will not be interfered with by the courts, unless the good of the child clearly requires it. While this parental right is fully recognized in this state, it is further held that the welfare of the child is also entitled to full consideration, and on especial facts may become controlling in the disposition of its custody."

The court having found upon sufficient testimony that the best interest of the child requires that it remain for the present in the care and custody of the respondents, on the record and in accord with the principles stated, we approve both the finding and the judgment thereon, and hold that the prayer of the petitioner has been properly denied. It may be that, under the correct interpretation of our statutes on the subject, Revisal, § 1762, conferring on a father, though a minor, the right of disposition of his infant and unmarried child by deed or will, etc., and section 1765, constituting the mother the natural guardian of her infant children, as between these parties, the strictly legal right of guardianship of this child rests with respondents under its mother's deed; but, without definite ruling on that question, we prefer to rest our decision on the facts found by his honor that the welfare and best interest of the child requires that it remain, for the present, where the deed of the mother has placed it, and where, according to the evidence and findings, in a comfortable home, it has a safe and sheltered life.

We find no error, and the judgment of the court below is affirmed.

NEWBERN v. NEWBERN. (No. 15.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 10, 1919.)

MORTGAGES  $\S$  608½ — CONVERTING DEED INTO MORTGAGE—FRAUDULENT REPRESENTATIONS—EVIDENCE.

An action to convert a deed absolute on its face, opening with the words "This deed," printed in extra large type, into a mortgage, where signed in defendant grantee's absence by plaintiff grantor, an educated, mature man, with full opportunity to examine, cannot be maintained without testimony showing mistake, undue influence, or positive misrepresentation, made and reasonably relied upon by plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Currituck County; Bond, Judge.

Action by A. B. Newbern against J. M. Newbern. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The deed from plaintiff to defendant was dated September 1, 1904, was executed on August 24, 1904, and was recorded on September 20, 1904.

Thompson & Wilson and Meekins & McMullan, all of Elizabeth City, for appellant. Ehringhaus & Small and Aydlott, Simpson & Sawyer, all of Elizabeth City, and A. M. Simmons, of Currituck, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. This was an action by the plaintiff against his brother to convert a deed absolute on its face into a mortgage. In the original complaint there was no allegation that the clause of redemption was omitted by mistake. The amended complaint alleges that "by mistake of the draftsman who drew this paper writing the clause of redemption was omitted therefrom," and "that by reason of the ignorance or the mutual mistake of the parties, or the mistake of the plaintiff and fraud or undue advantage of the defendant, the said clause of redemption was omitted from said writing."

There was testimony by the plaintiff that he and his brother had agreed that the defendant should loan him money in addition to sums already loaned, and that the defendant should be secured by a conveyance of the plaintiff's interest in the lands conveyed by the father to them and their other brothers in remainder after his life estate, and that this agreement was made in North Carolina on plaintiff's visit here, and that he afterwards returned to Oklahoma; where he was then residing and still resides; that thereafter the defendant sent the deed in question to the plaintiff, inclosed in an envelope with a letter stating that it was a deed in trust drawn according to the agreement, and that the plaintiff and his wife executed the deed and returned it to the defendant. It was recorded immediately. This action was not begun until September 18, 1916.

The defendant denied these allegations, and also pleaded the laches of the plaintiff, as well as the 3 and 10 year statutes of limitations. The court directed a judgment of nonsuit. There was no evidence of a mutual mistake, nor of a mistake induced by fraud. It appears by the plaintiff's testimony that he was a man of education, having spent two years at Randolph-Macon College, and that at the time of signing the deed he was a man of maturity, and older than his brother, the defendant.

In Taylor v. Edmunds, 176 N. C. 328, 97 S. E. 43, the court said:

"The mere fact that a grantor who can read and write signs a deed does not necessarily conclude him from showing, as between himself and the grantee, that he was induced to sign by fraud on the part of the grantee, or that he was deceived and thrown off his guard by the grantee's false statements and assurances, designedly made at the time, and reasonably relied on by him."

There are many other cases to the same effect, but in all of them there is a clear statement that there must be evidence either of "fraud in the factum"—that is, an inducement to sign by "trick or device," such as placing the instrument along with several others, as in Taylor v. Edmunds, 176 N. C. 325, 97 S. E. 42—or evidence of positive misrepresentation designedly made and reasonably relied upon. In all other cases the negligence of the party signing the deed to read the same when he had opportunity to so do will bar the assertion of his equity. "Vigilantibus non dormientibus æquitas subvenit." Dellinger v. Gillespie, 118 N. C. 737, 24 S. E. 538, and cases cited thereto in Anno. Ed. In this case, as in that, it may be said:

"It is plain that no deceit was practiced here. It was pure negligence in the defendant not to have read the contract. There it was before him, and there was no trick or device resorted to by the plaintiff to keep him from reading it."

In this instance, the defendant was not present, but, when the deed was signed, 2,000 miles away, and the plaintiff had full opportunity to examine it. It does not appear in the testimony that there was any positive misrepresentation made and reasonably relied upon by the plaintiff. The only evidence relied on is the plaintiff's testimony that in the letter in which the defendant sent the deed he stated that he "had inclosed the deed of trust drawn as per his agreement." He did not produce such letter, and it appears from his testimony that he kept the paper in hand a week before signing. He was a man of education, and the opening words of the paper are "This deed," printed in extra large type.

"In order to correct a deed which is absolute on its face, and to convert it into a security for debt, it must be alleged and proven that the clause of redemption was omitted by reason of ignorance, mistake, fraud, or undue advantage," and the intention must be established by proof, not merely of declarations, but of facts, dehors the deed, inconsistent with the idea of an absolute purchase. Sowell v. Barrett, 45 N. C. 50, citing Streator v. Jones, 10 N. C. 423, and Kelly v. Bryan, 41 N. C. 283, and saying that "otherwise titles evidenced by solemn deeds would be at all times exposed to the slippery memory of witnesses." To the same effect is Brown v. Carson, 45 N. C. 274, and the citations to that case, and to Kelly v. Bryan, supra, in the Anno. Ed.; also the most recent cases, Newton v. Clark, 174 N. C. 393, 93 S. E. 951, and Williamson v. Rabon, 177 N. C. 303, 98 S. E. 830, which are hereby cited and reaffirmed.

The judgment of nonsuit is affirmed.

ROUGHTON v. DUNCAN et al. (No. 16.)

PARTITION  49—PARTIES—INTERVENTION—TIME.

In an action for partition of lands and accounting by defendant for timber cut therefrom, where an order restraining the cutting of the timber was modified, and the purchaser of the timber directed to pay money for same into court, it was proper to allow another party claiming paramount title to the land to intervene and assert his rights.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tyrrell County; Devin, Judge.

Action by A. W. Roughton against B. F. Duncan and others, in which B. F. Spruill intervened. From a judgment in part for intervener, plaintiff excepted and appealed. Affirmed.

This action was instituted on the 27th day of June, 1916, to have a sale for partition of the lands described in the complaint and to compel an accounting by the defendant of the timber cut from the said lands. The plaintiff alleged that he was the owner of a three-fifths undivided interest in the said lands, and that the defendant was the owner of the remaining two-fifths interest. At the time summons issued a temporary restraining order was also issued, enjoining the de-defendant from further cutting upon said lands. At that time the original defendants, Duncan and Pritchard, were in actual adverse possession of the said lands, claiming title thereto; the latter cutting the timber under a contract with the former, and delivering the same, also under contract, to the Southern Roller Stave & Heading Company. On July 20, 1916, the cause coming on again to be heard, the restraining order was modified by consent so as to permit the defendants to continue cutting upon the condition that the money for the timber cut, both before and after the institution of the action, be paid by said company into the hands of the clerk of the superior court of Tyrrell county to await the determination of the action. Under the terms of this order the following payments were made to the said clerk by the said company:

August 14, 1916.....	$124 85
September 12, 1916.....	82 41
September 28, 1916.....	4 31
October 30, 1916.....	119 07

At November term, 1916, one B. F. Spruill, son-in-law of Duncan, upon his own ex parte application made upon affidavit stating that he claimed to be owner of the locus in quo, and asking to be made a party defendant, was permitted by the court to intervene and become a party defendant to said suit. On September 10, 1917, Spruill filed a pleading, in which it appeared that he claimed to own the lands, in hostility to both plaintiff and defendant, upon an alleged paramount and independent title. At October special term, 1917, and at November term, 1917, orders were made in the cause, allowing "time to amend pleadings." At spring term, 1918, of said court, Spruill having failed to amend his pleading so as to allege any cause of action connected with either the plaintiff or defendant, plaintiff after due notice moved to strike out the order of the court allowing Spruill to intervene, and also to strike out the pleading filed by Spruill in consequence of such order. Motion denied, and plaintiff excepted. Upon the trial Spruill, intervener, introduced a chain of paper title deraigned from the state, and vesting in Spruill on August 2, 1916, by deed from John L. Roper Lumber Company.

At the conclusion of the intervener's testimony, and also at the conclusion of the whole evidence, plaintiff moved for judgment as of nonsuit. Motion denied, and plaintiff excepted. Judgment rendered as appears in the record, to which plaintiff excepted and appealed to the Supreme Court.

Meekins & McMullan, of Elizabeth City, for appellants.

Aydlett, Simpson & Sawyer, of Elizabeth City, and B. F. Duncan, for appellees.

Ehringhaus & Small, of Elizabeth City, for intervener.

ALLEN, J. The case of McNair v. Pope, 104 N. C. 351, 10 S. E. 252, is decisive against the plaintiff on both questions presented by the appeal. In that case the action was commenced in 1885 to establish a parol trust, and pending the action a receiver was appointed, who collected certain rents and profits from the land, which he held subject to the order of the court, and A. and W. McQueen were allowed to intervene for the purpose of claiming the rents and profits against both parties to the action under an agricultural lien executed in 1886, and it was held that "his honor very properly allowed A. and W. McQueen, the agricultural lienors, to intervene and assert their alleged rights in the fund held by the receiver," and that it was clear "that the lienors are entitled to be paid for any advances," etc.

ROANOKE R. & LUMBER CO. v. PRIVETTE. (No. 68.)

1. TRIAL  $\S$  194(11)—INVADING PROVINCE OF JURY—INSTRUCTIONS ON EVIDENCE.

In suit for specific performance of a timber option, instructions equivalent to telling the jury that the evidence was uncontradicted that plaintiff was ready and willing to perform the option within 10 days, and that an extension of 15 days' time had been granted the plaintiff, where such contentions were controverted, were erroneous, as invading the province of the jury.

2. TENDER  $\S$  28—OFFER OF CHECK NOT LEGAL TENDER—WAIVER—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Check offered by plaintiff not being legal tender, unless defendant was willing to accept it in lieu of legal tender money, burden was on plaintiff to prove a waiver.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nash County; Bond, Judge.

Action by the Roanoke Railroad & Lumber Company against J. B. Privette. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Error.

Finch & Vaughan, of Nashville, W. H. Yarborough, Jr., of Louisburg, and J. S. Manning and J. Crawford Biggs, both of Raleigh, for appellant.

Austin & Davenport, of Nashville, Bunn & Spruill, of Rocky Mount, and Small, MacLean, Bragaw & Rodman, of Washington, N. C., for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. There are several assignments of error, but the defendant's brief presents but one, and that is sufficient for the disposition of this appeal. The plaintiff sued for specific performance of an option dated March 14, 1917, alleging that within the time prescribed it offered to comply with the terms of the option, and that it was ready, able, and willing to do so. This was denied by the defendant.

The evidence is that it was verbally agreed that the plaintiff was to have an option for 10 days, and that plaintiff's agent, G. D. Taylor, prepared the option, and then read it to the defendant as if it was written for 10 days, but as a matter of fact he left the time blank, and after the option was signed and delivered he testified the defendant agreed to extend the time to 15 days. This is denied by the defendant. It is admitted by the plaintiff that the draftsman, Taylor, its agent, did not insert the 15 days in the option at the time, and it is not clear when it was done, but there is evidence that it was not till after this controversy arose. There was also evidence that Taylor read the option differently from what he had written in other respects. There was evidence on the part of the plaintiff that on March 24, 1917, within the 10 days, the plaintiff was able, ready, and willing to pay the money, and that it so notified the defendant. This is contradicted by evidence for the defendant.

There is also evidence on the part of the plaintiff tending to prove that on March 24th the plaintiff had not decided to take the land, for the plaintiff's witness, Rodman, testified that he went to Nash on March 24th to investigate the title, and plaintiff's witness, Taylor, who was its agent on the ground to secure options, and who prepared this option, wrote under date of March 26th to plaintiff's attorney, Rodman, just after the latter's trip of March 24th to Nash county, as follows:

"Dear Sir: Inclosed find plat of J. B. Privette's land, from which you can get proper description of the timber which we propose to buy from him, provided, however, the company agrees to take it up. If they have agreed to make this purchase, please let me have the deed as early as possible, as Mr. Privette appears to be impatient and dissatisfied."

Rodman testified that he went from Nash to Norfolk, and had a conference on March 26th with the company, and then went home to prepare the deed, and it was forwarded to Taylor, who presented it to the defendant for his signature, with check for $17,500, on March 29th, but the defendant refused to accept the check or execute the deed, because the time limit of 10 days had then expired.

[1] The court charged the jury that "the second issue is, Was the plaintiff company at all times ready, able, and willing to comply with its part of the agreement as alleged in the complaint?" and further told them, "As to second issue, I say, if you believe the evidence in the case and find the facts to be as it tends to prove, your answer to the second issue ought to be 'yes.'" Plaintiff contends that there was a verbal extension of the option to 15 days, but this is denied by the defendant in his testimony, and the charge of the court was equivalent to telling the jury that the evidence was uncontradicted that the plaintiff was ready and willing to perform within the 10 days, yet the defendant testified that no tender or offer was made by that date, and Mr. Rodman was not sent there to make the examination of title till that date, and he did not make his report to the company till March 26th. Taylor's letter of March 26th is evidence that at that time he had received no instructions from the company to close the deal, and, so far as he knew, the company had not then decided to take the property. Under the evidence it was for the jury to say whether the company was ready and willing on March 24th to take the title. The charge of the Court was tantamount to telling the jury that the extension to 15 days had been agreed upon, though this was controverted. This was an invasion of the province of the jury.

[2] It must be noted that the check was not a legal tender, unless there had been evidence that the defendant was willing to accept a check in lieu of $17,500 in legal tender money. The burden was on the plaintiff to prove a waiver.

STATE v. HAYMOND et al. (No. 3612.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 20, 1919. Rehearing Denied Sept. 17,
1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. TAXATION — §855—DISPOSITION OF FORFEITED LAND—SUFFICIENCY OF POSSESSION.

Actual and continuous possession of any part of any one of two or more contiguous tracts of land, forfeited to the state for nonentry for taxation and nonpayment of taxes, by a person claiming all of them under color of title, is a compliance with the requirements of section 8, art. 13, Constitution, and section 40, c. 81, Code (sec. 1099), as to the character of the possession.

2. TAXATION — §852, 855—FORFEITED LANDS — CHARACTER OF POSSESSION — CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

In such case the former owner of the forfeited title has no legal or rightful possession, either actual or constructive. Wherefore the possession of one seeking the benefit of such title by transfer under said constitutional and statutory provisions need not be such as is required to work an ouster or a disseisin of such former owner; and, as between the state and the occupant claiming by possession and payment of taxes, the forfeited title passes by the permission of the former.

3. TAXATION — §855 — FORFEITED LANDS — POSSESSION BY RAILROAD — CHARACTER OF POSSESSION.

Possession of a railroad company by a tenant and its subsequent improvement of the land by construction of a culvert, roadbed, and temporary track, connecting in point of time with the previous possession by the tenant, suffices as to its character, for the purposes of the transfer provisions of the Constitution and statute, respecting forfeited land titles.

*(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)4. APPEARANCE — §20—NOTICE—WAIVER.

The function of process and notice being either to bring parties into court or afford them an opportunity to appear, a voluntary appearance in any proceeding amounts to a waiver of notice.

5. REFERENCE — §65—NOTICE OF PROCEEDINGS.

Lack of notice of the execution of an order of reference, constituting nothing more than a formal and harmless defect or irregularity, does not vitiate the report.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR — §1044 — HARMLESS ERROR—DEFECT IN COMMISSIONER'S NOTICE—WAIVER.

Total lack of notice being insufficient to impeach a commissioner's report, when harmless, a mere defect in a notice, waived by appearance and procedure under it, consisting of taking of full proof as if the notice had been perfect, is no ground for reversal of a decree founded upon the evidence.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Monongalia County.

Bill by the State of West Virginia, by the Commissioner of School Lands of Marion County, for the sale of land, with answer by Kate Preston Haymond and others, claiming a right to redeem and answers by J. Walter Barnes and others, by Harry Shaw, and by the Fairmont, Morgantown & Pittsburgh Railway Company. From a decree granting a redemption to Kate Preston Haymond and others, and denying all title and right of the other answering parties, the Fairmont, Morgantown & Pittsburgh Railway Company appeals. Reversed, and bill dismissed.

Henry S. Lively, of Fairmont, for appellant.
M. L. Sturm, of Fairmont, for the State.
James A. Meredith, of Fairmont, for appellees Haymond and others.

POFFENBARGER, J. The decree brought up by this appeal was entered in a suit instituted in the name of the state by the commissioner of school lands of Marion county, under the provisions of chapter 105 of the Code, for the sale of two small strips of land in the city of Fairmont, bordering on the Monongahela river, and described in the bill and proceedings as lot No. 1, containing .061 of an acre, and lot No. 2, containing .963 of an acre, as having been forfeited for nonentry and nonpayment of taxes in the names of the heirs of Jonathan H. Haymond. Kate Preston Haymond and other heirs of Jonathan H. Haymond appeared and filed their answer to the bill, admitting the forfeiture, claiming right in themselves to redeem, and praying permission so to do. J. Walter Barnes and others filed an answer, claiming right of redemption as to lot No. 1, by virtue of a deed executed by Jonathan H. Haymond, dated February 14, 1849. Harry Shaw filed an answer, in which he claimed himself and one B. G. Williams to have been former owners of part of lot No. 1, by possession and payment of taxes under a deed dated May 13, 1902, and executed by B. F. Gaskins and others, and himself and other persons to have been former owners of part of lot No. 2, by possession and payment of taxes under a deed executed by Benjamin G. Williams to L. C. Powell, trustee, bearing date May 8, 1902. He further avers that his part of lot No. 1 was acquired from him by condemnation proceedings by the Fairmont Morgantown & Pittsburgh Railway Company, in 1914, and that on September 1, 1905, he and his co-owners conveyed their part of lot No. 2, to said railroad company. The railroad company also filed an answer claiming title in itself, denying forfeiture, and praying dismissal of the bill. From a decree adjudging the title to have been forfeited in the name of the heirs of Jonathan H. Haymond, granting them permission to redeem the lands, and denying title and right of redemption in any of the other defendants, the railroad company obtained this appeal.

By an order entered July 10, 1916, in the circuit court of Monongalia county, to which the cause had been transferred by an order previously entered in the circuit court of Marion county, it was referred to John Shriver, one of the commissioners in chancery of the circuit court of Monongalia county and also clerk of the circuit court of that county. He took none of the testimony, however, for it was taken before a notary public in the city of Fairmont, in his absence, by agreement of the parties. After the evidence had been taken and transmitted to him, he made a report, in which he found and held that the two tracts of land had been forfeited for non-entry and nonpayment of taxes and that the Haymond heirs were entitled to redeem them. The appellant filed seven exceptions to this report, the first four of which challenged the correctness of the commissioner's conclusions and findings, while the fifth and sixth attacked the report on special grounds, the taking of the testimony in the absence of the commissioner, and disqualification of the commissioner by reason of his incumbency of the office of clerk of the circuit court. The seventh was general and indefinite. Sustaining the sixth exception and also the seventh, on the ground of a defect in the commissioner's notice, the court set aside the report, but, upon the pleadings and evidence filed in the cause, reached conclusions and findings identical with those set forth in the commissioner's report, and decreed accordingly.

[4-6] The assignment of error based upon defectiveness of the commissioner's notice is not well taken. All of the evidence had been taken in the absence of the commissioner, under an agreement of the parties. The appellant had appeared, cross-examined witnesses, and taken its own proof as fully and completely as it could have done or would have done under the most formal and complete notice. The function of process and notice is either to bring parties into court, or afford them an opportunity to appear, and a voluntary appearance in any proceeding amounts to a waiver of notice. State v. Thacker Coal & Coke Co., 49 W. Va. 140, 38 S. E. 539; Mahany v. Kephart, 15 W. Va. 609; Harvey v. Skipwith, 16 Grat. (Va.) 410. Lack of notice of the execution of an order of reference, constituting nothing more than a formal and harmless defect or irregularity, does not vitiate the report. Taylor v. Dorr, 43 W. Va. 351, 27 S. E. 317; Gardner v. Field, 5 Gray (Mass.) 600; Kellogg v. Putnam, 11 Mich. 344. Total lack of notice being insufficient to impeach a commissioner's report, when harmless, a mere defect in a notice, waived by appearance and procedure under it, consisting of the taking of full proof, as if the notice had been perfect, constitutes no ground for reversal of a decree founded upon the evidence.

Lot No. 1 is a triangular strip fronting on the river, not more than 30 or 40 feet wide at the northeastern end, pointed at the southwestern end, and crossed by a highway bridged over the river near the narrow end. It consists of bluff, river bank, and possibly a little beach, and has no visible building or structure on any part of it, save the bridge. Lot No. 2 is a narrow strip bordering on the river and similar in character to lot No. 1. At the northeastern end it is less than 100 feet wide, and at the other not more than 30. There is no structure of any kind on it, unless it be the ends of the wing walls of a culvert or bridge constructed over a small stream near the north end by the railroad company, and a few railroad ties and rails temporarily laid on part of it. Generally speaking, both lots have been used, for a half century or more, only as a dumping ground for refuse and garbage of various kinds. Numerous witnesses for the state and the Haymond heirs, well acquainted with the property for many years, some of them 50 or 60 years, say they have never seen any inclosure, use, or occupancy of it, indicative of ownership. One or two of them say there was a small house or shack on the larger tract for a while about the year 1863, but nobody knows under whose claim of title it was built or occupied.

The bill and the answer of the Haymond heirs proceed upon the theory that Haymond never parted with his title to the river front. Lot No. 2 lies between the river and the old road known as the mill road, back of which and on parts of the original Haymond tract, conveyed to divers people many years ago, there are numerous substantial improvements. One of these, known as the "Old Pottery Building" and recently demolished, was included in the deed from Powell, trustee, and others, to the railroad company. The Holt deed included two or three dwelling houses back of the mill road, which seem to be still standing and used. Back of lot No. 1 there are very substantial buildings, but they were not included in the railroad company's acquisitions. At least two deeds executed by Jonathan H. Haymond, one to John A. Gallahue, dated July 6, 1847, conveying land back of lot No. 2, and possibly within it, and another to Harrison and Elisha M. Hagans, dated August 12, 1847, and conveying land back of lot No. 1, if not part of lot No. 1 itself, made reservations respecting the river front. It is doubtful whether the deed to Gallahue reserved more than a mere easement, but the other clearly excepts a narrow strip of land adjoining the river. These reservations or exceptions, however, together with the real or apparent nonuse of the river front in lot No. 1 and the strip of land between the mill road and the river in lot No. 2, constitute the basis of the contention in favor of the state and the Haymond heirs.

The land in dispute has not been taxed in the name of Haymond or his heirs since some time prior to the year 1872, and the Haymond title, if any remained undisposed of, has been forfeited for many years, and transferred to occupants under claim or color of title for the requisite periods of time, paying taxes for the requisite number of years, if such there were.

The railroad company holds a deed from John S. Scott, dated January 4, 1906, for the point of lot No. 1 above the bridge, and other land, constituting a single boundary. A small part of lot No. 1, lying northeast of the bridge, it obtained from Harry Shaw and B. G. Williams by a condemnation proceeding, in 1914, after long litigation. For the residue it holds a quitclaim deed, executed by Charles L. Barnes and dated October 21, 1905. By the same deed Barnes conveyed to it a part of lot No. 2 and several hundred lineal feet of additional river frontage adjoining lot No. 2 at the southern end thereof. Clyde S. Holt, by a deed dated September 9, 1905, and L. C. Powell, trustee, and others, by a deed dated September 1, 1905, conveyed the residue of lot No. 2 to the railroad company. Scott's paper title, going to "the river," begins with a deed from Smith Crane and others to William W. Scott, dated August 22, 1865, and there has been possession and payment of taxes, under it for a great many years, possibly from the date of the Crane deed. The Gaskins deed to B. G. Williams, dated May 13, 1902, and the deed from Williams to Shaw, dated January 2, 1903, conveyed a lot running from Water street to the river, and from 1902 until 1914 Williams and Shaw were admittedly in possession of all of it, except the narrow strip along the river, and paid taxes on the whole of it. Such use as they and Scott made of the steep bluff along the river and possibly a few feet on top of it was not conspicuous, and might not comply with the requirements of the law of adverse possession. The tracts or parcels conveyed, respectively, by Barnes, Holt, and Powell and others to the railroad company are all contiguous, and the Powell deed rightfully conveys land outside of lot No. 2, known as the "Old Pottery" property, of which the grantors of the railroad company had incontrovertible possession by a tenant, from the date of their purchase until that of their conveyance to the railroad company, and that company held such possession for the period of five or six years after the conveyance, collecting rent from the tenant. Besides, commencing in 1908 or 1909, it graded a roadbed and laid a temporary track for a considerable distance through that parcel of land and at least one other contiguous lot conveyed to it by the Holt deed. It also built a large concrete culvert on the property outside of lot No. 2. The work of construction was no doubt delayed by the railroad company's difficulty in obtaining title to the right of way through the Williams and Shaw lot. Soon after that obstacle was surmounted, this suit was commenced; the summons having been made returnable to October rules, 1915. For some reason not clearly revealed, the work of construction ceased some years ago, but the evidence of it remains on the ground.

[1, 2] The strips and lots of land conveyed by Powell and others, Holt, and Barnes are all contiguous. They include all of lot No. 2, and extend beyond it to another strip conveyed to the railroad company by Jamison and Crowl, which connects with still another conveyed by Barnes, lying partly within and partly without lot No. 1, and adjoining the lot obtained from Williams and Shaw by the condemnation proceedings. This makes the Barnes lot within lot No. 1 contiguous. The actual possession of part of the land conveyed by Powell and others and one of the lots conveyed by Holt is regarded in law as actual possession of all of these contiguous tracts or lots. Camden v. West Branch Lumber Co., 59 W. Va. 148, 53 S. E. 409; State v. Harman, 57 W. Va. 447, 463, 50 S. E. 828; Overton v. Davison, 1 Grat. (Va.) 212, 42 Am. Dec. 544; Sharp v. Shenandoah Co., 100 Va. 34, 40 S. E. 103; Rich v. Braxton, 158 U. S. 375, 15 Sup. Ct. 1006, 39 L. Ed. 1022. Counsel for the state and for the Haymond heirs erroneously assume that the actual possession required by section 3 of article 13 of the Constitution and section 40 of chapter 31, of the Code (sec. 1099), as an element and condition of the transfer of forfeited land titles, must have all of the requisites of adverse possession, within the meaning of the law of disseisin and ouster. As to lands forfeited to the state for nonentry and nonpayment of taxes, or acquired in any such manner as to make them transferable under the Constitution and statute, there can be no such thing as adverse possession. Lewis v. Yates, 62 W. Va. 575, 59 S. E. 1073; State v. Morgan, 75 W. Va. 92, 83 S. E. 288; State v. Harman, 57 W. Va. 447, 50 S. E. 828; State v. King, 64 W. Va. 545, 63 S. E. 495; Levasser v. Washburn, 11 Grat. (Va.) 572; Staats v. Board, 10 Grat. (Va.) 400. As defined by the Constitution and the statute themselves, the requisites of possession for such purpose are only actuality and continuousness. Forfeiture vests title in the state, and the state cannot be disseised nor ousted by any kind of possession. Continued possession and payment of taxes by the former owner, after forfeiture, amounts to nothing. Lewis v. Yates, cited. Having occasioned the forfeiture, he cannot take the forfeited title by transfer. Constitution, art. 13, § 3; Code, c. 31, § 40 (sec. 1099). By actual and continuous possession and payment of taxes, one who has not caused the forfeiture may obtain the title from the state, not against her will, but agreeably to her will. He is invited and encouraged to comply with the conditions vesting the forfeited title in him. "For the present purpose, it is not a question of adverse possession under the statute of limitations." Judge Brannon, in State v. Harman, cited.

Even in the law of adverse possession, possession of one of two or more contiguous tracts is possession of all, subject to this qualification: That, in the case of conflicting paper title, the possession under the inferior title, to work an ouster, must be within the interlock, the land covered by both titles. Camden v. West Branch Lumber Co., cited; Overton v. Davisson, cited. The authorities relied upon by counsel for the state and the Haymond heirs, in resistance of the effect of actual possession of one of several contiguous tracts, simply affirm and apply this qualification of the general rule. It has no application here, for the Haymond heirs had no title after the forfeiture. As they were no longer seised, there was nothing of which to disseise them, nor anything from which to oust them. Hence the actual possession of the occupants extended to the limits of their color of title, under the common-law rule as to possession in the absence of a conflict of titles, by permission of the state. Such also was the effect of possession above the mill road by occupants whose color of title included parts of the road and of the land between it and the river. The Scott title went to the river, and there was possession, accompanied by payment of taxes, for a great many years, vesting the forfeited Haymond title in the occupants to the full extent of their color of title. Williams and Shaw held possession and paid taxes under a deed going to the river for a period amply sufficient to vest the forfeited title in them, and their title to part of the land was acquired by the railroad company. From 1881 to about 1897, Thos. D. Harden occupied and used the "Old Pottery" property under deeds extending to the river. For the purpose of this litigation, that possession extended to the river. The decision cited for the proposition that a street or road between two tracts of land renders them non-contiguous, or denies the efficacy of a deed for both, as color of title, Bailey v. Carleton, 12 N. H. 9, 37 Am. Dec. 190, does not sustain it. Since a public road is no more than an easement, the tracts between which it runs are necessarily contiguous.

[3] Continuity of the possession of the railroad company is sufficiently established. Before January 1, 1900, it began the grading of its roadbed and afterwards laid a temporary track on it which still remains there, and the culvert constructed across the stream is a substantial structure. Both clearly indicate devotion of the property to railroad purposes. In addition to this, the corners, except at the river, are substantially marked, and, recently, conspicuous notices not to dump refuse on the river bank have been put up. Besides, they had possession of the property conveyed by Powell and others, through a tenant, Hentzy, for five years after the date of that deed, which period connects with the date of the grading and track laying.

The period of actual continuous possession of all the parcels, as herein defined, except the Scott and Williams and Shaw lots, has been amply sufficient, and the taxes thereon have been regularly paid. Scott and Williams and Shaw clearly had title by possession and payment of taxes, which the railroad company has acquired.

When this state of the title was shown, it was the duty of the trial court to dismiss the suit as to the parcels of land in question. Code, c. 105, § 6 (sec. 4438). Hence the decree complained of will be reversed, and the bill dismissed.

COWHERD v. FLEMING et al. (No. 3770.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 13, 1919. Rehearing Denied Sept. 17,
1919.)

1. PERPETUITIES §4(12)—LIFE ESTATE AND REMAINDER—VESTING OF ESTATES.

By his will a testator gave, devised and bequeathed to his executors in trust for his daughter during her natural lifetime all his property real and personal, and provided that after her death whatever remained should go to his lawful heirs, manifestly intending his grandchildren, excepting those specifically named, and also provided that said estate should be held in trust by his executors for twenty-five years, and after eight years and not until then his daughter should be paid a certain sum per annum for the remainder of the trust period, after which period said property should "vest" in his daughter for her lifetime, and after her death whatever remained he willed, devised and bequeathed to those so designated as remaindermen. Properly construed the life estate and also the estate in remainder given by the will vested at the time of the testator's death and were not postponed except in possession beyond the period of the trust thereby created.

2. WILLS §457—INSTRUCTION—TECHNICAL WORDS.

The general rule that technical words are presumed to have been used in their technical sense does not control when considered in conjunction with other expressions of an instrument a different meaning was manifestly intended.

3. WILLS §448—CONSTRUCTION—AVOIDANCE OF INTESTACY—TECHNICAL WORDS.

If possible a will should be so interpreted as to avoid intestacy, and in such cases the context should control technical words, and not the words the context.

4. WILLS §449—PRESUMPTION AGAINST INTESTACY.

There is a presumption against intestacy, which aids general and indefinite language in a will; the presumption being that when a testator makes a will he intends to dispose of his whole estate, and if possible the will should be so interpreted as to avoid total or partial intestacy.

5. WILLS ⇨629—VESTED REMAINDERS.

The law favors the vesting of estates, and when conditional the condition, when possible, will be construed as a condition subsequent, so as to immediately vest the estate.

6. WILLS ⇨440—CONSTRUCTION.

Where the language of a will is clear, the courts have nothing to do but to carry it into effect.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Taylor County.

Bill by Carrie A. Cowherd against O. J. Fleming and others. From a decree for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed, and bill dismissed.

Blue & McCabe, of Charleston, for appellants.

John L. Hechmer and J. Guy Allender, both of Grafton, for appellee.

MILLER, P. The executors of the will of the late Leonard Mallonee obtained this appeal from the decree below pronounced on the bill and their demurrer and answer thereto, adjudging said will to be void under the laws of the state, because violative of the rule against perpetuities, and that plaintiff being the sole surviving heir at law of decedent was entitled to the whole of said estate, and referring the cause to a commissioner to ascertain said estate and for a settlement of the accounts of appellants.

[1] The provisions of the will, including those regarded as voiding it under the ancient rule against restraints upon alienation and remote vestments of estates, are as follows:

"I give devise and bequeath to my said executors, in trust for my daughter Carrie A. Cowherd, during her life time, all of my property, real, personal, mixed, stocks, bonds, money, and all other property whatsoever, upon the condition hereinafter set out.

"I direct that said executors shall cause all of said property to remain intact as it shall be at my death, unless they shall agree that it is for the best interest of my estate that it, or some part of it, should be otherwise disposed of, in which case they are empowered to dispose of any part of it they shall think is to the best interest of my said estate; I also direct that my said executors shall have the power to invest any money which may come into their hands at the time of my death or at any time thereafter in such manner as they shall deem for the best interest of my estate, but I direct that all money belonging to said estate not so invested shall be deposited in the First National Bank of Grafton, West Virginia.

she will receive $8,000 in life insurance which is payable to her; said advancements and said insurance I deem should be sufficient to support her comfortably for 8 years after my death; and I therefore direct that after eight years after my death, and not before the expiration of said eight years, my said executors shall pay to my said daughter, Carrie A. Cowherd, the sum of $600.00 per year out of my said estate for a period of 17 years, making a total of 25 years after my death, after which 25 years said property shall vest in my said daughter for her life time; and after her death, whatever property remains I will, devise and bequeath to my lawful heirs and distributees other than my granddaughters Cornelia H. Cowherd, Katherine S. Cowherd and Carrie A. Cowherd, which three granddaughters shall take no part of my estate; but should my said daughter die within 25 years after my death, then said executors shall hold said estate intact in trust for my said heirs and distributees other than Cornelia H. Cowherd, Katherine S. Cowherd and Carrie A. Cowherd until the end of said period of 25 years, after which it shall vest in the said heirs and distributees other than Cornelia H. Cowherd, Katherine S. Cowherd and Carrie A. Cowherd."

We think it plainly apparent from these provisions of the will that the plan or scheme of the testator was to give his entire estate to his daughter Carrie, his only child, for life, with remainder to her children, erroneously described as his heirs, excepting the three granddaughters mentioned, but to be held by his executors in trust as provided, for twenty-five years, and for the reasons assigned, postponing possession and the full usufruct thereof for the period of the trust in any event. That the testator meant grandchildren when he made use of the words "my lawful heirs and distributees" is plainly manifest by the context, for he specifically excepts three granddaughters from the class of persons named as remaindermen. His intention is thus made clear; there is no room left for doubt or uncertainty.

That such was the plain purpose of the testator we do not see how there can be any doubt. Are the words employed in the will competent to work out this result and avoid the rule invoked against it? We think they are. The only argument presented against this construction is that by force of the words of the third paragraph quoted, "after which 25 years said property shall vest in my said daughter for her life time," and those following the provision conditioned on the death of the daughter within the period of the trust and the expiration thereof, namely, "after which it shall vest in the said heirs and distributees other than" etc., the testator thereby postponed vesting of the life estate in the daughter as well as the estate in the remainder beyond the period of a life in being and twenty-one years and ten months. But if, as we may, we read the words of the third paragraph first quoted in connection with the first paragraph giving a life estate to Mrs. Cowherd, it is clear that the testator meant that the estate for life and the estate in remainder should both vest immediately on his death, but to postpone possession and full enjoyment during the period of the trust. So transposed the will would read:

"I give, devise and bequeath to my said executors, in trust for my daughter Carrie A. Cowherd during her life time all my property real, personal, mixed, stocks, bonds, money and all other property whatsoever, and after her death whatever property remains I will, devise and bequeath to my lawful heirs and distributees other than my granddaughters," etc.

Of course, if we should give to the word "vest" used in these clauses its strict technical meaning, contrary to the manifest purpose of the testator, the result might be different, but this would do violence to the plain intent of the testator.

[2, 3] The general rule invoked, that technical words are presumed to have been used in their technical sense, has very little, if any, application if when considered in conjunction with other expressions or provisions of the instrument a different meaning was manifestly intended. Hinton v. Milburn's Ex'rs, 23 W. Va. 166; Baer v. Forbes, 48 W. Va. 208, 36 S. E. 364; Collins v. Feather, 52 W. Va. 107, 43 S. E. 323, 61 L. R. A. 660, 94 Am. St. Rep. 912. And where as here the same word is used in several places in the instrument, it is to be understood in the same sense. Tomlinson v. Nickell, 24 W. Va. 148, 149. But, as this case holds, even this rule has its exceptions; that if a word having a technical meaning is accompanied by a context in a clause showing that the testator did not intend it to be understood in its technical sense, but when used in another clause in reference to a different subject unaccompanied by anything explanatory of it, it is to receive its technical meaning.

[4-6] There is a presumption against intestacy, and as our cases hold general and indefinite language in a will is aided by this presumption. The presumption is that when a testator makes a will he intends to dispose of his whole estate, and if possible the will should be so interpreted as to avoid total or partial intestacy. Wildell Lumber

Co. v. Turk, 75 W. Va. 26, 83 S. E. 83, and cases cited. The theory of the decree that by the provisions of the will vesting of both the life estate and the estate in remainder were postponed for twenty-five years, the period of the trust, does not well comport with the provision for payment by the trustees to Mrs. Cowherd after eight years of the sum of six hundred dollars per annum for the remainder of that period, nor with the clause providing that if then living she should come into full possession and control of the whole estate. Nor is it consistent with the plain gift of the life estate in the first paragraph, for the condition following limiting the enjoyment thereof for twenty-five years can in no way affect the vesting of the estate. There is here no restraint on the power of alienation of the estate given, so as to bring the devises and bequests within the rule, and there is a well defined and specific disposition by the testator of his whole estate. Shall we allow his will to be defeated by technical words, and render him intestate? The rule, as already indicated, is that in such cases the context will control the words, and not the words the context, where the context renders the meaning clear. Hope Nat. Gas Co. v. Shriver, 75 W. Va. 401, 83 S. E. 1011. The law favors vesting of estates, and when conditional, the condition when possible will be construed as a condition subsequent, so as to confer immediate vesting of the estate. Suter v. Suter, 68 W. Va. 690, 70 S. E. 705, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 405. Where the language of the will is as clear and certain as in this case, we have little need for calling into requisition rules of construction. In such cases the courts have nothing to do but to carry it into effect. Couch v. Eastham, 29 W. Va. 784, 3 S. E. 23.

What the rights of the remaindermen may be, as to the possession of the property devised to them, in the event of the death of the life tenant within the period of the trust created in the trustees, a contingency not now involved, we do not undertake to decide. That question we properly reserve as involving a condition which may never arise, and it should not be anticipated and concluded by this decision. Prichard, Trustee, v. Prichard et al., 98 S. E. 877.

Our conclusion is to reverse the decree and dismiss the bill.

The points of the syllabus in Merrill v. Marietta Torpedo Co., 79 W. Va. 669, 92 S. E. 112, L. R. A. 1917F, 1043, approved.

Miller, P., dissenting.

Error to Circuit Court, Roane County.

Action by Estella F. McClain, administratrix, against the Marietta Torpedo Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Pendleton, Mathews & Bell, of Spencer, for plaintiff in error.

Thos. P. Ryan and H. C. Ferguson, both of Spencer, and Chas. E. Hogg, of Point Pleasant, for defendant in error.

WILLIAMS, J. Plaintiff, administratrix of her deceased husband, Clark R. McClain, recovered a judgment against the Marietta Torpedo Company in an action of trespass for negligently causing his death, and defendant brings error.

[1] His death was caused by the premature explosion of nitroglycerine at an oil well in Roane county, known as the Jacob Reynolds well No. 3, where defendant's agent, William Norris, had taken it for the purpose of shooting the well. It was the same accident by which Edward P. Merrill was injured, and for which he recovered a judgment against this same defendant, which was affirmed on writ of error to this court. Merrill v. Marietta Torpedo Co., 79 W. Va. 669, 92 S. E. 112, L. R. A. 1917F, 1043.

Defendant is engaged in the manufacture of nitroglycerine and shooting oil wells, and employed William Norris as its agent to shoot wells. The facts and circumstances disclosed by the evidence in this case are very much the same as they were in the Merrill Case. Some additional facts, however, appear in this case that were not brought out in the other. Here a carefully prepared map was filed, showing the relative locations of the oil well derrick, boiler, engine, belt house walkway leading from the engine to the derrick; the 60-barrel water tank; the barrel of water in which plaintiff claims the nitroglycerine exploded, the place on the ground between the barrel and the tank where witness Norris swears he laid the cans containing the nitroglycerine and where defendant contends it exploded; Norris's wagon in which he hauled the nitroglycerine to the well; Merrill's position and the position of deceased's body immediately after the explosion, and other objects; and testimony tending to prove the ground was torn up by the force of the explosion between the barrel and the tank, that mud was spattered up on the derrick, and that Merrill, the chief witness for plaintiff, had made contradictory statements concerning the cause of the accident. Otherwise, the evidence in the two cases is not materially different.

The declaration contains a number of counts, some of them counting on the negligent manner in which defendant handled the nitroglycerine, without specifying any particular act of negligence causing it to explode. But the only count to sustain which any evidence was offered alleges that the specific act of negligence causing the injury was the suspending of two cans of frozen nitroglycerine, containing 8 quarts each, in a barrel of water into which one end of a steam pipe attached to the engine had been inserted, and then turning the steam in for the purpose of heating the water and thawing the nitroglycerine, so that it could be transferred from the cans into torpedoes and lowered into the well.

Only two eyewitnesses testify concerning the cause of the accident, Merrill for the plaintiff, and Norris for defendant, the former a well driller in the employ of the Ohio Fuel Oil Company, the owner of the well, and the latter the servant and agent of the Marietta Torpedo Company, who had contracted to shoot the well. These witnesses were not fellow servants, nor was deceased, who was a tool dresser employed by the Ohio

Fuel Oil Company, a fellow servant of Norris. Shortly after noon on March 30, 1914, Norris brought to the well, in a spring wagon, 40 quarts of nitroglycerine put up in cans of 8 quarts each. He unhitched his horses, tied them some distance away from the wagon, and left it standing in the road, above and not far from the engine house. Witness Merrill and deceased then got an oil barrel that had been used about the derrick, and placed it on the floor of the engine house at an opening in the wall, allowing a portion of the bottom of the barrel to rest on the board walk outside, which was on a level with the floor. Deceased assisted Norris in connecting a steam pipe to the grease cup of the engine, extending the pipe to a point above, and directly over, the barrel, and to this another joint leading down into and near the bottom of the barrel was attached, thus forming an ell. Merrill filled the barrel with water from the tank, and Norris then got some nails and drove them into the tops of the staves, for the purpose of suspending the cans in the water by means of strings tied to the handles of the cans. Up to this time there is no conflict in the testimony.

Norris swears, after the steam was turned into the barrel, that he went up to the wagon, got two cans of nitroglycerine and carried them down, one in each hand, to the engine house, and carefully laid them down on the ground between the barrel and the water tank; that he put his hand in the water to ascertain whether it was sufficiently heated, to thaw the nitroglycerine, and, finding that it was, told deceased to disconnect the steam pipe, and immediately returned to the wagon to get two more cans; that he was at the upper side of the wagon, facing the engine house, in the act of lifting the cans out when Merrill, who was then at the flywheel of the engine, endeavoring to attach the clamps that hold the reel used to let the measuring line down in the well in order to ascertain its depth, preparatory to lowering the nitroglycerine into it, asked witness on which side of the clamps the washers were intended to go; that witness replied to him to leave them as they were, and stooped to get an awl out of his tool box, with which to uncork the cans, and just as he raised up the explosion occurred; that the end of the engine house next to the wagon was open, and he could plainly see Merrill, but that a corner of the engine house obstructed his view of the barrel and the two cans which he had laid on the ground; that he did not then see McClain, but when he started to the wagon he left him in the act of disconnecting the steam pipe from the barrel with his hands; that he and McClain had connected it with their hands, and McClain was endeavoring to disconnect it in the same manner; that it could not have been more than two minutes after he started to the wagon before the explosion occurred, and that he did not put the cans in the barrel, nor direct any one else to do so; and that they were not in it when he started back to the wagon.

On the other hand, Merrill swears he saw the cans in the barrel just before the explosion, and the steam pipe was still connected and the steam going into the barrel, causing the water to bubble up; that a moment before the explosion, when he was asking Norris about the clamps, deceased was standing on the opposite side of the engine from him, looking into a tool box. Witness Belt, for the plaintiff, says he was at the well just before the accident, passed by the barrel, and did not see the cans in it, nor did he see them on the ground. But he says he left five or six minutes before the explosion, and had gone 150 or 200 yards, walking up hill carrying a pretty heavy load, before it occurred. His evidence does not contradict either Merrill or Norris, and has no probative value on the vital question whether the nitroglycerine was in the barrel or on the ground when it exploded. There was time enough, after he left the engine house, for Norris to bring it from the wagon and either put it in the barrel or lay it on the ground and return to the wagon, which was only 50 or 60 feet away.

A number of witnesses, qualified by their experience in handling nitroglycerine to speak as experts, say the usual and approved method of thawing frozen nitroglycerine is to immerse it in water previously heated to 120° to 160° Fahrenheit; and, if Norris' testimony is true, he was preparing to thaw it in that manner. All of the experts say it is considered dangerous to thaw it by suspending it in cold water and then heating the water, or by allowing the steam to be discharged, creating a commotion in the water while the nitroglycerine is suspended in it.

A sharp and irreconcilable conflict exists between Norris and Merrill, and counsel for defendant insist that the testimony of the latter is overcome by the physical facts and conditions produced by the explosion, some of which are not disputed. Staves of the barrel, in which the explosion is alleged to have occurred, were sheared off by the force of the explosion, from the second hoop above the bottom, on the side next to the water tank, sloping up to the top on the opposite side, leaving the bottom apparently intact. This fact, they say, demonstrates the falsity of Merrill's testimony, because expert witnesses express the opinion that if 16 quarts of nitroglycerine had exploded in the barrel, it would have blown the barrel to pieces and torn up the platform upon which it rested. Three or four witnesses for defendant testified concerning an experiment witnessed by them a day or two before the trial. A pound and ten ounces, about a pint, of nitroglycerine was placed in a can, the can was then suspended in the same kind of a barrel, a common oil barrel, filled to within three inches of the top with water, and set upon a platform, erected out of timbers of the same dimensions as those used in the floor of the engine house, and the nitroglycerine was exploded by means of a fuse and cap, and they say the barrel was blown to pieces, the timbers in the platform broken up, and only two or three small pieces of the barrel staves could be found. The expert witnesses also give it as their opinion that nitroglycerine will not explode automatically or spontaneously; that it must be exploded by some extraneous agency; that the explosion operates with equal force in all directions; and that, in their opinion, the explosion could not have taken place in the barrel, as Merrill says it did, without totally destroying the barrel. But it is not shown that these witnesses ever experimented with frozen nitroglycerine in a similar manner and under like circumstances to those which Merrill says existed here. If Merrill's testimony is true, the explosion occurred in the barrel, and was caused either by the water becoming too hot, or by the steam creating a commotion in the water and causing the cans to strike against each other or against the side of the barrel, and if it occurred in either way it would show negligence on the part of defendant's agent Norris, for it is proven, and not controverted, that that manner of thawing it is considered dangerous. Merrill says McClain was not at the barrel then, but was in the engine house on the farther side of the engine house from the barrel, and that he himself was at the flywheel of the engine, on the side next to the barrel. It must be admitted that the physical facts tend to contradict Merrill, but it cannot be said they are of such conclusive character as to outweigh his positive testimony. The results of an explosion of nitroglycerine are not always the same, and are not matters of such common experience and knowledge as to justify the conclusion, under the circumstances and conditions here shown to exist, that it could not possibly have exploded in the barrel without destroying it entirely. Explosions do not always produce uniform results, and the results produced in this instance were evidential facts for the jury to weigh and consider, along with the testimony of witnesses, and we cannot say they did not give them such probative value as in their judgment was proper. If the explosion did not take place as Merrill says it did, it is not accounted for in any manner shown by the record. For the space of two or three minutes preceding the explosion, according to Norris' testimony, after he laid the two cans down on the ground and returned to the wagon for more, he did not see McClain. Merrill places him farther from the barrel than himself, the instant before the explosion, and they were the only persons near it; and all the expert witnesses, none of whom are contradicted in that respect, say nitroglycerine will not explode spontaneously. If Norris' testimony is true, the manner in which he says he handled the nitroglycerine and was preparing to thaw it was very careful, according to the opinions of all the expert witnesses, including himself, and he has had many years' experience and says he has shot hundreds of wells. The jury has passed on the credibility of these two witnesses, and has considered the results of the explosion, affecting their credibility, and, in answer to certain interrogatories propounded to it by the court, at the request of defendant, has returned a special verdict, finding that Norris placed the nitroglycerine in the barrel after he and McClain had connected the steam pipes and before he returned to the wagon; that McClain and Norris made the steam pipe connections, and that it believed Norris told deceased to disconnect the pipe, but that it did not know whether deceased had attempted to disconnect the pipe or not, and did not know how far McClain was away from the nitroglycerine when it exploded, and did not believe the cans were on the ground. These special findings harmonize with the general verdict, and those questions which the jury were unable to answer are not essential to establish negligence on the part of defendant.

Two witnesses for defendant testify that Merrill, just after he came out of the hospital and before he brought his action against this defendant, said in their presence that he did not know how to account for the accident, unless McClain dropped a piece of pipe or a monkey-wrench on the cans. Merrill denies making this statement. A copy of the original declaration in Merrill's case was introduced for the purpose of showing that it was framed on a different theory of negligence from that averred in his amended declaration and in the declaration in this action, that the original declaration did not count upon negligence in suspending the cans in the barrel of water and then turning the steam into the barrel, but that it was thereafter amended so as to do so. This apparent inconsistency between Merrill's averments in his original declaration and his testimony is explained by witness Boggess, a member of the firm of Ryan & Boggess, who prepared the declaration. Boggess says Merrill's hearing was so much affected as a result of his injury that it was very difficult to communicate with him, and that he got most of the data from which the declaration was prepared from Merrill's brother. The jury considered all these matters offered to impeach the witness and has determined the facts upon the conflicting oral testimony, and the court has no right to disturb its finding in respect thereto.

Two or three witnesses say the ground seemed to be blown up between the barrel and the water tank, and one of them, O. F.

Bergwin, drilling foreman for the Ohio Fuel Oil Company, says he was not present when the explosion occurred, but came there a very short time afterwards on March 30th, and while working around the place stepped in a hole filled with mud and water, between the place where the water tank stood and where the barrel sat. But other witnesses, who came on the ground immediately after the explosion, say they did not see any hole, or notice that the ground had been torn up. The boards and timbers of the engine house and the staves of the water tank were scattered by the force of the explosion in every direction, only a few of the staves of the tank, on the side farthest from the point of the explosion, being left standing. Merrill, in an unconscious condition, and the body of deceased were found on the boardwalk leading from the engine house along by the belt shed to the derrick, about 25 feet from the barrel, Merrill being the farthest from the barrel. H. H. Robey, an undertaker, who prepared the body of deceased for burial, in describing the condition of his body says the head, left side, and left arm were mashed; that all the bones of the left arm were broken, and the head mashed into a pulp, but that the skin was not broken badly, and the face was not unrecognizable, and the legs and right arm were intact; that the left hand was in fair condition, but that from the wrist up to the shoulder the left arm was considerable lacerated. It is impossible to tell from the position of the body just where McClain was standing, and whether the explosion occurred in the barrel or on the ground, because the same result might have been produced by the explosion if it occurred at either of these points. It is difficult to explain, if McClain was standing where Merrill says he was, on the opposite side of the engine, how his body could have been thrown in the same direction that Merrill was. The jury may have concluded Merrill was mistaken as to the exact location of deceased at the instant of the explosion, or that his body might have been blown against some of the timbers of the shed and its course thereby deflected. But it is just as difficult to explain how the same force blew the timbers of the engine house and staves of the water tank in every direction, a fact not disputed. But all these are questions of fact for the jury, and, without invading their domain, the court cannot say their verdict is not supported by the evidence, or is even against the decided preponderance of the evidence; and hence we think the court properly overruled defendant's motion to set it aside and grant it a new trial.

The giving of eight instructions for the plaintiff and the refusal to give three for defendant, designated A, 2, and 13, are complained of. We have carefully considered these assignments, and do not think they show error. Defendant's instruction A was a peremptory one. Nos. 2 and 13 relate to assumption of risk by deceased, if the jury should believe he voluntarily, or at Norris' request, undertook to assist him in the hazardous work of thawing the nitroglycerine. One, not a fellow servant, does not assume the risk of injury resulting from the negligence of another, and there was no error in refusing these instructions.

[2, 3] The court refused defendant's request to be permitted to demonstrate to the jury the effect produced by exploding a pint of nitroglycerine suspended in a barrel of water, and this is assigned as error. This experiment was intended to prove the falsity of Merrill's statement that the explosion took place in the barrel, by demonstrating that the barrel would have been thereby entirely destroyed. When an experiment is offered to be made for such purpose, the rule is that it must be performed under conditions similar to those governing the result to be proved or disproved (5 Ency. Evid. 483), and the court may have considered it impracticable to reproduce all the former conditions, within a reasonable time and during the progress of the trial. The frozen state of the nitroglycerine, the steam, forced into the water underneath the cans of nitroglycerine, causing the water to bubble up, may have caused the explosion to produce results variant from those that would have been produced if it had been exploded in some other manner. The allowance of such experimentation is within the discretion of the trial court. State v. Smith, 49 Conn. 376; Polin v. State, 14 Neb. 540, 16 N. W. 898; Leonard v. South. Pac. R. R., 21 Or. 555, 28 Pac. 887, 15 L. R. A. 221; Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Mugg, 132 Ind. 168, 31 N. E. 564; Smith v. St. Paul City R. R. Co., 32 Minn. 1, 18 N. W. 827, 50 Am. Rep. 550; and 3 Jones on Evidence, § 410. However, the court permitted witnesses to testify in regard to the results of an experiment made a day or two before the trial, and there was certainly no abuse of discretion in refusing defendant's request to be allowed to repeat the experiment in the presence of the jury somewhere out of court.

This case is controlled by the principles announced in the Merrill Case, supra, and the judgment will be affirmed.

MILLER, P. (dissenting). I am unable to concur in the opinion of the court in this case. The only theory of negligence relied on at the trial was that the cans of glycerine were suspended in the water barrel and the steam negligently turned into the water, resulting in the explosion. The evidence shows that Merrill, the only witness offered to prove this alleged act of negligence, told a different story immediately after the accident, not only to his counsel but to one or two other witnesses, and the original decla-

Everett F. Moore, of Moundsville, and J. B. Allison, of Cameron, for appellee, relied on the following propositions and authorities in support thereof:

Whenever there exists between parties confidence on the one hand and influence on the other, from whatsoever cause they may spring, equity requires in all dealings between them the highest degree of a good faith on the part of him in whom the confidence is reposed. If a conveyance was executed in his favor, the burden rests upon him of proving that it was not procured by means of such confidence and influence. ration in the case was based on a different theory and a different statement of facts. Afterwards a new or amended declaration was filed. The original theory of the explosion was that McClain was at the water barrel adjusting some steam connections, and had accidentally dropped some tool or piece of pipe on the glycerine lying on the ground near the water barrel where Norris had placed it, causing the explosion. The new theory advanced in the amended declaration and by the evidence of Merrill on the trial was that Norris, who was engaged in assembling the cans at the derrick preparatory to shooting the well, had suspended in the water barrel the first cans brought and negligently turned on the steam and then proceeded to the wagon to bring up the other cans, a most improbable story I think, considering that he was an expert of many years experience in handling glycerine and shooting oil wells. Merrill's evidence on the trial was not only that the cans of glycerine had been so suspended in the barrel, but that McClain at the instant of the explosion was not at the water barrel, as he and Norris both originally agreed, but was at a tool box in the engine room on the side of the engine opposite the place where Merrill was at work.

This new theory that the cans of glycerine were so negligently suspended in the water barrel and that McClain was in the engine room at the time of the explosion, are flatly controverted by Norris, and disproven by every single physical fact apparent after the explosion and by every law of physical science, as well as by the actual test subsequently made under circumstances as nearly like those existing at the well as it was possible to make them. Little attempt is made in the opinion to reconcile these physical facts with the evidence of Merrill at the trial, except on the theory that strange results are often produced in such cases. It is impossible to account for the condition or position of McClain's body immediately after the accident, on the theory that he was at the place where Merrill located him. The opinion says that the body might have struck some part of the building and glanced off. No facts proven justify such a theory. The condition of the left side of his face and his left arm, bruised and mutilated as they were, can only be accounted for on the theory that McClain was at or near the barrel, where Norris says he was. The great hole in the ground immediately at the place where Norris says he laid the glycerine, the mud on the derrick, the position and condition of McClain's face and arm, the condition of the water barrel and other physical facts appearing immediately after the explosion, all show clearly that the cans of glycerine could not have been in the barrel when the explosion occurred. I would reverse the judgment.

St. Rep. 464, where an infant was dissipated and a spendthrift, and the purchaser a much older man, the court said "that the plaintiff knew beforehand how the money would be dissipated, and that the law would not justify that sort of dealing, and deeds so obtained will be set aside." The same rule is recognized in Schuttler v. Brandfass, 41 W. Va. 207, 23 S. E. 808, though applied to a different state of facts.

WILLIAMS, J. Defendant, William Davis, has appealed from two decrees of the circuit court of Marshall county, pronounced on the 20th of June, 1916, and the 28th of February, 1917, respectively, availing a conveyance to him of a tract of land by William G. Bole, made the 9th of October, 1913, the day Bole became 21 years of age. He was an only child and heir at law of his mother, from whom he inherited the land. His mother died about the year 1902, and his father about the year 1909. James D. Burley was appointed his guardian in 1902, and continued as such until he reached his majority, and the boy resided with his father until the latter's death. By means of a friendly suit the guardian sold the coal under the land, described by metes and bounds and as containing 69 acres and 125 poles. The fund derived therefrom, amounting to $662.92, went into the guardian's hands. The expectation of coming into possession of this fund, when he should become of age, enabled the boy to obtain credit from a number of people, on his promise that he would then pay them. There was an oil and gas lease on the land, and the rentals in lieu of drilling amounted to $120 per year. In his final settlement, apparently not yet approved by the court, the guardian charges himself with $390 derived from this source, thus showing a sum in his hands to the credit of his ward, at the time he became of age, of $671.25. On the 17th of January, 1914, on the order of his ward, the guardian turned over to C. A. Showacre, his attorney, the balance of this fund, after crediting himself with certain disbursements on his ward's account. The sum turned over to his ward's attorney is $286.79. These facts are significant in considering the weight of evidence concerning Bole's alleged imbecility and incapacity, and whether the charge, that Davis exerted an undue influence over him and fraudulently induced him to convey his land to him, is sustained.

[1, 2] In the spring of 1913 Bole married a woman much older than himself by the name of Stella Patterson, and began housekeeping with her on his little farm. Soon thereafter he separated from her, charging her with adultery; and, being well acquainted with defendant Davis, he disclosed to him his domestic troubles. Thereupon Davis advised him he had good ground for a divorce from his wife. Bole then consulted an attorney, who advised him that, as he had continued to cohabit with his wife after he knew of her guilty conduct, he thereby condoned the offense and could not obtain a divorce. This happened before he was of age. On the 21st of July, 1914, about nine months after he became of age, Charles E. Carrigan was appointed a committee for him on motion therefor made by his wife, Stella, to whom apparently he had shortly before become reconciled, and this suit was instituted by his committee on the 24th of the following August. The presumption of law is that, at the time Bole made the deed, he was sane, and his committee has the burden of proving otherwise. Buckey v. Buckey, 38 W. Va. 168, 18 S. E. 333; Delaplain v. Grubb, 44 W. Va. 612, 30 S. E. 201, 67 Am. St. Rep. 788; and Eakin v. Hawkins, 52 W. Va. 124, 43 S. E. 211. Bole understood and appreciated the nature, character and effect of the transaction, and that shows he had sufficient mental capacity to satisfy the rule of law. "Eccentricity of manner and mental weakness of the grantor which does not amount to imbecility are not sufficient to overthrow a deed in the absence of proof of fraud in its procurement." Black v. Post, 67 W. Va. 253, 67 S. E. 1072.

Plaintiff prays that the deed be canceled on two grounds: First, that his ward was non compos mentis and incapable of understanding such a transaction; and, second, that defendant exerted an undue influence over his ward, and induced him to make the deed by fraudulent and improper means. The depositions in the case make a voluminous record, over 700 pages. It is an unnecessary task which can serve no useful purpose to review in this opinion the conflicting testimony. Many witnesses have testified respecting Bole's mental capacity, and their opinions are diametrically opposed to one another. Two or three physicians and very many lay witnesses for the plaintiff swear, in their opinions, that he was not mentally capable of transacting business. But the doctors who so testified made no particular examination of him, and only a few of plaintiff's other witnesses had had personal transactions or dealings with him, and their opinions were based on general impressions received from conversations with the boy and from neighborhood rumors. On the other hand, many witnesses for defendant testified that he was as capable of understanding and appreciating the nature of a transaction as any one else. Dr. C. A. Wingerter, the only expert witness, a specialist in mental and nervous diseases with an experience of eight years or more, saw Bole on three occasions, and on two of them made a careful examination of him with a view of ascertaining whether he had any mental disease or was in any way abnormal. He examined him for two hours on each occasion, and his opinion is that he had the capacity to understand the nature, character, and effect of business transactions, and that he was normal. The late distinguished judge below whose written opinion in the case is copied in brief of counsel for appellee, held that mental incompetency was not shown. On the contrary, he says:

"That brought to face a transaction he understands the act and what it means. * * * He is not destitute of intelligence, but he is without judgment."

[3] However, the court annulled the deed on the ground that Davis had induced Bole to make it by fraudulent means and undue influences exerted over him. But we hardly think this conclusion is justified by the weight of the evidence. Before he became of age, Bole induced many persons to extend him credit on his promise of paying them out of the funds in the hands of his guardian when he became of age. He thereby deceived almost every one who is shown to have had any dealings with him. He made many such promises and kept none of them. Such conduct may indicate moral obliquity, but it certainly does not tend to prove mental incapacity. Concerning his dealings with Davis, he and Davis are the most important witnesses, and, as to the important transactions, the only witnesses. Bole first applied to Davis for money some time in March, 1913, telling him he was in need of clothing. Davis then let him have about $10, and continued to advance sums of money to him after that time, varying in amounts, until some time in the month of October, 1913, on the faith of Bole's promise to pay him out of the fund in his guardian's hands when he became of age. Davis kept an itemized account of the money advanced to Bole, and, when evidenced by check, produces the checks indorsed by Bole, and when paid in cash produces Bole's receipts therefor. Bole swears he kept no account, and admits giving receipts to Davis, and when they were shown to him admitted the genuineness of his signature thereto, but denied recollection of many of the particular transactions. The court referred the cause to a commissioner to state an account of the sums of money advanced by Davis to Bole before he reached the age of 21, the amount advanced after that time, and how much advanced during either period was for necessities. The commissioner reported that Davis had advanced him $323 before he became 21, to which he added $13.23 for a suit of clothes as of October 6, 1913, and from the total deducted $60 which he found Davis had collected on oil and gas rental checks which should have been turned over to Bole, thus leaving a balance of $276.23 as the amount advanced in the first period, and reported $295 advanced in the second period, from which he found there should be deducted $106.79, the amount of Showacre's check for the balance of the personal fund turned over to said Showacre as Bole's attorney, by J. D. Burley, his guardian, and collected by Davis, thus leaving $188.21 as the amount actually advanced. Of the entire advancements he reported on $79.23 was for necessities, $14.23 before he became of age and $65 afterwards.

If Bole was compos mentis, and we think the court below was right in concluding that he was, it is immaterial whether the money advanced was for necessities or not, or whether it was advanced before or after he became of age. Because, after coming of age, he could validate his contracts made during infancy, and his acknowledgment of the money received during infancy constituted a valuable consideration for the conveyance in the absence of fraud. An infant's contracts are not void, but voidable at his election. Hobbs v. Hinton Foundry Co., 74 W. Va. 443, 82 S. E. 267, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 410; and Blake v. Hollandsworth, 71 W. Va. 387, 76 S. E. 814, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 714.

Bole tries to make it appear that Davis continually advanced him money to enable him to have a good time, in order that he might thereby subject him to his wily influence and procure his land for nothing or for a very small consideration. He swears Davis encouraged him to spend his money in having what he calls a "good time" with dissolute women. Davis denies this, and is supported in his denial by Bole's own letters written to Davis when Bole was in Canton, Ohio, pretending he was at work earning money. Davis does not claim to have paid all the consideration for the land before the time the deed was made; much of the money was paid afterward. Bole is convicted of lying by his own testimony, and is unworthy of belief. In fact, he admits he lied to his attorneys when he was indicted for arson. He was in Canton, Ohio, in the spring of 1914, and wrote to Davis a number of times for money. After Davis had sent him \$25 on two occasions he wrote him for more money, and tried to make Davis believe he was saving his money, by writing that he had deposited the \$50 in bank at 4 per cent. interest, that he was then employed on a job but would not get his pay for four weeks, that he needed some money to pay his board, and could not draw his money out of the bank, as it was deposited on time. This and other letters of similar character contradict the charge that Davis was encouraging him to spend his money in riotous living. Davis swears he had no idea of buying his land until after he had advanced him money, but that he expected the boy would repay him out of the fund he claimed he would receive from his guardian when he became of age, and did not learn until near the time he became of age that all his fund had been dissipated. Bole's guardian turned over only \$286.79 to his attorney Showacre, and the bulk of that was paid out by the latter in satisfaction of attorney fees for defending Bole on the indictment for arson. The house he was charged with burning was located on his own land and was filled with hay, a part of which belonged to a tenant who had farmed or lived on his place and whom he disliked. When the indictment was pending, he claimed he burned it accidentally by dropping a lighted cigarette in some combustible material. Upon investigating the evidence to sustain the charge, the prosecuting attorney was of the opinion that it was not sufficient to warrant a conviction, and nollied the case. In his testimony in this case Bole now admits he burned the building purposely because he was mad at his tenant. How is such a witness to be believed where it is to his interest to swear falsely? Davis swears that Bole first approached him with an offer to sell him his land about the time he became of age, and after Davis had learned that the fund in his guardian's hands had been nearly consumed and there was no chance of being repaid from that source, and that he bought the land as the only means of protecting himself. It is a rough, steep place, badly grown up in bushes, the fences in bad condition, with no buildings of any value on it, with the coal underlying it and mining privileges sold, and contains about 80 acres, only a small per centum of which is tillable. The nearest producing oil or gas well is  $1\frac{1}{2}$  or 2 miles distant. How long the lessee would continue to pay rental on the oil and gas lease was problematical, and whether the property contains oil or gas no one knows. The consideration recited in the deed is \$900, and Davis swears Bole fixed the price himself, and is corroborated by Bole's own statement made to Dr. Wingerter, who says that in one of his conversations with Bole he told him he went to Davis and offered to sell him the place, that the reason he gave for doing so was that Davis had at previous times befriended him, that he had determined to sell the farm, and, while he might have gotten a little more for it from some one else, still out of gratitude to Davis he wanted to give him any advantage that might accrue from the purchase. For some time before he sold his place and for several months thereafter, Bole lived separate and apart from his wife, who did not join in the deed. Some time before his committee was appointed, he apparently became reconciled to her, because the appointment was made on her motion, and he was present and did not resist the motion. In fact, he now says he thought he needed a committee. Davis swears, and this statement is not denied, that Bole and his wife first brought a suit against him, before the committee was appointed, that he was served with a summons in such suit. Apparently that suit was discontinued or abandoned, and a committee thereafter appointed and the present suit brought in its stead.

It is not explained why his wife was not examined as a witness; but it appears from the testimony of J. E. Palmer, who knew Bole well, that, in a conversation with him about selling his farm, witness told him when he got his money it would not last long, that he would not work, and asked him, when he ran out of money, what he was going to do, and Bole replied that he would get Stell (meaning his wife) "to get the place back again and sell it again." In fairness to Bole's committee, it is proper to say he knew nothing about his ward's disposition and habits, and only consented to act as his committee at the request of the attorneys who appeared for his wife. Bole is shown by the record to be a lazy spendthrift, wholly untrustworthy and unreliable. He appears to be a moral degenerate, but he is certainly not proven to be an imbecile or lacking in mentality. Considering the time he went to school, he seems to have made fair progress; he says he studied geography, history, and reading in the fifth reader, and says he had taken up literature. His spelling is bad, and he fails to observe the rules of punctuation; but he writes and expresses himself fairly well. Some of the witnesses in describing his mental condition say it is a case of arrested development; that he is like a child; that his mind lacks proper education and training cannot be doubted, but he has a great amount of cunning, and has deceived many persons into lending him money and credit. Having determined that Bole was not an imbecile, or a lunatic, but that he was capable of appreciating the effect of what he did, we hardly see how the learned judge could reach the conclusion that he was duped and imposed on by Davis, and was unduly influenced to convey his land to him. Bole was shrewd enough to try to make it appear by his own testimony that he was under the influence and domination of Davis. He swears Davis would give him money, beer, and whisky, and would encourage him to associate with lewd women, and as he says, "have a good time." Davis denies this, and he is supported in his denial by Bole's letters to him. In those letters, importuning Davis for more money, he tried to create the impression on the latter's mind that he was working and saving his money. But it appears that, when he got employment, he never held the job longer than a few days at most. He tells a very romantic story of his engagement to marry a girl in Canton, Ohio, while he was living apart from his wife, which illustrates his capacity to deceive others. According to this story, he had bought a lot from the girl's brother, who was a real estate agent, paid $25 on it, and had actually arranged to build a bungalow, when the girl happened to discover that he was a married man, and, he says, he then lost little time in getting away in order to escape the anger of her brother. He is a self-convicted liar, and how the court could accept his version of the transaction with Davis we cannot understand. If his testimony is rejected, as we think it must be, there is no evidence to support the charges of fraud and undue influence. These charges are explicitly denied by the answer.

That the deed was executed on the very day Bole became of age casts no suspicion on the good faith of Davis, in view of the circumstances. Bole owed other people who were anxious to secure their money, and he knew that if they sued him his land would be sold and his basis of credit for the future would be gone; whereas, if he repaid Davis in full the money advanced during his minority, he would receive more from him in the future, until the whole consideration for the land was paid. Davis did not finish paying the purchase price until some time in the spring of 1914.

There is much conflict in the evidence respecting the actual value of the land. Some of the witnesses value it as high as $2,000 or $2,500. Their opinions, however, are based upon the assumption that there are 20 acres of coal yet unsold. This assumption appears to be erroneous. Other witnesses value it at $800 to $1,000, and some of them as high as $1,200. Considering the location, rough and steep character and grown-up condition of the land, the facts that there are no buildings of any value on it, that the fences are nearly gone, that the oil and gas lease is liable to be surrendered at any time and therefore the rentals of uncertain duration, and that the land is incumbered with the contingent dower right of Bole's wife, it cannot be said that $900 is such an inadequate price as to raise the presumption of fraud or undue influence. Witnesses well acquainted with the particular land, who appear to be good judges of land values, do not estimate it above $1,200, and most of them not over $1,000.

Davis swears that, on the 6th of March, 1914, he paid Bole $75, the balance of the $900, and took from him a receipt in full, and produced the receipt. Although Bole's recollection appears to be certain and clear as to most things, he professes not to recollect that transaction; he simply says:

"No, sir; I forget all about that day. I don't remember any conversation on that day, at all; it is a blank."

But he does not deny his signature to the receipt, and, when asked if it was, replied, "It might be."

Notwithstanding the burden of proof must be borne by the plaintiff, the decided preponderance of the evidence is in favor of the defendant, which calls for a reversal of the two decrees of June 20, 1916, and February 28, 1917, respectively, and the dismissal of plaintiff's bill, and it will be so ordered.

On Rehearing.

After listening to exhaustive oral arguments by counsel for the respective parties and reading their briefs, and again carefully considering the evidence taken to sustain the contentions that plaintiff's ward was incapable of transacting business and was unduly influenced and defrauded of his property by the defendant, the court is satisfied that these charges are not borne out by the record. That Bole was not an imbecile or non compos mentis, but was able to deceive a number of other persons besides Davis and thereby secure credit, is abundantly proven. He was not so mentally defective as not to be able to transact business for himself. That he was morally crooked and irresponsible, and had little regard for the truth, when a falsehood would serve his purpose better, clearly appears. He was a spendthrift, and was able, while yet an infant, to deceive many persons and obtain credit upon his promises that, when he arrived at age and received his money from his guardian, he would pay them.

The contention of plaintiff's counsel that Davis deliberately set about to gain Bole's confidence by advancing him small sums of money, and then to defraud him out of his land, is not proven. Bole testified in his own behalf, and the intelligence revealed by his answers to questions shows that he had legal capacity. That his business judgment was not good may be true, but many persons, who could not even be suspected of want of legal capacity, are liable to the same criticism.

Davis swears he kept an accurate account of the money advanced to Bole, and presented an itemized account of the same, showing that he has paid him $1,085, $185 more than the price of the land. On the other hand, Bole admits he kept no account, does not know how much money he received, and denies some of Davis' charges. But every one of them is proven, either by Davis' checks to Bole, indorsed by the latter, or by receipts signed by Bole. In addition to the many receipts for small amounts, given at the time the money was advanced, Bole signed a receipt for $900, on March 6, 1914, stating that it was in full of the price for the land.

Davis presents a receipt for $150, advanced to Bole in May, 1913, which he says was money he let Bole have to buy stock for his farm at the time Bole married and went to housekeeping. Counsel for plaintiff contend that Bole's signature to that receipt is a forgery, and had the original record brought up in order to satisfy this court that their contention was right. We have carefully examined this receipt and Bole's signature thereto, compared it with his signature indorsed on checks payable to him, the genuineness of which is admitted, and are satisfied that his signature to the receipt in question is his genuine signature.

That defendant may not have kept his account in chronological order in his book of original entry is of little significance, in view of the receipts produced by him, signed by Bole, proving payments amounting to the full purchase price of the farm. We are therefore satisfied that no mistake was committed on the original hearing, and adopt the written opinion then prepared.

DUGGAR v. DUGGAR, County Superintendent of Affairs. (No. 1218.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. COUNTIES ~~6~~—196(7)—COLLECTION OF TAXES—ANSWER—INJUNCTION.

The petitioner, as a citizen and taxpayer of the county of Bryan, sought to have enjoined the collection of the county taxes levied for the year 1918, on the alleged ground that a portion of the four mills specified in item 9 of the levy, viz., "to pay for the support of the chain gang and for public roads of the county," was levied to pay the expense of the county chain gang incurred in the working of the public streets in the city of Pembroke, an incorporated city in that county. The petitioner alleged that the county had no authority to assess, levy, and collect taxes upon the property of the petitioner for the purpose of working and improving the roads and streets within the corporate limits of the city of Pembroke, and that the levy, which included the expense and cost of working the roads and streets within the corporate limits of the city during a specified portion of the year 1918, was excessive and illegal to the extent that it included such expense. The defendant, the superintendent of county affairs, charged with the duty of levying taxes for county purposes, demurred and answered. In his answer he admitted that the levy was made, "but that the same was for the purpose as therein stated, for expenses accruing in the year 1919; that the taxes for the year 1917 will pay, or nearly pay, the expenses of 1918." Upon the filing of the answer containing the averment above quoted, the plaintiff amended his petition by alleging:

"(1) That the levy set out in said petition is illegal, in that (a) it is exorbitant; (b) it is unnecessary, because the taxes of the year 1917 will pay or nearly pay the expenses of 1918.

"(2) Said levy is further illegal, in that it is not made for the year in which the expenses will be incurred, but is made in advance thereof.

"Wherefore he prays that said levy may be temporarily and perpetually enjoined and restrained."

Upon the interlocutory hearing, and in support of the amendment to the petition, the plaintiff introduced in evidence the defendant's answer. There was no offer to amend the answer, or to withdraw the averment therein, above quoted, and no evidence was introduced by the defendant upon the issues raised by the plaintiff's amendment to his petition. Held, construing the defendant's answer most strongly against him, the plaintiff was entitled to the injunction prayed. The court therefore erred in refusing the same.

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. EJECTMENT ~~6~~—64—DESCRIPTION OF PREMISES—SUFFICIENCY.

It is essential to the maintenance of an action of ejectment that the premises alleged to have been demised be described with such certainty as that, in the event of a recovery by the plaintiff, a writ of possession issued upon the judgment and describing the premises as laid in the petition shall so identify the premises sued for as that the sheriff in the execution of the writ can deliver the possession in accordance with the mandate. Harwell v. Foster, 97 Ga. 264, 22 S. E. 994; Hunter v. Bowen, 137 Ga. 258, 78 S. E. 380; Stringer v. Mitchell, 141 Ga. 403, 81 S. E. 194.

2. EJECTMENT ~~6~~—64—PETITION—DESCRIPTION—AREA OF LAND—DEMURRER.

The only description of the land in the petition being: "Said tract or parcel of land is described as follows: 'The water and mill privileges on the Indian Springs Reserve, being approximately one acre of land in the southeast corner of said Indian Springs Reserve, said reserve being located in Indian Springs district of Butts county'"—the allegations do not furnish data by which the land in which the "privileges" are alleged to exist can be definitely located.

(a) The quantity of land is not stated exactly, but only "approximately," and the description could not be held sufficient under the principle of Payton v. McPhaul, 128 Ga. 510, 58 S. E. 50, 11 Ann. Cas. 163; Phillips v. Paul, 148 Ga. 104, 95 S. E. 969, and similar cases.

(b) The description of the land was too indefinite to be the basis of recovery by ejectment, and there was no error in dismissing the petition on general demurrer. See Jackson v. May, 16 Johns. (N. Y.) 184.

3. QUESTION NOT DECIDED.

The petition being fatally defective for reasons stated in the preceding notes, no ruling will be made on the question as to whether title to the alleged "water and mill privileges" on the tract of land referred to in the petition constitute such interest in the land as would support ejectment.

WILLIAMS et al. v. HICKS. (No. 1196.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 3, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

HABEAS CORPUS ⇨113(12)—CUSTODY OF CHILD—DISCRETION OF COURT—REVIEW.

This was a habeas corpus case, and the evidence upon the controlling issue being conflicting, the discretion of the court in awarding the minor child to the applicant will not be disturbed.

Error from Superior Court, Haralson County; A. L. Bartlett, Judge.

Habeas corpus by L. H. Hicks against J. S. Williams and others to obtain custody of an infant child. Custody awarded to plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed. See, also, 135 Ga. 433, 69 S. E. 547.

In March, 1918, L. H. Hicks brought his petition for habeas corpus against J. S. Williams and Mrs. Mollie Williams, his wife, to recover custody of the minor son of petitioner; the child then being about 13 or 14 years of age. In 1909, when the child was 3 years of age, Hicks brought his petition for habeas corpus against the same defendants, alleging that he had the right to the possession and custody of the child, and that the defendants were wrongfully withholding custody. When that petition came on for trial, in January, 1910, the court hearing the application refused to order the defendants to deliver custody of the child to the applicant. There was no express adjudication upon the issue raised in the answer of the defendants, wherein they had alleged that the applicant had lost parental control of the child, and had given the child and control over him to the defendants; but the court merely ruled that upon considering the evidence in the case it was adjudged that the custody of the infant child, William Hicks, should be awarded to the defendants, and it was also ordered that the child should not be carried beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and that, when he should have arrived at such age that he should enter school, this judgment might be reviewed, and the proper custody of the child reconsidered. It was expressly stated in the judgment that the same was not final. The judgment also made provision for the father's seeing the child at stated intervals. This judgment was excepted to by the applicant, and brought for review by writ of error to this court, and the judgment of the court below was affirmed. 135 Ga. 433, 69 S. E. 547. Again, in the year 1914, the plaintiff in the present case made application for the writ of habeas corpus to secure the custody of the same child; the same parties being named as defendants in this second application. When this application last referred to came on for hearing, after hearing evidence the court rendered judgment holding that, "upon a consideration of the law and facts as presented, I do not find that at this time there exist sufficient reasons to modify or change said order as prayed for, and said petition is denied." The defendants continued to retain custody of the child until the filing of the petition in the case now under consideration.

I. N. Cheney, of Bremen, M. J. Head, of Tallapoosa, and Edwards & Weatherly, of Buchanan, for plaintiffs in error.

J. Mallory Hunt and Geo. P. Whitman, both of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

BECK, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). Upon the hearing the court awarded the custody of the child to the father. To this order the defendants excepted, and by writ of error brought it here for review.

There is no merit in the contention that the prior orders in the case adjudicated finally the right of the defendants to the continued custody of the minor, William Hicks. There is nothing in the judgment passed on the two former hearings to indicate that the court finally passed upon the contention of the defendants that parental control had been expressly surrendered by the applicant. It is apparent, from a reading of the judgments passed at the two former hearings, that the court intended that the question of the custody of the child, when it should arrive at an age making it proper that he should be sent to school, be left open. It is inferable from the terms of the order that the court did not think that a preponderance of the evidence showed that parental control had been surrendered permanently. At any rate the court was not concluded upon this question as against the applicant, and there was evidence submitted at the last hearing which would authorize the court to find that parental control had not been surrendered and lost by the father, and there was evidence adduced to show that the father was the proper custodian of the child at the age attained by the boy when the last application was filed; his age then rendering it the duty of his custodian to send him to school. So, without reference to the question as to whether that part of the court's order containing the inhibition against the removal of the child from the jurisdiction of the court was violated or not, the court was fully authorized to find in favor of the applicant upon the controlling issues in the case, and, the court having so found, his judgment will not be disturbed.

Judgment affirmed.

All the Justices concur.

PHILLIPS v. JOHNSON. (No. 1207.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 3, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

APPEAL AND ERROR Ⓒ302(3)—EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS Ⓒ357 — TRIAL Ⓒ295(4)—WITNESSES Ⓒ372(2)—SALE OF PERSONALTY — INJUNCTION — EVIDENCE — ISSUES—CHARGE.

The evidence authorized the verdict, and the assignments of error; which are sufficient in form to raise any question for decision by the Supreme Court, do not show cause for reversal.

Error from Superior Court, Emanuel County; R. N. Hardeman, Judge.

Suit in equity by Della Johnson against Sherman Phillips, administrator of Isaac Johnson, deceased. Verdict for plaintiff, motion for new trial denied, and from the judgment, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Isaac and Della Johnson, persons of color, lived together during the latter part of the Civil War. They continued to live together, and were living together as husband and wife, on March 9, 1866. In 1866 they moved to the upper part of Emanuel county and settled on a piece of land purchased by Isaac. The land was cleared and improved, and the two lived thereon as husband and wife for some years, when Isaac purchased another piece of land near by, and cleared and improved the same. For more than 50 years Isaac held Della Johnson out as his wife, and they were generally known as husband and wife. Isaac died in 1914 or 1915. In 1910 Isaac owned some 300 acres of land. In that year he gave off to certain of his kin approximately 100 acres of his land, and on November 25, 1910, he made to Della Johnson a deed to his remaining lands; the two tracts indicated above containing approximately 200 acres. At the same time he made a parol gift to Della of all his personal property, and she entered into immediate possession thereof, and held and enjoyed the same until the death of Isaac. After his death Della paid all debts due and owing by him, and continued in possession of the realty and personalty, claiming the realty as grantee in the deed and the personalty as donee under the parol gift, and both the realty and personalty as the sole heir at law of Isaac Johnson. In 1915 Sherman Phillips, a distant relative of Isaac Johnson (there being no children or representatives of children of Isaac), made application for letters of administration on his estate. Appraisers were appointed, and the administrator, together with the appraisers, went to the dwelling house of Della Johnson, in her absence, and made an appraisal of the personal property in her possession. Subsequently the administrator obtained an order to sell the personalty, and had advertised the same for sale, when Della Johnson brought her petition in equity, making in substance the foregoing allegations, and praying that the administrator be enjoined from further proceeding in the premises. To the petition the administrator made answer, and consented that the court of equity adjudicate all questions at issue. He denied that Della Johnson was the wife of Isaac Johnson, or that Isaac and Della were living together as husband and wife on March 9, 1866, and alleged that at the time the deed was executed, if the same was in fact executed, Isaac was very old and infirm, and did not have capacity to execute a deed; that the deed was the result of a fraudulent scheme between Delia Johnson, one Elmore Jones, and one May Pierce to deprive the lawful heirs at law of Isaac Johnson of any part of his estate. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled, and he excepted.

Williams & Bradley, of Swainsboro, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). Elmore Jones was sworn as a witness for the plaintiff. On cross-examination it was elicited by the defendant's counsel that Delia Johnson, after the death of Isaac, had made her will, and that the witness and his sisters were named as devisees therein. Counsel then asked the witness to state the condition of Delia Johnson on the day of the execution of the will. Whereupon the court ruled that counsel might show the interest of the witness, and might, therefore, show that the witness was named as a devisee or legatee in the will of Delia Johnson, but that the condition of Delia Johnson on the day of the execution of the will was irrelevant. This ruling is assigned as error in the motion for new trial. The assignment is without merit. It was relevant to show that the plaintiff, Delia Johnson, had named Elmore Jones, the witness, as a devisee or legatee in her will; but whether the plaintiff was of sound and disposing mind and memory at the time of the execution of the will is immaterial.

During the progress of the trial, and when practically all the evidence in the case had been introduced, the court made the following ruling:

"I hold that the heirs at law of the deceased, Isaac Johnson, who testified to transactions or communications with the deceased, Isaac Johnson, are incompetent witnesses to testify to such transactions or communications had with him, on the ground that, should it be found there was no marriage between the deceased and Delia Johnson, and that this deed should be set aside, they would then become directly interested in the result of this trial, and they are incompetent witnesses to testify to transactions or communications had with the deceased; and I rule out the testimony of the sisters of the deceased who have testified to transactions and communications had with Isaac Johnson. That ruling would also apply to Lula Oglesby, the niece, her mother being dead, or to any witness who is an heir at law. * * * I leave in the statement of Delia Johnson, to which the witnesses have testified, of course."

This ruling is assigned as error:

"Because marriage or the want of marriage may be proven by reputation in the family, and these witnesses, being related to Isaac Johnson, were competent to testify on that point; because the rule as to the admission of testimony concerning statements of the deceased person prevents the party opposed to the administrator from testifying to such communication, but allows witnesses for the administrator to testify to such communications; and the testimony excluded by this ruling, being in favor of the legal representative of the deceased, was admissible."

Several relatives of Isaac Johnson testified for the defendant. The alleged transactions or communications with the deceased are not set out in the motion for new trial; and since the court excluded certain transactions or communications from the evidence, presumably these communications are not to be found in the brief of evidence. It affirmatively appears, however, from an examination of the approved brief of evidence, that the relatives of Isaac Johnson, sworn as witnesses for the defendant, were allowed to testify to the reputation in the family, and did testify that Isaac and Delia were never married and were not man and wife. Inasmuch as the excluded testimony is not set forth in the motion for new trial, either literally or in substance, or attached thereto as an exhibit, the assignment of error cannot be considered.

After the conclusion of the testimony, the court retired the jury and ruled as follows:

"I will eliminate the land, and I submit to the jury the question as to the personal property."

This ruling is assigned as error. There was no evidence to authorize a finding that the deed was procured by fraud, or that the grantor did not have sufficient mental capacity to execute it. The court, therefore, properly withdrew from the consideration of the jury the issue as to the validity of the deed.

The court charged the jury as follows:

"If you should find that Delia Johnson and Isaac Johnson were living together prior to March 9 or on the 9th day of March, 1866, as husband and wife, that it would be immaterial whether they were married by any form of law or not. The law would not require, after March 9, 1866, that they should enter into a marriage ceremony or contract whatever, in order to constitute them husband and wife."

In one ground of the motion for new trial this charge is assigned as error:

Because "it is contrary to law," and because "March 9, 1866, and no other day or date, is the time fixed by law for the establishment or marriage between persons of color. If persons of color who lived together as husband and wife prior to March 9, 1866, saw fit before that day to abandon such relationship, the law would not adjudge them husband and wife; and if they did abandon such relationship, or either of them did so, before March 9, 1866, the law would not allow them to renew such relationship after that date without a new contract."

By reference to the entire charge of the court it appears that the court instructed the jury that—

"Persons of color, colored people, living together on the 9th day of March, 1866, who were living then as husband and wife, whether there has been a ceremony or not, sustain that legal relation to each other."

In immediate connection therewith follows the excerpt from the charge to which exception is taken. It is manifest, therefore, that the portion of the charge assigned as error was neither misleading nor harmful. It is apparent that the court construed the law as the plaintiff in error now construes it, and the jury must have so understood the charge.

The evidence authorized the verdict, and the court did not err in refusing a new trial. Judgment affirmed.

Where a judgment overruling a general demurrer to the plaintiff's petition was reversed by this court, and that judgment was made the judgment of the court below, and where thereupon the case was taken from the docket, but subsequently restored, and neither the non-resident defendant nor its counsel, who were also nonresidents, had notice of the restoration of the case to the docket, nor of an amendment which had been filed, and the case was placed upon the trial calendar of the court and called for trial, and a verdict and judgment were rendered for the plaintiff, it was not error for the court to sustain a motion in arrest of such judgment.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR  $\S$ 1207(4)—ORDER MAKING JUDGMENT OF SUPREME COURT JUDGMENT OF SUPERIOR COURT NOT VOID.

Where a judgment overruling a general demurrer to a petition was reversed by the Supreme Court, a judgment in the superior court, making the judgment of the Supreme Court the judgment of the superior court, was not void, even if it was voidable.

Error from Superior Court, Decatur County; H. B. Spooner, Judge.

Suit by G. B. Brackin against the Jefferson Fire Insurance Company. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff, motion in arrest of judgment sustained, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

T. S. Hawes and John R. Wilson, both of Bainbridge, for plaintiff in error.

Smith, Hammond & Smith, of Atlanta, Pope & Bennet, of Albany, and Hartsfield & Conger, of Bainbridge, for defendant in error.

BECK, P. J. Brackin brought suit on a policy of fire insurance against Jefferson Fire Insurance Company of Philadelphia, returnable to the May term, 1910, of the superior court of Decatur county. On the 5th day of July, 1912, upon a trial of the case, a verdict and judgment were obtained by Brackin against the company. Subsequently, on a judgment consented to by counsel who represented Brackin and counsel for the company, an order was taken at Chambers, and in another county from that where the case was pending, setting aside this verdict and judgment. On January 5, 1915, the case came on again for trial, and a verdict and judgment were rendered in favor of Brackin against the company. This was brought to the Supreme Court for review, and among other questions raised in the record was one involving the judgment of the court below, overruling a general demurrer to the plaintiff's petition. This judgment was reversed. 147 Ga. 47, 92 S. E. 930. On June 25, 1917, during vacation, the remittitur from the Supreme Court was filed in the office of the clerk of the superior court of Decatur county, and at the next term of the superior court, convened on November 12, 1917, Hon. W. M. Harrell, judge of the superior court, passed an order in open court making the judgment of the Supreme Court the judgment of the superior court, and the remittitur, with the judgment and order of the superior court, making the judgment of the Supreme Court the judgment of the superior court, were duly entered on the minutes of the superior court, and the case was taken from the docket of the said superior court. Subsequently the case was restored to the docket, but neither the insurance company nor its counsel had notice of this. The case was also taken up and set for trial without notice to the insurance company or its counsel. A verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, Brackin, and a judgment entered thereon. A motion in arrest of judgment, upon the grounds indicated above, was made by the insurance company. The court sustained this motion, and the plaintiff excepted.

[1, 2] The court properly sustained the motion in arrest of judgment. The grounds of the motion, which are not controverted, required the judgment sustaining the motion. The judgment rendered by Judge Harrell, making the judgment of the Supreme Court the judgment of the superior court, was not void, even if it was voidable. His alleged disqualification was because of his relationship to counsel for the plaintiff and his former interest adverse to the insurance company. Whether or not, after the judgment of the Supreme Court was made the judgment of the court below, inasmuch as the judgment of the reviewing court reversed a judgment overruling a general demurrer to plaintiff's petition, the plaintiff could amend, is not decided. There are cases decided by this court apparently holding that an amendment such as was offered by the plaintiff could not be made. But that question is not now passed upon. The case was taken from the docket by an officer of the court, and treated as one finally disposed of. The nonresident defendant and nonresident counsel, there being no local counsel at the time, should have had notice of this restoration of the case to the docket, and a verdict and judgment taken without notice to them should not be allowed to stand.

We do not now pass upon the question made by the record as to whether or not the first verdict and judgment were effectually set aside by the order passed at chambers upon a consent entered by counsel of record for the insurance company and the plaintiff. If that first verdict and judgment are still of force, that affords no reason why the last verdict and judgment should not be set aside. The judgment of the court sustaining the motion in arrest of judgment is sustained.

Judgment affirmed.

HARDY et al. v. HARDY. (No. 1168.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 5, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.,

1. TRUSTS  $\Leftrightarrow$  84 — RESULTING TRUST — PURCHASE OF LAND BY GUARDIAN — USE OF TRUST FUND.

Where one was guardian for his children and had funds belonging to them, if he used such funds to purchase lands, though he took a deed conveying the land to himself, equity would impress the property with a trust character in favor of the children, in a suit brought by them for the purpose of having a trust declared.

(a) But if the guardian bought the land with funds which he had procured by effecting a loan from a third person, or in any other way independently of the trust funds, and with the money thus borrowed purchased the land, though he might subsequently have used the funds which he held as guardian for his children to repay the loan, this would not fasten a trust upon the property, unless the borrowing of the money was done with the intent to subsequently repay it with the trust funds in his hands, so as to give effect to a scheme whereby the title to the property might be vested in the guardian individually, free from the trust character which would have been impressed upon it, had he directly in the first instance purchased the land and paid for it with trust funds.

2. TRUSTS  $\Leftrightarrow$  102(2) — IMPLIED TRUST — USE OF FUNDS FOR IMPROVEMENT.

The fact that the intestate had used the funds belonging to his children to make improvements upon the land would not have the effect of creating an implied trust upon the property thus improved.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR  $\Leftrightarrow$  272(1), 273(4) — EXCEPTION TO ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE — GROUND OF OBJECTION.

To avail the plaintiff in error in this court, exceptions to the admission of evidence should show the ground of the objection, and that this ground was urged when the evidence was offered.

4. EVIDENCE  $\Leftrightarrow$  219(1) — ADMISSIONS — MISAPPLICATION OF WARD'S FUNDS.

The court erred in excluding from evidence the application to the court of ordinary, made by B. I. Hardy as guardian of his children, to be allowed to invest the funds which he had in his hands as guardian in lands, together with the order passed by the ordinary upon this application allowing the same.

Beck, P. J., dissenting in part.

Error from Superior Court, Wilkes County; B. F. Walker, Judge.

Suit by D. E. Hardy and others against Carrie Hardy, administratrix of Ben. I. Hardy, deceased. Judgment for defendant, motion for new trial denied, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

Mrs. Carrie Hardy, as administratrix of the estate of her deceased husband, Ben. I. Hardy, who died intestate, advertised for sale certain lands alleged to belong to the estate of the intestate. This land consisted of a single tract of 100 acres. The plaintiffs in error, D. E. Hardy and four other children of the intestate, filed a claim to 50 acres of the tract, specifically described in the claim affidavit. At the trial term of the court at which the case was heard the claimants filed what they termed "a full statement of their claim," and in this additional statement they alleged the death of their mother; that she at the time of her death left an estate of which the claimants were heirs, the amount of the same being $1,000; that B. I. Hardy was appointed guardian of this property, and received the sum of money stated for the benefit of claimants; that in February, 1909, B. I. Hardy bought from his brother, Alex. Hardy, 50 acres of land adjoining 50 acres of his own; that B. I. and Alex. had inherited the said 100 acres from their father, W. D. Hardy; there were other heirs of W. D. Hardy besides B. I. and Alex.;

that the land belonging to the estate of W. D. Hardy was so divided as to give each heir 50 acres; and B. I. Hardy having bought the share of Alexander Hardy, the other heirs joined in a quitclaim deed to B. I. Hardy for 100 acres, this being the tract of land advertised by the administratrix for sale.

"Claimants allege that B. I. Hardy took from the fund held by him as guardian of claimants $250 to pay for the 50 acres of land bought from Alex. Hardy. He not only paid their money for this to the full extent of its value, but informed them that it was their property and that he held it for them. * * * That said B. I. Hardy took the balance of their estate and expended all of it in improving the other 50 acres, and told them at the time that the whole 100 acres was theirs, and that he was holding it for their benefit. Claimants allege that they are entitled to the whole 100 acres, or that in any event they are entitled to the 50 acres described in claimants' petition."

On the trial of the issue made, the jury found in favor of the administratrix, that the lands belonged to the estate of B. I. Hardy. The claimants made a motion for a new trial, which having been overruled, they excepted.

Colley & Colley, of Washington, Ga., for plaintiffs in error.

R. C. Norman, of Washington, Ga., for defendant in error.

BECK, P. J. [1] 1. There are several portions of the charge excepted to in various grounds of the motion for a new trial, but they are without merit. In substance, the portions of the charge complained of instructed the jury that, if the money belonging to the claimants in the case was invested in the land which they claimed, they should find for the claimants; but, unless it did appear from the evidence that the money which B. I. Hardy held as guardian for his children was invested in this land, their finding should be in favor of the estate of B. I. Hardy. While some of the language employed in the instructions is inapt and involved, the jury could not have been misled as to the real issue. There was no question that B. I. Hardy took a deed to 100 acres of land which formerly belonged to the estate of his father, and that this comprised the share in the estate of Alex. Hardy; but which 50 acres does not expressly appear. There is evidence to show that B. I. Hardy borrowed from one Barnett the money with which to pay Alex. Hardy for his interest; and there is other evidence tending to show that the payments to Alex. Hardy were made from funds derived from sources not shown, and that he used the funds which came into his hands as guardian to repay the loan which he had effected in order to raise the money to pay for the land. There was evidence introduced by the claimants tending to show that B. I. Hardy paid for the land with the funds of his children which he held in his hands as guardian. Such evidence as this raised the single distinct issue; for, if B. I. Hardy borrowed money from Barnett, or procured money in other ways, not from the funds which he held as guardian, and bought and paid for the land belonging to his brother Alex., and took the deed to himself, he would not hold the land thus acquired as trustee for his children, though he subsequently used the money which he held as guardian to repay the loan which he had effected in order to buy the property, unless the borrowing of the money was done with the intent to subsequently repay it with the trust funds in his hands, so as to give effect to a scheme whereby title to the property might be vested in the guardian individually, free from the trust character which would have been impressed upon it, had he directly in the first instance purchased the land and paid for it with trust funds. But it is not contended in this case that there was such a fraudulent scheme in the mind of B. I. Hardy, guardian, at the time of borrowing the money from Barnett, and with which there is evidence to show the land was paid for, or that the portions of the charge under criticism had the effect of preventing the jury from passing upon the question as to whether or not the buying of the land with the borrowed money was a part of a fraudulent scheme as that indicated.

The fact that the guardian may have said at various times that the land was the property of his children, or that he had bought the land for them, would not of itself impress the land with the character of a trust, unless it was such independently of this saying. If he had not purchased the land under such circumstances as rendered it trust property held for his children, his repeated declarations, made while in possession, that the land belonged to his children, or that he intended it for them, or that he held it in trust for them, would not be sufficient to transfer the title from himself and vest it in the children. Titles to land must be evidenced by writing, and such declarations could not create for his children an express trust in the land. All express trusts must be created or declared in writing. Civil Code, § 3733; Smith v. Williams, 89 Ga. 9, 15 S. E. 130, 32 Am. St. Rep. 67.

[2] 2. Headnote 2 requires no elaboration.

[3] 3. In one ground of the motion for a new trial exception is taken to the court's ruling which allowed, over the objection of claimants' counsel, the introduction in evidence of two deeds executed by the intestate; but it does not appear what, if any, objection was urged to the introduction of these deeds. It is merely stated in the ground of the motion that the documents were admitted over objection of claimants' counsel; and it is also alleged in the ground of the motion that such a ruling was error, and claimants would not be bound by these instruments;

but it is not stated that this objection was made to the court at the time of the introduction of the evidence. This being true, the exception to the introduction of this evidence cannot avail the movants here, as exceptions to the admission or rejection of evidence must show the ground of the objection, and that it was urged at the time of the admission or rejection of the evidence.

[4] 4. Another ground of the motion for a new trial complains of the refusal of the court to allow the introduction in evidence of an application to the court of ordinary, made by B. I. Hardy as guardian of his children, to be allowed to invest the funds which he had in his hands as guardian in lands and to employ later thereon, and also the order passed by the ordinary upon this application allowing the investment to be made as prayed. It is not contended by the movant that the ordinary had the authority to pass this order, but it is contended that the evidence was "admissible as an admission by B. I. Hardy." The majority of the court are of the opinion that the claimants should have been allowed to introduce this evidence as an admission tending to show that the land was actually bought and paid for with the money of the wards which was in the hands of Hardy as guardian. The writer of this opinion does not concur in this ruling, being of the opinion that this was not such an admission as to render it competent evidence against the administratrix and in favor of the claimants.

There is no merit in the other exceptions contained in the motion not specifically referred to above.

Judgment reversed.

All the Justices concur, except BECK, P. J., who dissents from the ruling made in the fourth division of the opinion and the corresponding headnote.

1. INJUNCTION ⇨49—LANDLORD AND TENANT ⇨11—MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨1—TRESPASS ⇨13—RELATION—"EMPLOYER AND EMPLOYÉ."

If an owner of a farm employs another person to superintend the farm, and, in order to facilitate the services to be rendered, provides a house on the farm in which the superintendent shall reside, and in addition to a monthly salary agrees that the superintendent shall use vegetables and other food products grown and produced on the farm, the relation of employer and employé arises, but the relation of landlord and tenant does not arise between them relatively to the house or the farm. If the employer discharges the employé, with or without cause, before the term expires, it is the duty of the latter to leave the premises and remove his personal goods therefrom. If he refuses to do so, and persists in continuing to stay on the premises and live in the house over the objection of the employer, he is a trespasser, and his continuing trespass may be enjoined. *Mackenzie v. KING et al. v. HORTON et al. (No. 1083.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 4, 1919.)

CHARITIES ⇨22(4)—DEVISE TO CHARITABLE USES—CERTAINTY.

Mrs. F. C. Tucker, a citizen of Georgia, died testate. The second item of her will is as follows: "I give, devise, and bequeath to O. E. and M. C. Horton, in trust, all of my estate that I may have at the time of my death, after the payment of my funeral expenses, to be invested in safe securities, and the income arising therefrom to be used for the purpose of educating poor, worthy girls of good families and legitimate. This fund to be so used shall be known as the Frances Clementine Tucker fund." The will appointed the Hortons as executors. It was probated, and they qualified. Lena King and 13 others, alleging themselves to be next of kin and heirs at law of the testatrix, in behalf of themselves and all others next of kin and heirs at law of the testatrix who should desire to join in the petition, brought an action to enjoin the executors from executing the provisions contained in the second item of the will as above quoted. The petition alleged that the second item is void, because too vague, indefinite, and uncertain to be executed, in that the designation of the girls sought to be benefited is so indefinite and uncertain as to render their identity impossible, and the kind, amount, and quality of the education to be bestowed unascertainable. Petitioners did not claim to be lineal descendants of the testatrix. Held, that the court did not err in refusing the grant of an interlocutory injunction, as, according to the well-settled rules for the exercise of the power of a court of chancery over charities, the provisions of the will under consideration are sufficiently definite and specific in its objects to be capable of execution. "A devise or bequest to a charitable use will be sustained and carried out in this state." Civ. Code 1910, § 3914. Among the subjects of charity designated in section 4605, falling within the jurisdiction of equity for enforcement, are the "relief of poor people," "every educational purpose," and "other similar subjects, having for their object the relief of human suffering, or the promotion of human civilization." "A devise or bequest to a charitable use will be sustained and carried out in this state; and in all cases where there is a general intention manifested by the testator to effect a certain purpose, and the particular mode in which he directs it to be done fails from any cause, a court of chancery may, by approximation, effectuate the purpose in a manner most similar to that indicated by the testator." Civil Code, § 3014. "If the specific mode of execution be for any cause impossible, and the charitable intent be still manifest and definite, the court may, by approximation, give effect in a manner next most consonant with the specific mode prescribed." Civil Code, § 4604. In Beall v. Fox, 4 Ga. 404, charitable bequests to the treasurer of the American Bible Society, and to the treasurer of the Domestic Missionary Society, for the sole use, benefit, and behoof of the said societies, were held to be definite and specific objects of the trusts specifically designated. In Newson v. Starke, 46 Ga. 88, it was held: "A bequest to the inferior court of a county of a sum of money to be placed in the hands of four men, who are to give bond and security, whose duty it shall be to loan out said amount and pay over the interest annually to the inferior court, to pay for the education of poor children belonging to the county, and providing that no part of the principal shall be used for that purpose, is, according to the well-settled rules for the exercise of the inherent power of a court of chancery over charities, sufficiently definite and specific in its objects, and sufficiently capable of execution, to authorize and require our courts of chancery to give it effect. It is the duty of the inferior court, on its acceptance of the trust, in such case, to appropriate the money, as directed, and if any difficulties arise, or any uncertainties exist, as to the precise objects, or as to the mode of applying the fund, to apply to the chancellor, who will direct, by decree, the leading details of the scheme to be adopted." McCay, J., delivered for the court an able opinion, in which he cited many authorities to sustain the judgment rendered. That case was cited with approval in Beckwith v. Rector, etc., of St. Philips Parish, 69 Ga. 564, 569, where it was held: "The rules governing the establishment and administration of charitable trusts are different from those applicable to private trusts, in giving effect to the intention of the donor and in establishing the charity. In private trusts, if the cestui que trust are so uncertain, or so incapable of taking, that they cannot be identified, or cannot by legal or equitable proceedings claim the benefit conferred on them, the gift will fail and revert to the donor or his heirs. But if a gift is made for a public charitable purpose, it is immaterial that the trustee is uncertain or incapable of taking, or that the objects of the charity are uncertain and indefinite. It will, nevertheless, be sustained. Courts look with special favor upon such trusts." In Egleston v. Trust Co., 147 Ga. 154, 93 S. E. 84, a stated sum was bequeathed to a named trustee to be expended by him, with the advice and consent of three designated persons, "for the purchase of a lot and the erection thereon of a hospital for children, the same to be known as the 'Henrietta Egleston Hospital for Children.'" This court denominated this bequest as "clear, certain, and definite." Many cases in support of the holdings here made are cited in 11 C. J. 346; 6 Cyc. 906 et seq.; 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 905 et seq.; 5 R. C. L. 309 et seq.; Perry on Trusts, §§ 670, 687, 699; 3 Story's Eq. Jur. § 1550 et seq.; 1 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. § 154; 3 *Pomeroy's Eq. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. v.

(No. 1049.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 3, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. LICENSES ~~§~~29—WHEN LICENSE TAX ON TELEGRAPH COMPANY EXCESSIVE.

Upon review of all the facts disclosed by the undisputed evidence in this case, the license tax of $100 per year imposed by the city of Fitzgerald on each telegraph company doing an intrastate business therein is excessive, unreasonable, and confiscatory. The court therefore erred in denying the interlocutory injunction.

2. LICENSES ~~§~~29—RULE FOR DETERMINING NET INCOME OF TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

In calculating the net income of a telegraph company from its intrastate business at a city office, to determine whether a license tax was unreasonable in amount, a proportionate part of the general expenses of the company in its intrastate business, as well as the expenses peculiarly local, should be considered.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — 974 — REASONABLE REVENUE TAX NOT INTERFERED WITH BY COURT.

Courts should not interfere with the discretion of municipal taxing authorities, unless it appears that the tax imposed for revenue is unreasonable in amount or discriminatory.

Error from Superior Court, Ben Hill County; D. A. R. Crum, Judge.

Suit for injunction by the Western Union Telegraph Company against the City of Fitzgerald and others. Interlocutory injunction denied, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Brewster, Howell & Heyman and Mark Bolding, all of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Wall & Grantham and J. B. Wall, all of Fitzgerald, for defendants in error.

FISH, C. J. The Western Union Telegraph Company brought suit in the superior court of Ben Hill county against the city of Fitzgerald and certain of its officers and agents, to enjoin the enforcement of an ordinance of the city of Fitzgerald imposing an occupation tax of $100 for the year 1917 upon the telegraph company. It was alleged that the tax imposed was unreasonable, excessive, discriminatory, and confiscatory. An interlocutory injunction was denied, and the plaintiff excepted.

[1] The facts are not disputed. The plaintiff in error is the only electric telegraph company doing business in the city of Fitzgerald. It appears that the intrastate receipts of the telegraph company from the entire state of Georgia for the year 1917 amounted to \$352,278.39. The entire intrastate business of the company was 25.1 per cent. of the total business, both intrastate and interstate. The total expenses incurred by the telegraph company in carrying on its entire business in the state of Georgia for the year 1917 amounted to \$1,306,286.92, exclusive of taxes and interest on its invested capital. The expense of the company properly apportionable to the entire intrastate business for the year 1917 is 25.1 per cent. of the total expenses of the company on its business carried on in the state for said year. The total expenses, therefore, for the state for the year in question, properly apportionable to the intrastate business for said year, amounted to \$327,878.02. The total income from gross intrastate business received at the Fitzgerald office for the said year amounted to \$2,672.49. The company's gross receipts from intrastate business at its Fitzgerald office for the said year was  $\frac{16}{1000}$  per cent. of the amount received from intrastate business in the entire state for the year 1917. On this basis of calculation, the expenses apportionable to the Fitzgerald office would be  $\frac{16}{1000}$  per cent. of the entire expenses apportionable to the intrastate business done by the company in the state of Georgia for the year 1917, or  $\frac{16}{1000}$  per cent. of \$327,878.02, which is \$2,491.87. Deducting this amount from the \$2,672.49, the gross income from intrastate business received at the Fitzgerald office for the year 1917, the company received from intrastate business at Fitzgerald for said year \$180.62. The company was required to pay \$8.31 as a tax upon the aggregate value of its property and franchise exercised in the city. The net income received by the company at its Fitzgerald office for the year 1917 was therefore less than \$180.62.

[2] It further appears that the total local expenses of the Fitzgerald office on both intrastate and interstate business for the year 1917 was $2,902. The city contends that only 25.1 per cent. of this total amount is properly chargeable to the Fitzgerald office on account of the intrastate business done at that office during the year 1917. In other words, it is the contention of the city, the defendant in error, that only the amount actually paid out at the Fitzgerald office for the local expenses should be taken into consideration and that the proportionate expenses of maintaining the lines of telegraph wires reaching from that office to other offices in the state of Georgia, and the proportionate part of the expenses of the management of the system in Georgia, should not be taken into consideration. The telegraph company is not engaged in the transmission of messages from one point to another point within the corporate limits of the city of Fitzgerald. Its entire intrastate business done in the city of Fitzgerald consists in the transmission of telegraph messages from the city of Fitzgerald to other cities in the state of Georgia. It is therefore clear that the telegraph company could not conduct any business in the city of Fitzgerald without the necessary expense of its general management and maintenance of its poles and wires outside the city of Fitzgerald. The cost of maintaining such lines and the cost of its general management must therefore be considered as a part of its general expenses in conducting its intrastate business in the city of Fitzgerald. These general expenses—that is, the cost incurred in maintaining its lines outside the city of Fitzgerald and within the state, and the cost of its general management—must therefore be apportioned to the intrastate business of the company at its Fitzgerald office; that is to say, the general expenses of the company, as well as the items of expense which are peculiarly local in their nature, must be considered. This course was adopted by this court in the case of Atlantic Postal Telegraph Cable Co. v. Savannah, 133 Ga. 66, 65 S. E. 184, and was followed in the case of Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. v. Cordele, 141 Ga. 658, 82 S. E. 26. Indeed, any other method of arriving at the net income of the telegraph company at its local office on either its intrastate or interstate business would be unreasonable and unfair.

[3] It must be taken as established that a revenue tax must be reasonable in amount, and must not be discriminatory or confiscatory. The courts will not interfere with the discretion of the taxing authorities of a municipality, unless it appears that the tax imposed for revenue purposes is unreasonable in amount or is discriminatory. Under the facts in this case, recited above, the occupation tax of $100 per year imposed by the city of Fitzgerald on each telegraph company doing an intrastate business therein is excessive, unreasonable, and therefore invalid. A consideration of the decided cases in this state compels this conclusion. See, besides the two cases just cited, Morton v. Macon, 111 Ga. 162, 36 S. E. 627 (1), 50 L. R. A. 485; Mayor, etc., of Savannah v. Cooper, 131 Ga. 670, 63 S. E. 138; Southern Express Co. v. Ty Ty, 141 Ga. 421, 81 S. E. 114. It was therefore error to deny the interlocutory injunction.

Judgment reversed.

WADE et al. v. SAUSSY.

SAUSSY v. WADE et al.
(Nos. 1050, 1064.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 4, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. WILLS  $\S$  700, 702—PETITION FOR CONSTRUCTION AND ADJUDICATION OF RIGHTS OF PARTIES SUFFICIENT.

The court properly overruled the general and special demurrers to the petition and intervention. The petition and intervention stated a cause of action, and the parties named as plaintiffs in the one and as interveners in the other were proper parties.

2. WILLS  $\S$  714—PROVISION IN WILL A LEGACY AND NOT RECOGNITION OF DEBT.

The third item of the will under consideration was as follows: "I owe one thousand pounds sterling, to the estate of my sister Agnes—Mrs. Scott, now represented by her son Hugh Scott. These amounts were borrowed by me on condition that I return them when I no longer needed them. Interest was not mentioned either by them or by me. One thousand pounds to each will be satisfactory. This money business to be conducted with my nephew Hugh Scott, and with no one else." The court properly construed this portion of the will as creating a legacy, and not as a provision for the recognition and payment of a debt.

3. WILLS  $\S$  705—DECREE AND NOT VERDICT ESTABLISHES PRIORITY OF PAYMENTS.

Under the issues made and the facts, it was the office of the judgment and decree, and not of the verdict of the jury (which was special in its character and in answer to question submitted), to fix the dignity and priority in payment of the amount due and payable under the third item of the will, which has been construed as creating a legacy. Hence the ground of the motion for a new trial in the first of the cases stated above, complaining of the failure of the verdict to establish the priority in payment of the amount due and payable under the stated item of the will, is without merit.

4. WILLS  $\S$  705—LEGACY PROPERLY PAYABLE TO ADMINISTRATOR OF LEGATEE.

There was no merit in the exceptions of the plaintiffs and the interveners to that portion of the decree directing that the amount payable as a legacy, under the provisions of the third item of the will, should be paid to the administrator of the legatee.

5. ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR.

Even if the evidence admitted over objection, as stated in the motion for a new trial made by the plaintiffs in error in the first of the above-stated cases, was incompetent, it is not of such materiality as to require the grant of a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; P. W. Meldrim, Judge.

Suit by W. H. Wade, as administrator of Agnes Scott, deceased, and Hugh Scott, individually, against Gordon Saussy, administrator c. t. a. of the will of Hugh F. Train, deceased, with intervention by John Train Scott and others. Decree adjudging that the will created a legacy, to be paid to plaintiff administrator, and plaintiffs, interveners, and defendant bring error. Affirmed.

W. H. Wade, as administrator of the estate of Agnes Scott, and Hugh Scott, individually, filed a petition in the superior court of Chatham county against Gordon Saussy, as administrator cum testamento annexo of the will of Hugh F. Train, deceased, for construction of the will of the latter and for recovery of the sum of $4,866.50 from the defendant, and for a decree requiring the defendant to perform the terms of the will and pay over said sum of money, which was claimed under the provisions of the will. At the appearance term of the court (June, 1915) the defendant filed a demurrer to the petition. The demurrer was upon the grounds, among others, that the petition set forth no cause of action, and that there was a misjoinder of parties. Thereafter, at the December term, John Train Scott and others, alleging themselves to be heirs at law of Agnes Train Scott, who had died in the year 1900, filed their intervention, alleging that under the provisions of the will of defendant's testator there was due and payable to Agnes Scott the sum of $4,866.50, whether the language of the will should be construed to be an acknowledgment and recognition of indebtedness due by the testator to Agnes Scott, with direction to pay the same, or whether the will should be construed as creating a legacy or gift of that amount of money; that Agnes Scott being dead, and each of the interveners being entitled to a one-ninth interest in her estate and in said sum of money, a one-ninth interest thereof should be paid to each of them. Interveners prayed a judgment in their favor for that amount. This intervention was demurred to on the grounds that it showed no cause of action, and that the interveners were not proper parties. Subsequently the intervention was amended, and there was a prayer for a marshalling of the assets and a decree distributing the estate, and that the rights of the interveners as legatees or beneficiaries or as creditors be determined. The demurrers were overruled. The defendant filed a plea and answer, and a subsequent plea of plene administravit præter.

Before the trial the parties to the case entered into and filed a written stipulation and agreement, admitting that the only claim of the estate of Mrs. E. F. Train, the wife of the testator, and her children, as creditors against the estate of H. F. Train, was the sum of $2,688.98, which had been paid, and the payment thereof was sanctioned. On the trial of the case the jury, under the charge and direction of the court, in answer to questions submitted, found that the claim under item 3 of the will was a legacy, that the interveners were the heirs at law of Agnes Scott, as alleged, and each of them was entitled to a one-ninth interest in her estate. Upon this verdict a decree was entered, adjudging, among other things, that under the third item of the will a legacy in the sum of £1,000 sterling was bequeathed to the estate of Mrs. Agnes Scott, which should be paid to the plaintiff Wade, as administrator. The decree also fixed the dignity of the bequest contained in that item of the will. It further fixed the interests of the interveners, and authorized the administrator of the estate of Hugh F. Train to sell the realty not specially devised, belonging to that estate, and apply the proceeds in payment of the bequests named in the third paragraph of the will, in their due proportions. The plaintiffs and interveners excepted to the decree, and also made a motion for a new trial, which motion, upon hearing, was overruled. The defendant administrator also excepted to the decree and made a motion for a new trial. This motion was likewise overruled. The movants in each case excepted to the overruling of their motions for new trial.

Osborne, Lawrence & Abrahams and W. L. Clay, all of Savannah, for plaintiff in error. Adams & Adams, of Savannah, for defendants in error.

BECK, P. J. The two cases brought to this court for review, as set forth in the statement of facts, were argued together, and are here decided together.

[1] 1. We are of the opinion that the court properly overruled the demurrers, both general and special. We think that a petition of the nature of the one under consideration could properly be maintained for the purpose of adjudicating and decreeing the rights, and interests of the parties to the action. Nor was there a misjoinder of parties. The parties to the action were all parties at interest, and their interests could be best settled by having them all before the court, so that their exact interest, as it might appear from the evidence, should be fixed.

[2] 2. The main and controlling question touching the merits of the case is whether, under the provisions of item 3 of the will of Hugh F. Train, a legacy or a debt was created. The court below was of the opinion that the provisions contained in this item of the will created a legacy; and while as to this holding of the court much might be said pro and con, after careful consideration of the question we are of the opinion that the court properly construed the provisions in question. Item 3 reads as follows:

"I owe one thousand pounds sterling to the estate of my sister Agnes—Mrs. Scott, now represented by her son Hugh Scott. These amounts were borrowed by me on condition that I return them when I no longer needed them. Interest was not mentioned either by them or by me. One thousand pounds to each will be satisfactory. This money business to be conducted with my nephew Hugh Scott, and with no one else."

Construing this portion of the will as creating a legacy, it may be conceded that it is unique; and as one revolves it in his mind, attempting to reach a proper construction, various objections to the construction which we have given it may arise. But then, after further considering and studying it, it becomes clearer that the intention in the mind of the testator, especially when the terms of the provisions are considered in the light of all the circumstances, was to create a legacy, and not to make provision for the payment of a debt. The statement of the amount which he had borrowed from his sister is used, it is true; but it is used rather as a measure of bounty than to fix the amount of a recognized indebtedness. While the testator in the language employed states as an amount borrowed the sum of £1,000 sterling, he follows this language by stating that interest was not mentioned by either the borrower or the lender, and that "one thousand pounds to each will be satisfactory." If he created this as a debt which he was attempting to pay, when it is considered that the accumulated interest would have multiplied the original debt several times, he could not have asserted with such perfect confidence that £1,000 sterling would be satisfactory. But knowing his two sisters, from each of whom he had borrowed £1,000 (the other sister is mentioned in item 2 of the will), and the spirit in which they had let him have the £1,000, and the indefinite time as to when it should be repaid, and realizing their love for him and his for them, he felt that the giving of £1,000 as a legacy would be satisfactory.

We do not think the case of Thompson v. Stephens, 138 Ga. 205, 75 S. E. 136, is so nearly identical upon its facts with the present case as to make it controlling upon the question as to whether the third item of the will created a legacy.

[3] 3. No elaboration of the ruling made in headnote 3 is necessary.

[4] 4. As against the interveners there was no error, in view of all the pleadings and evidence in the case, in decreeing that the legacy should be paid to Wade, the administrator of Mrs. Agnes Scott. If Hugh Scott, named in the third item of the will, and "with whom this money business is to be conducted," had filed a petition and prayed that the legacy be paid over to him, the court would have been required to decide whether the money should be paid to him as trustee, or if Hugh Scott had excepted directly to the portion of the decree directing the payment of the legacy to Wade, the administrator, it might have been proper to decide the question. But we do not find in the record any exceptions made by Hugh Scott to this portion of the decree, nor does he make this distinct contention in the petition; but he joined with Wade, administrator, in a petition praying that in the event the court should construe the will and that portion thereof contained in item 3 as creating a legacy, instead of being an acknowledgment of a debt, the administrator with the will annexed, the defendant, "be required to perform the terms of the said will and to pay over to petitioners the amount named in said will." This prayer is not a distinct prayer upon the part of Hugh Scott that the money be paid over to him as trustee, and, if it were, still there is no exception on his part to the direction in the decree that the legacy be paid to Wade, the administrator.

[5] 5. Even if the evidence admitted over objection, as stated in the motion for a new trial made by the plaintiffs in error in the first of the above-stated cases, was incompetent, it is not of such materiality as to require the grant of a new trial.

The assignments of error not specially dealt with above show no cause for reversal. Judgment affirmed in both cases.

BURWELL v. HILL (No. 1146.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 4, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE §114(1)—WHEN PETITION SUFFICIENT AS AGAINST GENERAL DEMURRER.

The petition as a whole set forth a cause of action, and the court did not err in refusing to sustain the general demurrer thereto.

2. PLEADING §193(1)—PARAGRAPHS OF PETITION NOT DEALING WITH TRANSACTION SHOULD BE STRICKEN.

The first six paragraphs of the petition deal entirely with a transaction separate and distinct from that upon which the plaintiff's rights in the present case depend, and they should have been stricken upon demurrer objecting to them upon this ground.

3. SPECIAL DEMURRERS—AMENDMENTS.

The other special demurrers, in so far as they were meritorious, were sufficiently met by amendment.

Error from Superior Court, Hancock County; J. B. Park, Judge.

Suit by C. A. Hill against W. J. Burwell. Demurrers to petition overruled, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

C. A. Hill brought his petition against W. H. Burwell, in which he alleged as follows:

He and Burwell entered into an agreement to purchase a certain tract of land. Late in the fall of 1906 petitioner, having secured a verbal option on a tract of land under the terms of which he could purchase the same for $4,500, suggested to Burwell that he and Burwell should purchase this place for an investment, and he did then agree with Burwell that they would together buy the land. Petitioner, having been compelled to use the money with which he expected to pay for his half of the purchase price, agreed that Burwell should borrow the money with which to make the purchase, and that the loan should be repaid by the two jointly, and that when so paid the unincumbered title to the property should be placed in complainant and Burwell as tenants in common. Burwell consented to the proposition, but, stated that it would suit him to make an arrangement slightly different from that proposed; that "he (Burwell) would, if Hill would sign certain papers, arrange to borrow the whole of the money needed. To this Hill agreed, understanding that Burwell was to borrow the money for both, * * * and that when repaid the unincumbered title to the tract of land, consisting of 594 acres, should be placed in Burwell and complainant as tenants in common." In compliance with this agreement between the complainant and defendant, the former signed a certain note, stipulating for the payment to the defendant of 14 bales of cotton, which was termed "rent," for each of the years 1907 and 1908, the papers being drawn in this way so that the defendant could use them for the purpose of raising money with which to pay for the land. As a matter of fact, however, the land was not worth 14 bales of cotton annually for rent. In order to effect the loan, it was more convenient for Burwell to have the title taken in his own name. The defendant undertook to have the paper prepared and executed as it should have been so as to protect the interests of both. The note was made for 14 bales of cotton, so as to aid Burwell in borrowing money on security of the place. Burwell acted throughout the entire transaction as the attorney at law for both parties. The money was borrowed by Burwell, and a mortgage given on the land. In 1907 11 bales of cotton were turned over by Hill to Burwell, and it appears that in 1908 and the subsequent years up to and including the year 1916 a stated number of bales of cotton were turned over to Burwell in each year, making in all 91 bales. Complainant cannot state the exact amount received for the cotton, as it was practically all sold by Burwell, and under the agreement was to be applied by him in discharge of the money which was borrowed to pay for the land. Complainant also paid Burwell a certain sum in cash, which, together with the money realized from the cotton turned over to Burwell, was more than enough to pay for the place. And since the year 1907 complainant has been on the land, improving and managing it for the joint account of himself and Burwell, and during all these years has received no compensation for his services, he having turned over to Burwell each year his, complainant's, share of the profits of the place to be applied to the extinguishment of the debt. Plaintiff prays for an accounting and a decree for specific performance.

The defendant filed demurrers, general and special, to the petition, which were overruled, and he excepted.

R. W. Moore, T. F. Fleming, and R. L. Merritt, all of Sparta, for plaintiff in error.

Green & Michael, of Athens, and Wiley & Lewis, of Sparta, for defendant in error.

BECK, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. We are of the opinion that the court properly overruled the general demurrer to the petition. If, as alleged in this petition, the plaintiff had an option on the place to purchase at a given price, the agreement with Burwell whereby they should purchase the same and become joint tenants was not inconsistent with any duty that they owed to the owner of the place. And if the defendant agreed to borrow money and paid the purchase price, giving a mortgage to secure the money borrowed, and agreed also that the plaintiff should have a half interest in the place, and the plaintiff remained upon the place, managing and improving the same by himself and by tenants, and turned over the annual proceeds to the defendant, as is alleged, then when the sum of the proceeds thus turned over to Burwell equaled the amount of the purchase-money and interest, the plaintiff was entitled to specific performance, and to have a conveyance of a half interest in the land, or to have a court decree the same in him. This case differs in its facts from the case of Hall v. Edwards, 140 Ga. 765, 79 S. E. 852. In that case it was held:

"An oral agreement between A. and B. to purchase a tract of land, whereby A. is to pay for the land from the proceeds of a loan to be secured by him upon the joint security of a tract of land owned by him and the purchased tract, and take title to the purchased tract in his own name, and convey to B. a half interest when he is reimbursed for the purchase money from the rents, issues, and profits of the purchased tract, is deficient in mutuality and a nude pact."

The defendant relies upon the case just cited, and cases substantially like it in principle, to support his contention that the contract stated was a nudum pactum and lacking in mutuality. The distinction between the two cases will be seen at a glance, upon comparing the facts. In the case cited the party borrowing the money and paying for the tract of land was to take title to the tract thus purchased in his own name, and convey to the other party a half interest when he should be reimbursed for the purchase money from the rents, issues, and profits of the purchased tract. The plaintiff in the instant case, under the allegations of the petition, took charge of, rented, managed, and improved the place. He collected the rents and turned them over to the party who furnished the purchase money. He had no other compensation for the services which he rendered than the interest which he had in the place; and, while Burwell borrowed the money, it was "distinctly agreed that the loan should be repaid by them jointly." The stipulation in the agreement that there should be a joint liability for the loan furnished the element of mutuality; for, if Burwell effected the loan of the money for which the purchase price was paid under this kind of an agreement with the complainant, and has been forced out of his own fund to pay the obligation incurred by borrowing the money, he would have had his remedy against the complainant to compel him to repay his proportion of the sum borrowed.

[2] 2. The first six paragraphs of the petition relate to a transaction which had been completed, and which was entirely separate and distinct from that out of which the alleged rights of the plaintiff set up in the present suit arose, and the history of that former transaction is not essential to the petition in the present case as matter of inducement. The demurrer, therefore, to these six paragraphs, should have been sustained and those paragraphs eliminated; and the court erred in overruling the demurrer to that part of the petition. If by elimination of these six paragraphs certain references to them in other parts of the petition should be rendered obscure, the obscurity thus produced may be cured by proper amendments.

[3] 3. The other special demurrers, in so far as they were meritorious, were sufficiently met by amendment. In the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error it is pointed out that the petitioner, in order to evade the effect of a certain rent note which he gave for the rent of the land after it was purchased by the defendant, alleges that the note was given by him for more rent than the land was actually worth, and that this was done for the purpose of falsely inflating its value to enable the defendant to borrow the purchase money with which to pay for the same; and plaintiff in error contends that the plaintiff in the court below "could not take advantage of his own fraud, that the rent note speaks for itself, and is an estoppel of the plaintiff to set up that it was given in fraud for the purpose of inflating the value of the land." There was no special demurrer to the paragraph of the petition just referred to, upon the ground taken in the brief; and the court below was not called upon to decide, and did not decide, whether it should be stricken from the petition or not upon that ground.

While we have upheld the overruling of the general demurrer, the judgment is reversed, because of the failure of the court to sustain the demurrer to the first six paragraphs of the petition, upon the grounds pointed out in the second division of this opinion.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

POTTS v. MATHIS. (No. 1231.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 4, 1919.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE — 16, 28(1), 114(2) — TERMS OF CONTRACT — CONSIDERATION — EVIDENCE — PETITION

W. J. Potts brought his petition against C. W. Mathis, as administrator of the estate of Mrs. Harriet W. Bass, the material allegations of which are as follows: Josiah Bass died February 3, 1914, leaving as his only heir at law his widow, Mrs. Harriet W. Bass, who has since died, leaving no child or descendant of children. Upon the death of Josiah Bass, after the payment of his debts, which were comparatively small, the bulk of his personal property, together with his real estate, passed into the possession of his widow. The plaintiff is a son of a sister of Josiah Bass. The plaintiff, his mother, and her other son worked on the farm of Josiah Bass for many years, for which they made him no charge. The real estate referred to is composed of three tracts of land, containing in all 305 acres, more or less, which are described in detail in the petition, and which, as administrator, C. W. Mathis now claims to own. Josiah Bass was a farmer and merchant. "On or about the 1st day of January, 1911, said Josiah Bass and petitioner contracted and agreed that if petitioner would work for the said Bass in the future so long as the said Bass should live, as he had in the past, and would treat him in the future as he had in the past, that he, the said Bass, would make a will and leave his entire property to petitioner; that is to say, that if he continued to help on the farm, and at the store, and continued to aid him in making his collections and looking after his tenants, that as petitioner's remuneration therefor he, the said Josiah Bass, would make a will and would make petitioner the sole beneficiary thereof, and would will and devise to petitioner his entire estate. Petitioner had been collecting accounts for the said Josiah Bass for the agreed compensation of 10 per cent. upon the amount collected, regardless of the amount of the account, or the distance traveled and time expended in enforcing the collection. On the faith of this promise and agreement, and in pursuance thereof, your petitioner did continue to work for the said Bass according to his said contract, and assisted him at the store and in his collections as aforesaid, and in looking after his tenants, and complied fully with his contract as aforesaid. No will of the said Josiah Bass has ever been found. He either died without making said will, or else said will was lost or stolen." The plaintiff alleges that the defendant, as the administrator and legal representative of Mrs. Harriet W. Bass, is contending that she owned the land in dispute, as the sole heir at law of her deceased husband, and that she had no claim to the land, except such as was derived from her husband. The plaintiff prays that the administrator be treated as a trustee, and that it be decreed that as such he be compelled to specifically perform the contract between Josiah Bass and the plaintiff, by conveying to the plaintiff the lands described in the petition.

The defendant filed his demurrer, general and special, to the petition. Upon the hearing the trial court passed the following order: "Upon considering the petition and demurrer thereto in the above-stated case, the demurrer is sustained upon all of the grounds thereof. Adequacy of price is a material matter for consideration in determining whether specific performance will be decreed, and on demurrer to the petition for this relief as to a contract alleged to have been made by one, since deceased, to will an entire estate to the petitioner, where the demurrer sets up an entire absence of specification in the petition of the value of the estate, or the value and extent of the service alleged to be the supporting consideration of the contract, and where it appears that the petition does not make any such specification, no case is presented authorizing the court to proceed further than to sustain the demurrer and dismiss the petition. It is therefore ordered that the demurrer be sustained on all the grounds thereof, and the case be dismissed." To this ruling of the court the plaintiff excepted. Held, "specific performance not being a remedy which either party to a contract can demand as a matter of absolute right, it will not in any given case be granted, unless strictly equitable and just." Kirkland v. Downing, 106 Ga. 530, 32 S. E. 632, cited and applied in Pair v. Pair, 147 Ga. 754, 757, 95 S. E. 295, 296. "Mere inadequacy of price * * * may justify a court in refusing to decree a specific performance; so also any other fact showing the contract to be unfair, or unjust, or against good conscience." Civ. Code 1910, § 4637. In order to authorize specific performance of a contract, its terms must be clear, distinct, and definite. Studer v. Seyer, 69 Ga. 125. In the absence of allegations in the petition as to the value of the lands, or of the value and extent of the services alleged as the consideration of the contract, it is impossible for a court to determine whether the services performed constituted an adequate or grossly inadequate price for the estate of the person with whom the alleged contract was made; nor could it be determined, in the absence of such essentials, whether the contract was unfair, or unjust, or against good conscience. From the general nature of the contract sought to be set up in this case, it may be distinguishable, as to inadequacy of price, etc., from contracts made with one who goes into the home of a person who is a near relative, agreeing to nurse and to give to such person personal, affectionate, and considerate attention, such as could not readily be procured elsewhere, and where the value of such services could not be readily computed in money. It follows that the judgment dismissing the petition on demurrer must be affirmed.

BECK, P. J. I concur in the judgment in this case, but do not concur in all that is said, because a part of it, at least, is in effect in conflict with the ruling made in the case of *Landrum v. DAVIS v. HARRIS. (No. 62.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 10, 1919.)

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF §72(3) — CONTRACT TO CUT AND REMOVE TIMBER.

An executory contract to cut and remove timber is not enforceable unless in writing.

2. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF §139(1) — CONTRACT TO CUT AND REMOVE TIMBER.

The rule that a contract to cut and remove timber is not enforceable unless in writing is applicable only to executory contracts.

3. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF §125(2) — DAMAGES ON BREACH OF ORAL CONTRACT TO CUT TIMBER — RIGHTS OF OWNER.

The contract to cut and remove timber, not being in writing, and being denied by defendant buyer, plaintiff, owner of the land and seller of the timber, is entitled to recover the injury to the land from the trees cut down and removed, or the value of the logs cut and removed, as he may elect.

4. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF §125(2) — DAMAGES ON BREACH OF ORAL CONTRACT — TIMBER CUT.

The contract to cut and remove timber, not being in writing, and being denied by defendant buyer, and defendant having cut down trees on plaintiff's land and left them lying upon the ground, plaintiff, owner of the land, is entitled to recover the injury to the value of the land from the trees being cut down and left upon ground.

5. DAMAGES §182 — MITIGATION OF LOSS — AGREEMENT BY DEFENDANT.

Where defendant cut trees upon plaintiff's land and left logs upon ground, plaintiff is entitled to show that he did not sell the logs because of defendant's agreement to remove and pay for them, if it were incumbent upon him to sell logs to minimize his loss.

6. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF §72(3)—LOGS—PAROL PROMISE TO PAY.

A parol promise to pay for cut logs would not be barred by statute of frauds; the logs having become personalty by reason of the cutting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Edgecombe County; Bond, Judge.

Action by J. A. Davis against J. E. Harris. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed in part.

The plaintiff by oral contract sold to the defendant the mill timber on his land, the same to be measured and paid for at the rate of $6 per thousand feet before removal. The plaintiff admits that the defendant paid at that rate for all the timber cut and removed, but alleges that the defendant cut 163 other logs, which he left lying upon the land. The plaintiff further alleges that the defendant agreed that he would cut all the merchantable timber on the land, but that, on the contrary, he picked out the best timber, which he removed and paid for.

The defendant denies these allegations. The plaintiff brings this action upon the ground that, the defendant having picked out the best timber, he is entitled to be paid a higher price for the same than $6 per thousand, and also to recover the value of the logs left upon the ground and not removed. The court nonsuited the plaintiff because the contract was not in writing.

G. M. T. Fountain & Son, of Tarboro, for appellant.

Allsbrook & Phillips, of Tarboro, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. [1, 2] A contract to cut and remove timber is not enforceable unless in writing. Mizell v. Burnett, 49 N. C. 252, 69 Am. Dec. 744. But this applies to executory contracts only.

It appears in the record that it is admitted by both parties that there was no contract or memorandum of sale in writing; that all trees cut by defendant and removed were measured and paid for at $6 per M, but that the defendant cut other trees which were not measured or paid for or removed from the land. It is controverted that the defendant promised to pay for them, and that the logs have rotted by reason of the plaintiff relying on defendant's agreement to pay for them.

[3] As to the first cause of action, the contract not being in writing and being denied by the defendant, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the injury to the land from the trees cut down and removed (Archibald v. Davis, 49 N. C. 138), or the value of the logs cut and removed as he may elect, unless he agreed to accept $6 per M in full payment, as alleged by the defendant. The plaintiff claims that he accepted $6 per M not in full settlement, but only upon condition that the defendant should cut and pay for all the timber, and that, this not being done, he is entitled to recover the actual damage. This raises an issue of fact to be passed upon by the jury. If this issue is found in favor of the plaintiff, the recovery should be credited with the amount paid. The plaintiff admits that he has accepted payment for all the logs removed.

[4] As to the second cause of action, it being admitted that the defendant cut sundry other logs and left them lying upon the ground, and the contract being denied because not in writing, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the injury to the value of the land from the trees being thus cut down and left on the ground by the defendant. Archibald v. Davis, supra. If the defendant had removed these logs, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover the value of the same.

[5, 6] If it were incumbent on the plaintiff to sell the logs to minimize his loss, he is entitled to show that he did not do so by reason of the agreement of the defendant, subsequent to cutting the logs, that he would remove and pay for them. By the act of the defendant in cutting the logs they became personalty, and the promise of the defendant to pay for them, if shown, would not be barred by the statute of frauds. Green v. Railroad, 73 N. C. 526; Lumber Co. v. Brown, 160 N. C. 283, 75 S. E. 714.

The judgment of nonsuit must to this extent be reversed.

1. SALES §120, 287(3)—RETURN BY BUYER—CONFORMITY TO SAMPLE.

Buyer had the right, without seller's consent, to ship goods back, if they did not come up to sample, but not otherwise, and in that event should have done so promptly.

2. SALES §287(1)—RESHIPMENT BY BUYER—DESTRUCTION OF GOODS—RECOVERY OF PURCHASE PRICE.

Sellers who consented to buyer's reshipment of goods if goods did not conform to the sample could recover purchase price upon destruction, during reshipment, where goods in fact conformed to the sample.

3. TRIAL §260(1)—ISSUES—REFUSAL TO SUBMIT.

Refusal to submit tendered issues was not error, where issues submitted were sufficient to present every phase of the controversy.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pasquotank County; Devin, Judge.

Action by L. S. Daniels and L. W. Cox, trading as Daniels & Cox, against the Southern Distributing Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. No error.

Early in 1918 Daniels & Cox, millers, at Elizabeth City, N. C., made a contract with Southern Distributing Company of Norfolk, Va., for the sale of 500 bags of meal, to be shipped in 100 bag lots, to be delivered f. o. b. steamer Elizabeth City. On March 9th plaintiffs shipped defendant 100 bags meal via "Peoples Line." There were other shipments, but they are not concerned in this appeal. Upon receipt of the first shipment defendant declined to receive it, on the ground that it did not come up to the contract, and L. S. Daniels, of plaintiffs' firm, instructed C. E. Herbert, president of defendant, to ship the meal back, which he did. The steamer Annie, on which the meal was returned, was completely destroyed by an explosion a few hours after reaching Elizabeth City, and the meal was lost. Plaintiffs sued for the recovery of the value of the lost meal. Verdict and judgment for plaintiffs. Appeal by defendant.

W. A. Worth, of Elizabeth City, for appellant.

Aydlett, Simpson & Sawyer, of Elizabeth City, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. The meal was sold by sample, and when the first shipment (which alone is in controversy here) was received, the defendant wired plaintiffs that it was not according to sample. The plaintiffs contended that it was as represented, but wrote the defendant that, "if it was not up to sample, the defendant might ship it back, and the plaintiffs would pay the freight." The meal was not shipped back till April 4th.

[1] The defendant had the right without plaintiffs' consent to ship it back if it did not come up to sample, but not otherwise, and in that event should have done so promptly.

Mr. Herbert, president of the defendant and witness for the company, in his cross-examination stated:

"In my wire to Mr. Daniels I told him that the meal did not come up to the contract, and he said that if it did not, to ship it back."

There was a conflict of evidence whether the meal came up to the sample or not, but the jury find upon the issues submitted that this meal "in quality and fineness was as good as the sample," and that the plaintiffs did not by consenting to its return waive their right to recover therefor, and that the defendant did not reship to plaintiffs in a reasonable time.

[2] The legal right of the defendant to reship depended upon whether the meal came up to the sample. The defendant's testimony is that the plaintiffs consented that it should be reshipped "if it did not." The jury having found upon the conflicting evidence that the meal did come up to the sample, the reshipment was made by the defendant in its own wrong, and the plaintiffs, not having received and accepted the same, are entitled to recover the purchase price.

The defendant's prayer, therefore, that if the jury should "believe all the evidence they should respond to the second issue that the plaintiffs by consenting to the return of the first hundred bags of meal waived their right to recover therefor" could not be given, in view of the testimony of the defendant's president that the plaintiffs had directed him to ship it back "if it did not come up to the sample." It is immaterial to consider the controversy whether the defendant lost the right to reship by its delay.

[3] The "issues submitted were sufficient to present every phase of the controversy," and it was not error to refuse to submit the issues tendered by the defendant. Humphrey v. Church, 109 N. C. 132, 13 S. E. 793, and cases therein cited, and citations thereto in anno. Ed.

No error.

KEYS v. ALLIGOOD et al. (No. 31.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 10, 1919.)

1. INJUNCTION  $\S$  230(4) — CONTEMPT — SENTENCE — ALTERNATIVE ORDER.

Where defendants violated an interlocutory injunction, the court, before passing sentence of fine or imprisonment, had an undoubted right to make an alternative order, giving the defendants a chance to repent and undo their wrongful act.

2. INJUNCTION  $\S$  215 — ENFORCEMENT BY MANDATORY ORDER — VALIDITY.

If an order compelling defendants to restore a ditch bank which they had destroyed in violation of an interlocutory injunction be considered a mandatory injunction, it must be held a valid order necessary to enforce the court's authority.

3. INJUNCTION  $\S$  230(4) — MANDATORY INJUNCTION — CONTEMPT.

A mandatory order, compelling defendants to restore a ditch bank which they had destroyed in violation of an interlocutory injunction, withholding the question of imposition of a penalty for disobedience, held merely a method of enforcing the court's order, and not a punishment for contempt unauthorized by statute.

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; Devin, Judge.

Action by Malachi Keys against Ivery Alligood and another. From an order granting a mandatory injunction compelling defendants to restore a ditch bank which they had destroyed in violation of an interlocutory injunction, defendants appeal. No error.

The court had issued an order restraining the defendants from in any way interfering with a certain road, and on return of the order, and after hearing the evidence and the argument of counsel, the court granted an interlocutory injunction to the final hearing, forbidding the defendants from entering upon the premises or using the road except strictly for purposes of ingress and egress, as heretofore, and no more. There was no appeal from this order, and while the interlocutory injunction was pending and still in full force, it was alleged and shown before the judge that defendants had willfully violated the same. Plaintiff thereupon asked for a mandatory injunction to compel the defendants to restore the former condition of things, and to desist from further interference with the road or its ditches, or from further disobeying the injunction. The court heard the parties, found that the injunction had been violated, and ordered the defendants to restore the ditch bank to the place from which they had removed it. This order is stated to have been made at the election of plaintiff, the court withholding the question as to the imposition of any penalty for disobedience. Defendants appealed.

Harry McMullan, of Washington, N. C., and John G. Tooty, of Belhaven, for appellants.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). It is somewhat difficult to understand from the record whether the court withheld the punishment for the contempt in violating the order, until the defendants had reasonable time and opportunity to restore the ditch bank, or whether the mandatory injunction was issued absolutely and without regard to any alternative judgment in the way of punishment for the contempt. We rather favor the former construction of the order, but will consider it in both phases.

[1] First. If the order was in the alternative, there can be no question as to the power of the court to make it. Before passing sentence of fine or imprisonment, the court had the undoubted right to give the defendants a chance to repent and undo the wrongful act committed by them in violation of its order.

[2] Second. But if the order is to be taken as one for a mandatory injunction, requiring the defendants to replace the ditch bank, we still think it was valid. The cases upon the power of the court to issue such an injunction before final decree are somewhat in conflict, but if proper distinctions are made we think they may be reconciled. Some of them, which hold that such a mandatory order cannot be issued until the final decree is passed, seem to refer to those instances where the alleged wrongful act was fully accomplished before the suit was commenced, and not to cases where the wrong ordered to be undone was itself in violation of an interlocutory injunction, as here. A learned and accurate text-writer has said that there would seem to be no good reason why, in a proper case, a mandatory injunction should not issue upon preliminary hearing. Gross violations of rights may occur in the shortest possible time; and a few hours' wrongdoing may result in the creation of an intolerable nuisance or in the production of an injury which, if prolonged, might soon become irreparable. In such cases the interposition of the strong arm of the chancellor ought to be most swift; and if the immediate relief afforded could not, in a proper case, be restorative, as well as prohibitory, no adequate redress would, in many instances, be given. Bispham's Pr. of Equity (9th Ed.) p. 638. And so it was held in Murphey v. Harker, 115 Ga. 77, 41 S. E. 585, that when one who has notice that an injunction has been granted against him, though he has not been formally served with the writ, does an act which is a violation of the injunction, and thus changes the status of the property involved in the case, the judge may at an interlocutory hearing, or upon an application for an attachment for contempt, require the offender to restore the status as it existed at the time he first received notice that the injunction had been granted. The court by Justice Hall, in Robinson v. Woodmansee, 76 Ga. 830, said it was not error to require that the defendant restore the status, as it existed at the time of the wrongful act, as it was but "a mild use of the judge's discretion." It is said in 1 High on Injunctions, at end of section 5, p. 10:

"Where, before the granting of the injunction, the defendant has thus changed the condition of things, the court may not only restrain further action by him, but may also, by preliminary mandatory injunction, compel him to restore the subject-matter of the suit to its former condition. And in so doing the court acts without any regard to the ultimate merits of the controversy."

Mr. Bispham in his treatise on Equity (9th Ed.) § 400, at page 637, says that the inclination of the courts of this country was, at one time, against granting a mandatory interlocutory injunction, but that the "tendency, however, is now towards greater liberality in granting such applications," and that many occasions may arise which render a mandatory injunction necessary. In another part of that section he further says:

"An injunction may therefore be said to be either mandatory or prohibitory. A mandatory injunction is one that compels the defendant to restore things to their former condition, and virtually directs him to perform an act. The jurisdiction of the court to issue such a writ has been questioned, but it is now established beyond doubt. 'This court,' said Lord Justice Cotton, in Loog v. Bean, 'when it sees that a wrong is committed, has a right at once to put an end to it, and has no hesitation in doing so by a mandatory injunction, if it is necessary for the purpose.' The form of the order, however, was not, under the old practice, direct in its terms, but the end was reached by a writ apparently prohibitory. Thus an injunction that a defendant should deliver up books and papers in his possession has been issued in the prohibitive form. * * * This order, it will be observed, is in terms a restraining order; but in effect it is a command to the defendant to deliver up the books and papers. Under the modern practice the better form, perhaps, is that the decree should be not only in effect, but in terms, mandatory."

It has been conceded in many cases that such an injunction before the final hearing will be issued, where though mandatory in substance, is prohibitory in form, but several text-writers, and some of the judges, have said that this is a distinction without any difference, and should not longer exist. Hillard on Injunctions, 8. It was said in Bosley v. Susq. Canal, 3 Bland (Md.) at page 66, that while a court of equity will not, in the first instance, command a thing to be done, or to be undone by an injunction mandatory in form, yet where acts have been done in violation of an injunction it will order them to be undone or the matter restored. We can conceive of no sound reason why the court may compel a thing to be done or undone, by a restrictive injunction, and not require the same thing of the defendant by an injunction mandatory in form. Of course, the defendants should be heard before the mandatory writ is issued, and it should be confined to those cases where it is necessary in order that the status quo may be preserved; but, where a previous injunction has been violated, we do not see why obedience to it should not be forced by a restoration of things to their former condition. It would be permitting a recalcitrant defendant to profit by his wrong done in contempt of an order forbidding it. Where it is the obstruction of a right of way, as here, there is no difference in ordering him to remove it, and requiring him to desist from continuing it. The subject is fully discussed, and our view sustained, in Vicksburg, etc., Ry. Co. v. Webster, etc., Co., 132 La. 1051, 62 South. 140, 47 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1155, and in the note to that case as reported in 47 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1155.

Lord Eldon, in one case, Lane v. Newdigate, 10 Vesey, 192, was of the opinion that he could not direct the thing specifically to be done, but that he could make an order which would indirectly have that very effect, which he accordingly did, stating how the order should be drawn, by making it restrictive in form, which Lord Brougham, commenting generally upon that kind of practice, considered as merely a "roundabout mode," the injunction not commanding anything to be done or undone, but simply that an injurious irregularity should not be permitted any longer to exist, regarding the continuance of the act as a repetition of it. In these days, we have found what we deem to be a better method, and look rather to the substance than to the form of things, as being a more direct, simple, and effective way of dealing with the rights and remedies of litigants. We prefer the modern method, and the tendency of the courts, we are told, has strongly set in that direction.

Why not call this process by its right name, instead of granting what is really mandatory, under the guise of preventive relief? When this is done, we are trying to deceive ourselves, for no good or practical reason, when we know what we are actually doing, or what the inevitable effect will be. It is simply adherence to an old form and custom of the court of equity which did not even gain the approval of some of its ablest chancellors. In modern times, since we try to call things by their true and appropriate titles, so we may be better understood, the decided trend of the courts, especially in this country, is towards a more sensible policy, as we have already shown by authority.

We must be careful to remember in this connection that whether the defendant in an injunction suit who violates the order should be punished for the contempt shown the court concerns the court in the matter of the maintenance of its dignity and authority; but whether, by coercive or punitive measures, such defendant should be compelled to obey the writ issued by a competent court for the preservation of a civil right asserted by the plaintiff concerns the plaintiff, and the action of the trial court on that question may be subject to review on appeal; but where the court has full jurisdiction in the premises, its findings of fact, as to the disobedience of its order, are not open to review in a collateral proceeding, such as habeas corpus. 14 Ruling Case Law, § 170; Vicksburg, etc., R. Co. v. Webster, etc., Co., 132 La. 1051 [62 South. 140, 47 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1155]. Applying the foregoing principle to this case, we find that there has been an open and defiant violation of the interlocutory injunction issued by the court. Rapalje on Contempts, § 41. The defendants have done what they were clearly prohibited from doing. If the status quo cannot be restored by a mandatory injunction, the orders of a court can easily be set at naught, and valuable rights destroyed without commensurate redress. The party may be punished for contempt by fine or imprisonment, but this will not reinstate the former condition, and be of no pecuniary benefit to the plaintiff. It is surely no adequate restoration of what he has lost by the defendants' wrongful act. If a party, who has defied the court, and deliberately violated its order, cannot be made to yield full obedience to it by undoing what he has so flagrantly done in contempt of the court, and in plain violation of the plaintiff's rights, the arm of the court has lost its boasted strength, and its power to grant protective relief. But we do not admit that this has been the unfortunate result of the decisions, which appear to be growing more and more favorable to the doctrine that such an interlocutory injunction, mandatory in form and substance, may be granted, that is, before decree, when it is done to compel restoration where the wrong was committed by disobeying the order of the court.

[3] This is not punishment for the contempt, not authorized by the statute, as contended by the defendants, but is merely a method of enforcing the court's order. As said in Cromartie v. Commissioners, 85 N. C. 215, when referring to the statute as to contempts:

"It will be noticed that, throughout these latter portions of the statute, the proceeding is designated not as the former, but a proceeding 'as for contempt,' and, while regulating, not intended to deprive the court of its well-established jurisdiction to enforce obedience to its lawful orders as before possessed and exercised. 'Without the ability to compel obedience to its mandates,' say the court in Pain v. Pain, 80 N. C. 322, 'whether the order be to surrender writings in possession of a party, to execute deeds of conveyance, to pay money, as in the present case, or to perform any other act the court is competent to require to be done, many of its most useful and important functions would be paralyzed.' The order here is coercive only upon persons capable of performing its requirement, and its force is exhausted by rendering obedience. There is therefore no excess of power apparent in the judgment."

The order there was one for the imprisonment of the defendants until they complied with the former order of the court, and was not one for their punishment, by fine or imprisonment or both, for disobedience to such order. As here, it is simply coercive process. This distinction is also mentioned in the case of In re Patterson, 99 N. C. 407, 6 S. E. 643. Whether the court also will punish the defendants for the offense against its dignity and authority is left to its sound discretion.

We find no error in the record.
No error.

STATE v. WINDLEY. (No. 1.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 10, 1919.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW §27—FELONY OR MISDEMEANOR—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE.

Sheriff who delivered collected taxes to county treasurer instead of person entitled thereto was merely guilty of a misdemeanor, under Revisal 1905, § 3576, and not of a felony, under section 3408, denouncing as a felony failure to turn over to person entitled thereto "all such moneys, funds," etc., the latter statute having reference to money held in trust for any person or corporation, in view of preceding provision thereof relating to embezzlement of such trust funds.

2. CRIMINAL LAW §886—VERDICT—SURPLUSAGE—FELONY—MISDEMEANOR.

Where defendant, found guilty of a felony under one statute, was not in fact guilty thereof, but merely of a misdemeanor under another statute, verdict will not be permitted to stand as one convicting him of the misdemeanor, on the theory that the words "willfully and feloniously" were mere surplusage.

3. CRIMINAL LAW §763, 764(7) — INSTRUCTIONS—PROVINCE OF JURY.

Instruction that, if jurors believed defendant's testimony given in his own behalf, they should return verdict of guilty, held improper, as invading province of jury.

4. CRIMINAL LAW §656(9)—TRIAL—PROVINCE OF JURY.

The jury should at all times be left free and untrammelled to find the facts, without the slightest intimation by court as to what the verdict should be.

5. CRIMINAL LAW §731 — PROVINCE OF JUDGE AND JURY.

The judge declares the law arising upon the evidence, and the jury should be governed by his instructions.

6. CRIMINAL LAW §731 — PROVINCE OF JUDGE AND JURY.

Jurors are the sole triers of the facts, subject to the right of the court to say what evidence is competent and relevant and what it tends to prove, the question of what in fact it does prove being for the jury.

7. CRIMINAL LAW §308—PRESUMPTION OF INNOCENCE.

Defendant is presumed to be innocent, the state having the burden of proving guilt to the full satisfaction of the jury.

8. CRIMINAL LAW §874—POLLING JURY BEFORE VERDICT.

Under Revisal 1905, § 535, court's action in asking the jurors, before rendition of verdict, if each of them believed defendant's testimony, and if so to hold up his right hand, held improper.

9. CRIMINAL LAW §874—POLLING JURY.

The approved practice, in polling jurors after rendition of verdict, is to do so merely to make sure that verdict is that of entire jury, and not to inquire as to a special finding or their belief as to one particular fact.

10. CRIMINAL LAW §1141(1)—APPEAL—PRESUMPTION.

On appeal from conviction, court, in passing upon exception complaining of conduct of lower court, will assume that defendant may be innocent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; Bond, Judge.

W. B. Windley was convicted of failing to pay over money received as sheriff to persons entitled thereto when lawfully required to do so, and he appeals. New trial.

The charge in the indictment is that the defendant had unlawfully, willfully, and feloniously, as sheriff of Beaufort county, failed to pay over and deliver to the proper persons entitled to receive the same, when lawfully required to do so, certain money and funds which he had received by virtue or color of his office, in trust, contrary to the provision of the statute. The indictment was drawn under Revisal, § 3408, and this is stated in the brief of the state, which refers to the original statute, Code of 1883, § 1016, as having been amended, in consequence of the decision in State v. Connelly, 104 N. C. 794, 10 S. E. 469, by Public Laws of 1891, c. 241, and brought forward in the Revisal as section 3408.

There was evidence tending to show that the defendant had collected certain taxes, especially unlisted taxes, such as license and privilege taxes, and had failed to pay over the same to the officer designated by the law to receive them. The court instructed the jury that if they believed the defendant's testimony which he gave in his own behalf, and found the facts to be as it tends to show them to be, it would be their duty to return a verdict of guilty on the first count, ignoring the count for embezzlement.

E. A. Daniel, Jr., and Small, MacLean, Bragaw & Rodman, all of Washington, N. C., for appellant.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] If we assume that the testimony of the defendant was of such a nature as to warrant the instruction to the jury, we are of the opinion that the court erred in further telling them, in answer to the question of one of the jurors, that they should convict the defendant if he simply received certain money and failed to pay it to the proper party, though he may have paid it to the county treasurer. The first part of section 3408 of the Revisal of 1905 relates to the embezzlement or willful and corrupt use or misapplication of funds held by any officer, agent, or employé of any city, county, or incorporated town, or of any penal, charitable, religious, or educational institution, and denounces it as a felony, and that any such person convicted of the same shall be fined and imprisoned in the penitentiary for a time to be fixed by the court in the exercise of its discretion. The next provision of the section applies to the embezzlement, wrongful conversion, or corrupt use or misapplication to any purpose, other than that for which it is held, of any money, funds, securities, or other property, which such officer shall have received, by virtue or color of his office, in trust for any person or corporation, and such act is declared to be a felony. The statute, as amended in the year 1891, is composed of this provision, and the last one in the section (amendment of 1891), which is as follows:

"The provisions of this section shall apply to all persons who shall go out of office and fail or neglect to account to or deliver over to their successor in office or other persons lawfully entitled to receive the same all such moneys, funds and securities or property aforesaid. The punishment shall be imprisonment in the state's prison or county jail, or fine, in the discretion of the court."

The first part of the amendment refers to the embezzlement, conversion, etc., of money, funds, and other things held in trust for any person or corporation, and the second part to the failure or neglect of the officers to account for and deliver over to their successors in office, or to other persons who are lawfully entitled to receive the same, all such moneys, funds, etc.; which means, by the use of the word "such," all the money or funds, etc., held in trust by such officers for any person or corporation. The court held in State v. Connelly, 104 N. C. 794, 10 S. E. 469, that the statute, as then worded, applied only to the public officers who are designated in the same, and to private persons who held money or property in trust for the public corporations named therein, and therefore that Connelly, as clerk of the superior court, who held funds belonging to a distributee, private person, or corporation, was not indictable for failing to pay or deliver it to the person entitled thereto. At the next session of the Legislature after that case was decided the statute was amended, as indicated above, so as to cover such a case. But the Legislature has not failed to provide very fully for the case presented in this record. Revisal, § 3576, is as follows:

"If any state or county officer shall fail, neglect or refuse to make, file or publish, any report, statement or other paper, or to deliver to his successor all books and other property belonging to his office, or to pay over or deliver to the proper person all moneys which come into his hands by virtue or color of his office, or to discharge any duty devolving upon him by virtue of his office as he is by law required to do, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

The language of this section is very broad, and seems to include every case where any officer named therein has failed to pay to the proper person, whoever he may be, all moneys received by virtue or color of his office. The offense is made a misdemeanor, and punishable as such under the law. But it is suggested that the jury are presumed to have followed the judge's instruction that a verdict of guilty should be rendered by them, if they found only that defendant had received certain money, as taxes, and failed to pay it over to the proper party, and that such a verdict, upon the only count in the indictment they were directed to consider, would mean no more, and would not be one for embezzlement, and that, as the jury convicted under this instruction, the verdict should be taken as convicting only for the offense described in the charge; that this offense, though not a felony, but simply a misdemeanor, under Revisal, § 3576, is included in the general allegations of the count, and therefore the verdict should stand as one convicting defendant of the misdemeanor, and the punishment imposed accordingly, the words "willfully and feloniously" being regarded as mere surplusage.

[2] This would be dangerous practice, even if we admit the premises and the conclusion drawn from them. The defendant was convicted of the felony, and the jury so declared when they rendered the verdict, which means, when properly construed, guilty of the offense charged in the bill of indictment, which is a felony, because it is made so by the statute. The jury did not return as their verdict that he was guilty of the misdemeanor charged in the bill, even if such a verdict would be a legal and valid one, as to which we do not decide, it not being necessary that we should do so.

There is another consideration. As this verdict stands now the defendant has been convicted of a felony, and if the verdict is permitted to stand he will be deprived of his right to vote and to hold office, under article 6, §§ 2 and 8, of the Constitution, and the punishment may extend to confinement in the state prison at hard labor. This but shows the great importance of a close scrutiny of the record to see if the defendant has been properly convicted of the felony charged in the bill, or whether, if guilty at all, his offense is only a misdemeanor. It is all too serious a charge for the record to be left in any state of uncertainty. The court thought that the defendant had been convicted of a felony, as it sentenced him to be imprisoned three years in the penitentiary.

[3] But, leaving this matter here, we are of the opinion that in any view, whether it be a felony or a misdemeanor, the learned judge went too far in his charge to the jury. We are fully aware that he did not intend to do so, but intended to confine his instructions to the jury within the proper limits. The language of the court addressed to the jury was, in our opinion, subversive of that freedom of thought and of action so very essential to a calm, fair, and impartial consideration of the case. The desire to see the law vindicated, and any violation of it receive the proper punishment, is a most commendable one; but we should not indulge it at the risk of taking from the defendant any of the constitutional or statutory safeguards.

[4] The slightest intimation of the court, by word or deed, as to what the verdict should be, may be fatal to any defendant, though he may be ever so innocent, and our statute provides against it. The jury should, at all times, be left free and untrammelled to find the facts.

[5, 6] The judge declares the law arising upon the evidence, and the jury should be governed by his instructions; but they are the sole triers of the facts, subject to the right of the judge to say what evidence is competent and relevant and what it tends to prove. What it does prove is the peculiar question for the jury to decide.

The present Chief Justice clearly stated the rule in State v. Riley, 113 N. C. 648, 18 S. E. 168, when he said:

"The plea of not guilty disputes the credibility of the evidence, even when uncontradicted, since there is the presumption of innocence, which can only be overcome by the verdict of the jury."

As said by Judge Henderson and Judge Hall in Bank v. Pugh, 8 N. C. at page 206:

"The manner in which the judge instructed the jury is, to me, also sufficient to warrant a new trial. He charged the jury that, if they believed the testimony of Stephens, they should find the paper writing not to be the deed of the defendant. Now, what Mr. Stephens' testimony proved was a thing on which he could not decide; that belonged to the jury, * * * [who] are the constitutional judges, not only of the truth of testimony, but of the conclusions of fact resulting therefrom."

And by Pearson, J., in State v. Shule, 32 N. C. 154:

"We think there was error in the mode of conducting the trial. There must be a venire de novo. There was a departure from the established mode of proceeding, and the wisest policy is to check innovation at once; particularly as, in this case, it concerns the 'trial by jury,' which the 'Bill of Rights' declares 'ought to remain sacred and inviolable.' * * * The innovation is that, instead of permitting the jury to give their verdict, the court allows a verdict to be entered for them, such as it is to be presumed the court thinks they ought to render; and then they are asked if any of them disagree to it, thus making a verdict for them, unless they are bold enough to stand out against a plain intimation of the opinion of the court."

The same view of what is the proper mode of trial is thus stated by Justice Connor in State v. Adams, 133 N. C. 667, 45 S. E. 553:

"It may well admit of question whether it be not more consonant with the genius of our law to permit the juries, under proper instruction of the court, to find the truth as they believe it to be, certainly in criminal cases, drawing such inferences and conclusions from admissions and facts proved to their satisfaction as experience, observation, and reason suggest."

The judge, in this case, did not enter the verdict, and ask if any of the jurors disagreed to it, as was done in State v. Shule, supra; but the jurors were, in effect, polled, and asked if each of them believed the testimony of the defendant, and, if so, to hold up his right hand. This was done after a statement by the court of what the defendant, as a witness in his own behalf, had said, and the further remark that he had proved himself to be a man of good character. The court then instructed the jury that, having all of them said that they believed the statement of defendant, he had told them before, and would tell them now, that it is their duty, as jurors, to take the law from the court, and if they believe defendant's testimony, and found the facts which it tends to show, to convict him. There are other expressions of like kind, though somewhat more intensive in form and emphasis. It may be that this defendant is guilty, under the facts, of violating the law as defined in the statute; but, if so, the jury must be permitted to find the facts from the evidence freely and voluntarily; and this is true, no matter how plain a case against the defendant it may appear to be, as the plea of not guilty challenges the truth of the testimony, and "denies the credibility of the witnesses."

[7] The defendant was not given any benefit of the presumption of innocence, and no reference was made to it or to the doctrine of reasonable doubt. The burden of showing guilt is upon the state, as the contrary is presumed, and this requires that it should prove its case to the full satisfaction of the jury. It was said in State v. Simmons, 143 N. C. 613, 56 S. E. 701, and approved in State v. Godwin, 145 N. C. 461, 59 S. E. 132, 122 Am. St. Rep. 467:

"When the jury returned to court, after having been out for a few minutes, the judge inquired of them as to their trouble in reaching a verdict, and they replied that some of them thought the defendant guilty and others thought he was not guilty; whereupon the judge polled the jury, asking each juror if he believed the evidence, when each replied that he did believe the evidence as given on the stand. This was not according to regular procedure or the approved precedents in such cases, if it was not a direct violation of the act of 1796. * * * Besides being in effect an intimation of opinion as to what the verdict should be, the inquiry of the judge and the manner of making it were calculated to deprive the jury of the freedom of thought and action which is so essential to an impartial consideration of the case and a proper discharge of their duty."

See, also, State v. Green, 134 N. C. 658, 46 S. E. 761, Benton v. Toler, 109 N. C. 238, 13 S. E. 763, and McCanless v. Flinchum, 98 N. C. 358, 4 S. E. 359, where the court said:

"Proof is the result or conclusion usually reached by evidence. If there was evidence upon the issues, the jury alone could determine and weigh its effect and find the fact to be deduced from it." State v. Davis, 15 N. C. 612 (Op. of Gaston, J.).

[8, 9] We do not think that the evidence was such as to admit of the instructions given by the court. The manner of instructing the jury violated the spirit, if not the letter, of our statute. Revisal, § 535 (Act of 1796, c. 452); Withers v. Lane, 144 N. C. 184, 56 S. E. 855. It is not permissible to poll the jury before the verdict is announced, and it is done then to make sure of the verdict being that of the entire jury—the conclusion of all the jurors. (State v. Sheets, 89 N. C. 543, at pages 549, 550; Bish. Cr. Pro. § 830; State v. Young, 77 N. C. 498); and that is the approved and usual practice (State v. Sheets, supra). We do not regard it as according to the established rule to poll the jurors as to a special finding, and especially as to their belief regarding one particular fact, or the impression made upon their minds. It is better to follow the beaten way in such vital matters. There are other considerations not now necessary to be mentioned.

A learned presiding judge, in the course of a trial, may, and sometimes does, unwittingly, or inadvertently, so express himself as to influence the minds of the jurors, and this, of course, is done unconsciously, and without due regard, at the time, to such injurious effect. We do not doubt that such was the case in this instance. The error, though, must be corrected, however unconsciously committed; for the harm is just the same, in kind and degree.

[10] The accused may be guilty of the crime alleged against him, but, in passing upon exceptions like those now taken, we must not forget, and should assume, that he may be innocent. We must conclude that the charge, especially when construed as a whole, was erroneous in the respect above indicated.

For the reasons stated, the defendant is entitled to a new trial. The solicitor will consider, in view of what we have said, whether it is prudent to make the indictment more conformable to the proof by adding another count, or by a fresh bill; but this is left entirely to his judgment.

We do not say that the defendant may not be convicted under the bill now before us, as it is not necessary to do so by anticipating further developments in the progress of the case. Our decision is strictly confined to what is presently before us, and does not go beyond it.

New trial.

LANCASTER v. LANCASTER. (No. 61.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 10, 1919.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW §48—CONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTE—PRESUMPTION.

Every presumption is in favor of the validity of an act of the Legislature.

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE §57—WIFE'S SEPARATE PROPERTY—INSANITY OF HUSBAND—CONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTE.

Revisal 1905, § 2116, giving wife power to convey her personal and real estate without husband's assent where husband has been declared an idiot or lunatic, held not violative of Const. art. 10, § 6, empowering wife to convey property with husband's written assent, in view of Revisal 1905, §§ 959, 2111, 2117, and notwithstanding section 1898.

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE §134—HUSBAND'S INTEREST IN WIFE'S LAND—CURTESY.

Husband has no interest in wife's land beyond a contingent right of curtesy, if she makes no will.

Appeal from Superior Court, Edgecombe County; Bond, Judge.

Action by Martha L. Lancaster against G. Z. Lancaster. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Appeal by defendant from Bond, J., June term, 1919. The plaintiff was seized in her own right of the land described in the pleadings. Her husband having been declared a lunatic, and being confined in the hospital at Raleigh, she contracted to sell the land to the defendant, who refused the deed tendered by the plaintiff upon the sole ground that she could not convey title thereto by a good and sufficient deed without the written assent of her husband. The court gave judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed.

H. D. Hardison, of Tarboro, for appellant.

F. S. Sprull, of Rocky Mount, and W. O. Howard, of Tarboro, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. The sole question raised is whether or not the plaintiff, whose husband had been declared a lunatic can during the continuance of such lunacy convey her land without the written assent of her husband, under section 2116 of the Revisal; in other words, whether or not this section is in violation of section 6, art. 10, of the Constitution.

This statute is clear and unambiguous. It provides, among other things, that "every woman * * * whose husband shall have been declared an idiot or a lunatic, shall be deemed and held, * * * from the date of such idiocy or lunacy and during its continuance, a free trader, and shall have power to convey her personal and real estate without the assent of her husband."

[1] Every presumption is in favor of the validity of an act of the Legislature.

The very next section (Rev. § 2117) provides that "every woman whose husband shall abandon her, or shall maliciously turn her out of doors, shall be deemed a free trader, * * * and shall have power to convey her personal estate and her real estate without the assent of her husband." This has been held valid in Vandiford v. Humphrey, 139 N. C. 65, 51 S. E. 893; Finger v. Hunter, 130 N. C. 531, 41 S. E. 890; Brown v. Brown, 121 N. C. 8, 27 S. E. 998, 38 L. R. A. 242; Hall v. Walker, 118 N. C. 377, 24 S. E. 6—all of which have been cited and approved recently by Allen, J., in Bachelor v. Norris, 166 N. C. 508, 82 S. E. 839.

For a stronger reason, section 2116, authorizing the wife to convey when the husband is wholly unable by reason of mental incapacity, duly adjudged, to give his assent, is a valid exercise of the legislative power.

[2] A reasonable construction must be put upon the constitutional provision. The husband's assent cannot be required when either by reason of mental incapacity he is unable to give assent, or by his conduct in abandoning his wife, or maliciously turning her out of doors, he has practically emancipated her, for in both cases she must rely upon her property or her labor for her support.

Section 2116 has been referred to in a number of cases as an exception to the constitutional provision which requires the assent of the husband, though not directly construed. In these cases it is stated that the husband's assent to the conveyance of the realty is required "except in cases under sections 2116 and 2117." Council v. Fridgen, 153 N. C. 443, 69 S. E. 404; Harvey v. Johnston, 133 N. C. 352, 45 S. E. 644; Sanderlin v. Sanderlin, 122 N. C. 1, 29 S. E. 55; Moore v. Wolfe, 122 N. C. 715, 30 S. E. 120; Farthing v. Shields, 106 N. C. 295, 10 S. E. 998; Hodges v. Hill, 105 N. C. 130, 10 S. E. 916; Flaum v. Wallace, 103 N. C. 304, 9 S. E. 567; Sparks v. Sparks, 94 N. C. 527.

It is inconceivable that in either of these cases the wife should be debarred from using her own property when the husband by his abandonment of her or turning her out of doors, or by reason of his mental incapacity, has left her to fight the battles of life alone. The Constitution could not have intended this, and we concur that the legislative construction, as expressed in sections 2116 and 2117, is reasonable and valid.

In Hall v. Walker, 118 N. C. 380, 24 S. E. 6, the court said:

"There is no constitutional inhibition on the power of the Legislature to declare where and how the wife may become a free trader. Const. art. 10, § 6, was not intended to disable, but to protect, her."

It is true that Rev. § 1898, provides that the wife of a lunatic owning real estate may proceed by petition before the clerk and obtain an order to sell the same. This is not in contradiction of section 2116, but is an optional alternative method, to which the wife can resort if for any reason it should be desirable that in future the record of the deed should show that at the time of the conveyance the husband had been adjudged a lunatic. This would prevent the possible necessity of the grantee proving that fact at some future date.

If the Legislature could dispense with the literal requirement of "the assent of the husband" by the wife obtaining the leave of the clerk it could dispense with it, without his leave, upon the same state of facts. The order of the clerk is only a contemporaneous certificate that the husband had been adjudged insane at the time of the conveyance, and that the sale is to her interest in his judgment. The Constitution does not require the approval of the clerk. That is purely legislative, and is dispensed with in the alternative method prescribed by Rev. § 2116.

Rev. § 2111, also provides that if the husband shall separate from his wife and live in adultery, or shall wrongfully abandon his wife, or if a divorce from bed and board shall be granted her, she may "sell and convey her real property as if she were unmarried."

Rev. § 959, provides that when the wife is a lunatic the husband may convey his own land without her joinder, "free and exempt from the dower rights and all other interests of his wife," with exception only of a conveyance of the homestead.

[3] The husband has no interest in the wife's land beyond a contingent right of curtesy if she makes no will. By Rev. § 2116, the Legislature holds his "written assent" to her conveyance of her land unnecessary when there is a legal adjudication that the husband is insane, and hence unable to give his assent. When he cannot give or refuse assent, the Legislature says he need not.

Affirmed.

GULF REFINING CO. v. MCKERNAN.
(No. 111.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 17, 1919.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR — 1106(5) — SUPREME COURT CAN REMAND FOR FULLER FINDINGS OF FACT.

The Supreme Court has power to remand a cause, so that there may be fuller finding of facts by the trial judge, in order that the appeal may be more intelligently considered.

2. MANDAMUS — 187(10) — FINDINGS NOT COVERING MATERIAL ISSUE, CAUSE REMANDED.

Where the court directed mandamus to issue to compel a chief of the fire department and ex officio building inspector to issue permit to erect an oil and gasoline distributing plant, failing to find as to applicability of an ordinance existing at beginning of suit and of two ordinances subsequently passed, which the defendant had pleaded, and whether the plant proposed to be erected by the plaintiff would conform to their provisions, held, that the cause must be remanded for such findings.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lee County; Connor, Judge.

Mandamus by the Gulf Refining Company against J. T. McKernan, as Chief of the Fire Department and ex officio Building Inspector of Sanford, to compel him to issue a permit for the erection of an oil and gasoline distributing plant. From a judgment directing mandamus to issue, defendant excepts and appeals. Error, and case remanded, with directions.

This was an application for a mandamus to compel the chief of the fire department, ex officio building inspector, of Sanford, to issue a permit for the erection of an oil or gasoline distributing plant in the said town, at the corner of the Southern Railway right of way and Washington street, a fully itemized description of which accompanied the plaintiff's written application.

In his answer, the defendant, among certain denials of the complaint and other matters alleged in defense, says:

"(1) That as the defendant is advised and believes he has no legal authority to issue a permit such as is desired by the plaintiff, and if the defendant has such authority that the issuance of such permit is within his sound discretion, in the exercise of which the court will not interfere.

"(2) That the plaintiff, through its authorized agent, A. W. Teague, made application to the board of aldermen for the town of Sanford, N. C., for permission to erect such buildings and structures desired for storing and distributing great quantities of gasoline, oil, and other highly dangerous and inflammable substances, at a regular meeting of the said board, held on the 1st day of July, 1919, and the said board of aldermen, in the exercise of its discretion, refused and declined to grant permission for the erection of the buildings and structures referred to.

"(3) That the storing of gasoline and oil and other highly dangerous and inflammable material nearer than 1,000 feet from any residence or in any residential section of the town of Sanford, N. C., is contrary to the ordinances of the said town.

"(4) That the erection or construction of buildings or other structures designed for the purpose of storing large quantities of gasoline, oil, and other highly dangerous and inflammable substances is in violation of the ordinances of the said town.

"(5) That the issuance of the said permit referred to and requested by the plaintiff is a matter exclusively within the sound discretion and judgment of the proper authorities of the town of Sanford, N. C., in the exercise of inherent governmental functions, pursuant to the Constitution and statutory authority conferred by chapter 380, Private Laws of 1915."

It appeared that after this proceeding was commenced the board of aldermen of Sanford passed two ordinances forbidding the erection of such an oil and gasoline plant as that which is described by the plaintiff, except under certain restrictions, "within 1,000 feet of any dwelling, or in any residential section within the corporate limits of the two of Sanford," and any violation of either of the two ordinances is made a misdemeanor, with penalty prescribed. There was already an ordinance forbidding the location of such a plant in the town within 100 feet of any dwelling house.

The court was of the opinion, and so adjudged, that the defendant is not vested with any discretion to refuse the permit to the plaintiff, and it declined to decide the question as to the validity of the ordinance passed before the suit was commenced, or the two ordinances which were passed in July, 1919, and above described, and directed the mandamus to issue. Defendant excepted and appealed.

Williams & Williams, of Sanford, for appellant.

Hoyle & Hoyle, of Sanford, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] We deem it impossible, or at least inadvisable, to decide upon the merits of this case, and to render such a judgment as will finally settle it, without a finding of the facts with reference to the three ordinances, and especially as to whether the proposed structures, if placed upon the lot in Sanford, which has been described, will violate the provisions of the said ordinances, or any one of them, and, if so, which one of them. We therefore remand the case, with instructions to find the facts as indicated above, to the end that the case may be fully considered.

This court has the power to remand a case, so that there may be a fuller finding of facts by the judge, and in order that the appeal may be more intelligently considered in every view of it. Straus v. Beardsley, 79 N. C. 59; Gatewood v. Burns, 99 N. C. 357, 6 S. E. 635; Holley v. Holley, 96 N. C. 229, 1 S. E. 553. This case is far too important in itself, and in its results, for us to decide it, except upon the fullest showing as to the facts. The defendant pleaded the new ordinances, and their effect upon the case should be passed upon.

[2] The case is therefore remanded, with directions to find the facts relating to the two ordinances, and as to the other question, whether the plant proposed to be erected by the plaintiff will conform to their provisions, stating the location of the plant and its surroundings, and such other matters as will enable the court to determine whether the ordinances are applicable, and, if so, to what extent. Our opinion as to the law is withheld until all the facts are before us.

We do not agree with the learned judge that the ordinances were not before him for his consideration, and a determination as to whether or not they would affect the result, and, if so, in what way and to what extent; but the facts should have been found. In this respect there was error. The judge will reconsider the case, upon the new facts found by him, and enter such judgment as he may deem to be proper. The case may be further heard at this term, if so desired by the parties. Defendant will pay the costs of this appeal to this time.

Error, and remanded, with directions.

TOWNSHIP ROAD COMMISSION OF NO.
10 TP. v. BOARD OF COM'RS OF EDGECOMBE COUNTY. (No. 60.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 17, 1919.)

1. TOWNS ~~654~~ — POWER OF TOWNSHIP BOARDS AS TO TAXATION CONTROLLED BY COUNTY COMMISSIONERS.

The power of township boards in matters of municipal taxation under Const. art. 7, §§ 3-6, which sections are subject to the provisions of section 14 thereof, to the effect that Legislature shall have full power by statute to modify, change, or abrogate their provisions, is limited by Revisal 1906, § 1318, subsec. 30, to powers authorized by act of the General Assembly, to be exercised under supervision of the board of county commissioners.

2. TOWNS ~~655~~ — TOWNSHIPS NOT AUTHOR-IZED TO WORK ROADS BY CURRENT TAXA-TION.

Pub. Laws 1913, c. 122, purporting to provide for the establishment of a township road system to be maintained under separate governance, funds to be raised by bond issue, construed together with Pub. Laws 1917, c. 279, amending it, held insufficient to authorize working the roads by current taxation.

3. STATUTES ~~621~~ — VOID WHEN NOT PASSED
AS PROVIDED BY CONSTITUTION.

Pub. Laws 1917, c. 279, amending Pub. Laws 1913, c. 122, and purporting to change the method of maintaining a separate township road system from a bond issue restricted in amount to current taxation from year to year, indefinite as to time must be set aside and declared void, where not read and passed by the assembly on three different days, and the yeas and nays on second and third readings entered on the journal, as required by Const. art. 2, § 14.

Appeal from Superior Court, Edgecombe County; Bond, Judge.

Controversy without action wherein the Township Road Commission of No. 10 Township applied for mandamus to compel the Board of Commissioners of Edgecombe County to lay a special tax. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff excepted and appeals. Affirmed.

Controversy to determine the question whether defendants can be compelled to lay special township tax for road purposes, heard on case agreed before his honor, Judge Bond, at June term, 1919, of the superior court of Edgecombe county. The pertinent facts appearing in the case agreed are as follows:

"(1) That the township road commission of No. 10 township is a corporate body, duly created and existing under and by virtue of the public laws of the state of North Carolina. That the board of commissioners of Edgecombe county exercises control of the affairs of the county under and by virtue of the laws of North Carolina.

"(2) That on April 17, 1919, under the provisions of chapter 122, Public Laws 1913, and the amendment thereto by chapter 279, Public Laws 1917, W. L. Dunn and 107 other qualified voters of No. 10 township duly petitioned the board of commissioners of Edgecombe county, said 108 being more than one-fourth of the qualified voters of said township, to call an election to determine the will of the voters of said township as to whether or not to establish a township road district, to create and appoint a township road commission, and to levy a special road tax of 40 cents on the $100 value of property and a poll tax of $1.20.

"(3) That at the election duly ordered and held in said No. 10 township on May 21, 1919, the vote was 131 to 30 in favor of establishing said township road district, creating and appointing said township road commission, and levying said special road tax; said 131 being more than a majority of the qualified voters of said No. 10 township.

"(4) That on June 2, 1919, at the regular meeting of the said board of commissioners of Edgecombe county, the result of said election was duly certified to the said board. That the said board of commissioners duly created the said township road district of No. 10 township, and duly appointed W. L. Dunn, W. B. Walston, and A. J. Walston as the township road commission of No. 10 township, but refused to levy the said special road tax voted for in said election.

"(5) That the said chapter 122, Public Laws 1913, was duly and constitutionally enacted, and that the amendment thereto, as set out in chapter 279, Public Laws 1917, was duly certified by the presiding officers of both houses of the General Assembly and duly enrolled, but that said amendment was not read and passed on three different days and the yeas and nays on the second and third readings entered on the journal. That the said chapter 122, Public Laws 1913, and the amendment thereto by chapter 279, Public Laws 1917, and the entire public law as amended, is hereby made a part of this record.

"(6) That to enable the plaintiff to obtain the necessary means to develop and maintain the public roads in No. 10 township they applied to the defendants, according to the result of said election, to levy the said property tax of 40 cents of the $100 value of property and a poll tax of $1.20 upon the property and polls of said township. That the assessed value of all taxable property situated in said township for the past ten years is of the average value of $400,000.

"(7) That the said defendant refused to levy the said special road tax as voted for in said election and demanded by the said plaintiff, pursuant to the vote of the people in said election, among other reasons, on the ground that the amendment as set out in chapter 279, Public Laws 1917, was not passed by the General Assembly as required by the Constitution of North Carolina, article 2, section 14.

"Wherefore it is agreed that, if the court be of the opinion with the plaintiff, the court will order the necessary writ to issue compelling the defendant to levy the said special tax, but, if the court be of opinion with the defendant, the necessary order will issue dismissing the action."

There was judgment for defendant, and plaintiff excepted and appealed.

John L. Bridgers and Henry C. Bourne, both of Tarboro, for appellant.

Allsbrook & Phillips, of Tarboro, for appellee.

HOKE, J. [1] We concur in the ruling of his honor that on the facts appearing in the case agreed, the application of the plaintiff has been properly denied. Whatever may have been the power of township boards in matters of municipal taxation existent under article 7 of the Constitution, more especially in sections 3, 4, 5, and 6, they are subject to the provisions of section 14 of the same article, to the effect that the Legislature shall have full power by statute to modify, change, or abrogate any and all provisions of the article, except sections 7, 9, and 13; these last having no bearing on the questions presented in the controversy.

Acting under the powers conferred by this section, the General Assembly, in Revisal, c. 23, § 1318, subsec. 30, have provided, among other things, that:

"No township shall have or exercise any corporate powers whatsoever, unless authorized by an act of the General Assembly, to be exercised under the supervision of the board of commissioners."

[2] By the express provisions of this statute, therefore, township boards have no corporate powers, municipal or otherwise, except those expressly conferred by legislative enactment and to the extent that the statute provides. This being the general law presently appertaining to the subject, a perusal of chapter 122, Public Laws of 1913, on which plaintiff must rely in support of the relief sought by him, will disclose that it purports to provide a scheme by which townships may establish a township road system and maintain same under its separate governance, and the method of raising funds for the purpose is to be by a bond issue, restricted in amount and on approval of the voters of the township. The vote is to be "for or against bonds"; the taxation authorized is to pay the interest on said bonds, and it is nowhere provided or contemplated by the act that the roads designated therein are to be worked or maintained by current taxation directly applicable to the purpose.

It is contended for the appellants that, while chapter 122, Laws of 1913, does not authorize current taxation directly for road purposes, this power is conferred by chapter 279, Pub. Laws of 1917, in force at the time of the petition and election had in this instance, and in which the power of direct taxation is claimed to be fully authorized. This statute is, in terms, an amendment to that of 1913, and, construing the two together, the proper method of arriving at their true intent and meaning (Keith v. Lockhart, 171 N. C. 451, 88 S. E. 640, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 916), there would seem to be no sufficient authority given to work the roads by current taxation; but, if the power, as expressed, be conceded, it would not avail the plaintiffs, for the last act was not passed in accord with article 2, § 14, of the Constitution, and is therefore inoperative so far as conferring the power of taxation is concerned.

[3] Although the section of the Constitution just referred to, requiring that statutes for creating debts or imposing taxes shall be enacted with certain specified formalities, refers in express terms to the state, counties, cities, and towns, it has been directly held that the same applies also to townships as constituent parts of counties, and will render ineffective any legislation of that character which fails to comply with its requirements. Wittkowsky v. Commissioners, 150 N. C. 90, 63 S. E. 275. True, we have held, in Wagstaff v. Commissioners, 177 N. C. 354, 99 S. E. 1, Gregg v. Commissioners, 162 N. C. 479, 78 S. E. 301, Glenn v. Wray, 126 N. C. 730, 36 S. E. 167, and other cases where the question was directly considered, that, when a principal statute had been enacted in accord with the constitutional provision referred to, an amendment "which does not increase the amount of the debt or the taxes to be levied, or otherwise materially change the original bill, will be upheld and constitute a portion of the law without the observance of the stated formalities"; but we are of opinion that an amendment of the kind presented here, which purports to change the method of maintaining a separate township road system from a bond issue restricted in amount to current taxation from year to year, indefinite as to time, might, in its practical application, work such a change in the burdens imposed that it could, in no sense, be regarded as immaterial within the meaning of the principle, and must be set aside because it was not passed with the formalities required by the organic law. Bennett v. Commissioners, 173 N. C. 625, 92 S. E. 603.

In accord with these views, we must hold that the commissioners are without valid statutory authority to levy this tax, and that plaintiff's application for mandamus, compelling its levy, has been properly denied.

Affirmed.

MITCHELL v. MELTON et al. (No. 122.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 17, 1919.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨799—WHEN MOTION TO DISMISS FOR FAILURE TO FILE TRANSCRIPT DEFECTIVE.

Motion to dismiss appeal for appellant's failure to file transcript seven days before entering on the call of the docket as required by rule 5 (18 S. E. vii), where not accompanied by certificate of clerk of court as required by rule 17 (81 S. E. ix), was defective.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨797(3) — MOTION TO DISMISS MUST BE MADE BEFORE DEFECT CURED.

When appellant fails to docket his appeal at the required time, the applicant must move to dismiss at that time, or subsequently during the term, provided he does so before the appellant cures the defect by docketing the transcript.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨800—MOTION TO DISMISS DENIED ON CORRECTION OF DEFECT.

Where appellee moved to dismiss appeal for appellant's failure to file transcript within required time, under court rule 5 (81 S. E. vii), but failed to file certificate of clerk of court until after appellant had filed transcript, it will not be dismissed, since appellant, by filing transcript, cured his laches.

Appeal from Superior Court, Bertie County; Gulon, Judge.

Action by Luzania Mitchell against Mary Melton and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. On motion to dismiss appeal. Motion denied.

W. R. Johnson, of Ahoskie, and R. C. Bridger, of Winton, for appellants.

Winston & Matthews, of Windsor, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. [1] The defendants not having filed the transcript on appeal on September 2d, seven days before entering upon the call of the docket of the district to which it belonged, as required by rule 5 (81 S. E. vii), the plaintiff filed his motion under rule 17 (81 S. E. ix) to docket and dismiss. But this motion was defective, because it was not accompanied by the certificate of the clerk of the court as required by said rule. The defendants thereupon filed said transcript on the next day, September 3d. The clerk's certificate to complete the appellee's motion to dismiss was filed thereafter on September 5th.

[2] When the appellant fails to docket his appeal at the required time, the appellee can move to dismiss at that time, or subsequently during the term, provided he does so before the appellant cures the defect by docketing the transcript. Benedict v. Jones, 131 N. C. 473, 42 S. E. 909; Vivian v. Mitchell, 144 N. C. 472, 57 S. E. 167. And for that purpose we have held that the appellee can file his motion, even in vacation, or on a day when the court is not in session. Craddock v. Barnes, 140 N. C. 428, 53 S. E. 239; Vivian v. Mitchell, supra. But if the appellant files his record before such motion is made by the appellee, if at the term at which the appeal should be taken, it is too late then for the appellee to move to dismiss. This has been held in numerous cases. Laney v. Mackey, 144 N. C. 630, 57 S. E. 386; Foy v. Gray, 148 N. C. 436, 62 S. E. 523; Gupton v. Sledge, 161 N. C. 214, 76 S. E. 527.

[3] In this case the appellee moved in time, but he did not comply with rule 17, because of the absence of the certificate of the clerk below, which is the very basis upon which the motion to dismiss is based. It was therefore no motion. In the meantime, before the appellee perfected his motion by filing such certificate, the appellant cured his laches by docketing the transcript on September 4th. The case was therefore regularly on docket before the appellee filed an efficient motion; but, the case being docketed less than seven days before the call of the district, it stands continued under rule 5. The motion to dismiss came too late.

Motion denied.

HARRIS v. HARRIS et al. (No. 18.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 10, 1919.)

1. WITNESSES ⇨180—COMPETENCY—TRANSACTION WITH DECEASED—OBJECTION.

Incompetency of evidence under Revisal 1905, § 1631, as to testimony of transaction or communication with deceased, must appear at the time of objection to the evidence, so that court can rule intelligently upon objection.

2. WITNESSES ⇨158—COMPETENCY—TRANSACTION WITH DECEASED.

In action against heirs of deceased brother to have resulting trust established upon interest in land purchased in name of brother, with consideration furnished in part by plaintiff, plaintiff's testimony as to harvesting of crop was not incompetent, under Revisal 1905, § 1631, where it did not appear that brother participated in, and was concerned with, harvesting of such crop.

3. WITNESSES ⇨158—COMPETENCY—TRANSACTION WITH DECEASED.

In action against heirs of deceased brother to have resulting trust established upon interest in land purchased in name of brother, with consideration furnished in part by plaintiff, plaintiff's testimony as to negotiations by plaintiff with brother's grantor held not incompetent, under Revisal 1905, § 1631.

4. WITNESSES ⇨180—COMPETENCY—TRANSACTION WITH DECEASED—TESTIMONY INCOMPETENT IN PART.

In action to have resulting trust established on interest in land purchased in name of deceased, with consideration furnished by plaintiff, refusal to exclude plaintiff's testimony as to his negotiations with grantor, as incompetent evidence of transaction with deceased, was not error, notwithstanding reference to time "we bought," where sentence containing reference was not separated from the rest of the statement and made the sole ground of exception.

5. WITNESSES ⇨139(5), 171—COMPETENCY—TRANSACTION WITH DECEASED.

In action against heirs of deceased brother to have resulting trust established on interest in land purchased in brother's name with plaintiff's money, testimony of one of the defendants as to transaction with deceased brother was not incompetent, under Revisal 1905, § 1631, where witness had no interest in result of action, or where his interest, if any, could not be favorably affected by his testimony.

6. TRUSTS ⇨90—RESULTING TRUST—JURY QUESTION.

In action against heirs of deceased brother to have resulting trust established on interest in land purchased in brother's name with consideration furnished in part by plaintiff, evidence as to the trust held sufficient for consideration of jury.

7. TRUSTS ⇨86—RESULTING TRUSTS—PRESUMPTION.

Where legal title is taken in the name of one person while consideration is furnished by another, as part of same transaction, the parties being strangers to each other, the presumption, in the absence of rebutting circumstances, is that he who supplies the money intends the purchase for his own benefit, and that the conveyance in the name of the other is a matter of convenience and arrangement for collateral purposes.

8. TRUSTS ⇨72—RESULTING TRUSTS—CREATION.

Where purchase money is furnished by one party, and as part of same transaction title is taken in the name of another, a resulting trust immediately arises, and person named in the conveyance becomes a trustee for party who furnished consideration.

9. TRUSTS ⇨89(5)—RESULTING TRUST—BURDEN OF PROOF.

One who claims a resulting trust, by reason of having paid purchase money of land the title of which is taken in name of another party, has the burden of establishing such trust by strong, clear, and unequivocal facts.

10. TRUSTS ⇨72—RESULTING TRUST—NATURE.

A resulting trust in favor of one who furnishes purchase money for land purchased in the name of another is based upon the presumed intention of the party furnishing the money, arising from the payment thereof, that he intended purchase for his own benefit.

11. TRUSTS ⇨89(2)—RESULTING TRUSTS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In action against heirs of deceased brother to have resulting trust established on interest in land purchased in name of brother, with money furnished in part by plaintiff, evidence held to show contribution by plaintiff of one-half of the purchase money, and to warrant inference that brother bought land in trust for plaintiff as to one-half interest therein.

12. TRIAL ⇨295(1)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION.

The charge must be read as a whole, and not disconnectedly, with effect given to every essential part thereof.

13. TRIAL ⇨285—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION.

Court's charge must be given a natural and reasonable construction, and should be considered upon the supposition that jurors are men of understanding and intelligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Hyde County; Devin, Judge.

Action by George W. Harris against W. D. Harris and others, heirs of W. S. Harris. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. No error.

Following is the testimony covered by exceptions 1 and 2, and the testimony of Jesse Harris, referred to in opinion.

George Harris, being duly sworn, testified:

"I am 67 years old now. In 1882 I lived at the old homestead where I am now living, where we were all raised. My father bought it. He died before my mother. My oldest brother was David Harris; he is not living. Sanford Harris was my next oldest brother. In 1882 I suppose there was about 15 or 16 acres of the homestead land cleared. (I raised corn on the lands of Mr. Howard that year, I don't know exactly how much. I myself worked on the Howard land; raised about 75 barrels of corn; put it in Mr. Tooley's barn. I myself shucked, shelled, bagged, and moved that corn to Captain Howard's boat to go to New Bern.)

"To the foregoing statement in parentheses defendants objected; objection overruled; defendants excepted." Exception No. 1.

"It was about 75 barrels; just about enough to run me. I knew this man McGowan who made this deed; his first name is Sylvester. He lived on Goose Creek Island, about 30 miles from here. He is the one who made one of these deeds. (I myself went to see this man McGowan in person about the purchase of this land. I went twice. The last time I saw him was nearly a year before this deed was made; it was before we bought the next spring; it was in 1881.)

"To the foregoing statement in parentheses defendants objected; objection overruled; defendants excepted." Exception No. 2.

Jesse Harris, being duly sworn, testified:

"I am a nephew of Sanford Harris and of George Harris; Wilson was my father. I always lived right near the home of Sanford and George Harris; I guess 200 or 300, I don't reckon it is over 300, yards, up until I was married. I am 51. I got it in fee simple; I purchased it back. I have conveyed that land back since the last trial. That land is my interest. I sold him my interest in the land and got it back, so now I own just what I owned as if I had never sold to him. I am one of the nephews of Sanford Harris. I have got a deed from George Harris for the real estate; for the personal property I have not. I sold him all the interest I have in it, and he deeded the land back to me; the deed has been recorded. I rather not testify in the case; I rather not have anything to do with it. The crops raised on the McGowan land, on the homestead land, and the other tract referred to as belonging to the wife of George Harris, were all held in the old homestead, and they usually got the bread corn out of the best and put it in the barn, and put the other in another barn. They had two barns. I don't remember of Uncle Sanford Harris ever putting so much in his or Uncle George putting so much in his; if they did it, I don't have any recollection of it. When I was small and first started in the field to work I worked with Uncle Sanford, and we lived right along side of him, and I started as a boy, and Uncle Sanford did plow for a short while. I don't know, I won't say, how far back my recollection goes. I am in my 52d. I don't know when that was when I worked with them as a kid, but I do say he did work some then, but he was feeble then, and it was not long, I'll say for 30 years. He would disc plow and work a little, but then he wasn't able to work when they were clearing the McGowan land. I would go to the house many a time. (I wouldn't say who cleared the McGowan land. I won't say who did it; there were so many that worked in there under both of them and with me, I just wouldn't attempt it. It was cleared under the direction of Uncle Sanford and Uncle George. Uncle George worked on it himself. I don't know how old I was; I was a good size boy. I was thinning corn on this McGowan land and Uncle Sanford was dirt-ing behind me. My grandmother came down there one morning soon after breakfast and said, 'Sanford you take that mule out right now and go and give George a deed for this land.' He answered, 'Ma, I can do that any time.' She didn't say the McGowan land, and didn't mention any land; she said 'this land.' I was on the McGowan land and Uncle Sanford was on it. She never said anything who bought it.)

"To the foregoing statements in parentheses defendants objected; objection overruled; defendants excepted." Exception No. 3.

"He said, 'Ma, I haven't got time now; I can do that any time.' I remember her saying that to him. That's the only time I ever heard her speak of that. I won't say positively who handled the proceeds of the sales of the crops. Uncle Sanford never told me; he didn't tell me either way. (I know that Mr. Sanford Harris once had a will written; he said so. It was seen and read by me. His sister gave it to me to take care of for her. They were both in the porch when she brought it out. He said it was his will; she had it for safekeeping, and for some reason she asked me to take care of it. They were both on the porch. He got it back in his possession. He only mentioned the McGowan land when he gave Staten the other half of it.)

"To the foregoing testimony in parentheses defendants objected; objection overruled; defendants excepted." Exception No. 4.

"It said one-half of the McGowan land to his nephew Staten. No reference was made to the other half. I helped to gather the crops, and it all went in the old homestead. First they usually gather the bread corn and put it in one barn, and it in the old barn, and then they gather the entire crop and place it in the other barn. The homestead, the McGowan land, and the Swindell land in one barn together; that's what they always did, ever since I have known they had two barns. The Swindell land is the land he got by his wife.

"Defendants moved that the Court strike from the record all the testimony of Mr. Jesse Harris; motion overruled and defendants excepted." Exception No. 5.

"Cross-examination: I say I read the will, and it was given me by Sandry Silverthorn for safekeeping, and in that will one-half of the McGowan land was mentioned as having been given to Staten Harris. That will was written July 26, 1900. I didn't testify last court that the will was written and dated in 1891 or 1890. I didn't testify that I was not positive on what date the will was written. I acknowledge that I got a little wrong in testifying. I said 1891, and he said wasn't it 1901, and he asked me didn't I mean 1901. I said, 'I mean 1900.' I meant 1900, too, because that was the date. I finally testified at the last term of court that it was 1900. I was settled then that the date was 1900. The will stated that the half of the McGowan land joining the old homestead was that given to Staten Harris. I remember that Joe Watson wrote the will, and W. S. Balle and Joe Watson witnessed it. I do not know where Mr. Balle is. I have seen him in court to-day. I haven't got that will now. I give it to Uncle Sanford. I didn't tell Mr. Ward I didn't remember whether Uncle Sanford and Uncle George handled their crops separately or not; if I did, I didn't mean it. I don't remember saying so. I told him I didn't know who handled it. I wouldn't say Uncle George didn't get what was coming to him from the sale of those crops; I wouldn't swear he did or did not. I never asked Uncle Sanford what he gave Uncle George; I don't know anything about it. Sure I know who lived at the old homestead. I don't know how old I was when I could first remember Uncle Sanford and Uncle George lived there, Uncle Benny did not. He was married when my father moved from Middletown; I think he was; if he wasn't, I don't remember his living there. I feel sure he was married when we moved from Middletown, still I was small when we moved from Middletown, I remember that. When we came back why then Uncle Sanford and Uncle George and Aunt Annie and Aunt Sandry lived there. I don't know how long ago that was. I wouldn't swear it was or was not as many as 20 years ago. I have an idea it was longer than five years ago, but I wouldn't swear to any date. I said I am 51, in my 52d. When that conversation took place between my grandmother and Uncle Sanford I was a good big boy and was thinning corn. Uncle George has asked me about that I expect 40 times; from the time it was spoken he always spoke to me about it. I shouldn't say that I mentioned it to him first. Uncle George was in the field. I think he heard the conversation. I don't know how far away he was; as well as I remember, I think he was hoeing on the ditch bank. We had all gone in the field. I might have been as far off as from here to you from Aunt Betsy and Uncle Sanford and grandmother. Grandmother came to the end; we plowed out to the end. I said I was thinning corn, and while my Uncle Sanford came out to the end she was standing there. I must have been coming out the same way with Uncle Sanford because we both came out at the end at the time, I remember that. I can't say how old I was. I wouldn't swear to how many years ago it has been. Mr. George Harris' daughter, who testified here the last time this case was tried, is named Rosie. I heard her testify. I heard her testify how this will read with reference to Staten Harris. I wouldn't swear that I remember just how she stated it. I remember the will said, 'I give to my "bequeathed" nephew, Staten Harris.' That's exactly the way the will read. I'll swear that Squire Watson wrote that will, 'I give to my "bequeathed" nephew.' My uncle told me that; and from what I have seen of the old gentleman's writing I would say it was his, but I would not be willing to swear to the writing, but I believe I would feel safe in swearing it. He gave half the land of the old homestead to his sister during her natural life. The exact words were, 'I give to my sister, Cassandry Silverthorn, a half interest in the old homestead where I now live, during her natural life, and then to my bequeathed nephew.' I read it a hundred times. She usually went up there once a week. I kept it ten or fifteen years. I wouldn't swear that I read it a hundred times and wouldn't swear that I didn't. She asked me to do it every time she went there. She wouldn't give any reason at all for wanting me to read it every time she came. She didn't come up there every day or every few days. I might have read it a hundred times. I might have done it. I read it just as well as I know my a, b, c. I just know it by heart. I say I know it by heart. I have stated it to you; I have not got it in my hand. The will first gave it to his sister, Cassandry Silverthorn. She was the first one mentioned in the will—his half interest in the homestead. It said, 'I give to sister, Cassandry Silverthorn, half of the homestead on which I now live, during her natural life, and then to my bequeathed nephew, Staten Harris, one-half of the McGowan land joining the old homestead. I give to my brother, George Harris, all personal property owned on the old homestead on which I now live. I give to my brother, W. L. Harris, half of the cattle which I own on the Bell Island, and my brother George Harris the other half; and he was appointed his executor, George H. Harris, to his will, and he give Uncle George all of the personal property owned on the homestead where they lived. To George H. Harris, every time the name in the will, it was George H. Harris. I told you he gave half of the McGowan land to Staten. I mought have left out that he gave him the half of the McGowan land next to the old homestead. I mought have left that out and I mought read it to you a dozen times. It was joining the old homestead. I certainly did not say I have no interest in the result of this lawsuit. I tell any man I have an interest in it. My interest is just this: I want what's coming to me, what honestly belongs to me, and no more. That's all the interest I have got in it, all the interest that is coming to me honestly and justly, and I have got that much interest in it. I think I told you once before that I deeded my interest in this W. S. Harris estate to George Harris. I am frank to tell you and the jury, too; I am perfectly frank, in his recovery what belongs to him. I am perfectly frank, for the heirs at law to hold what belongs to them. That is all the interest I have got in it—everything in the world. Mr. George Harris paid me $125 for my interest when I made a deed to him. He paid that cash. I am sure I did not testify last court that the consideration he paid me was a mule. The heirs said he bought a mule for me. He paid me the hard cash. They said he bought me a mule; that's what my uncle told my brother. He didn't buy any mule for it any more than you did. He bought my interest and paid me for it. When I sold my interest there was a judgment against me; I don't remember how much it was for. The plaintiff who got the judgment out against me was Mr. Brinn. I don't remember the amount of the judgment. It was Mr. Charlie Brinn. I think there was a judgment against me; I don't think there was an execution issued on the judgment. I didn't hear there was an execution issued on the judgment. Mr. Spencer was after collecting it and I saw him about it several times. I don't remember seeing Mr. Long about it, I wouldn't swear whether I did or did not. I don't remember whether I did or did not see him anything concerning any judgment or paper of any kind. I think George Harris sold me the interest in the land back again. You read the record. Don't the record show it? Yes; he sold it back to me. He didn't sell me the personal property. I paid him exactly the same that he paid me, $125. I didn't pay all of it right down. I paid him $75 of it in cash, and borrowed the balance from my son in Norfolk. He is in Norfolk now. I have not paid it back. I gave him the benefit of the personal estate, and he still has that interest. I have not given it to him. When I bought this land back I never thought about the personal property, never gave it a thought when I had the deed made for the real estate, before it covered all the personal property, and the deed was made back, and it was too late. I think Mr. Long prepared the deed that conveyed the land back to me.

"Redirect: I know old man Gray Credle, a negro. I won't say whether it was the last court he testified. I'll swear to this, when this case was tried, but I think there has been a court or two since. I don't know whether he is living or dead; they tell me he is dead. I don't know; my wife told me he was dead."

Plaintiff sought to have established a resulting trust as to one undivided interest in a tract of land which he alleges was purchased by him and his brother, W. S. Harris, the deed having been made to the latter for their joint benefit, and that he paid one-half of the purchase money.

The jury found for the plaintiff upon the following issues:

"(1) Was half of the purchase money, expended in buying the McGowan land described in the complaint, furnished by plaintiff, George W. Harris, and did Sanford Harris take a title to same to hold one-half interest in same in trust for the benefit of George W. Harris, as alleged? Answer: Yes.

"(2) Is plaintiff, George W. Harris, owner of one-half of the fund on deposit in the Bank of Hyde to credit of Sanford Harris at the time of his death? Answer: Yes."

Judgment was entered for the plaintiff, and defendants appealed.

Spencer & Spencer and S. S. Mann, all of Swan Quarter, and John G. Tooley, of Belhaven, for appellants.

Ward & Grimes, of Washington, N. C., for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). There was sufficient evidence of the trust, apart from the following testimony of Gray Credle:

"I worked with the two HARRISES, Mr. Sanford and George. I know the McGowan land and the homestead; know when they bought it. I cut the ditch for him. They cleaned the ditch off and hired me to cut it. Mr. Sanford set along the ditch bank, and told me this is the land I and brother George bought; one-half is his and the other is mine. He was talking about the McGowan land. I cut the ditches for them, and they cleared up the land crops. They hauled them and put them in one barn. I cut the ditch on the land that Mr. Sanford Harris said he and Mr. George bought. Mr. Sanford Harris told me, because I was doing the ditching for him. The old man handed me the money for cutting the ditch—Mr. Sanford Harris. I don't know whose money it was; one spoke at the time, and they were both together. Mr. George Harris and Mr. Sanford said they had a ditch for me to cut."

There are exceptions to evidence upon the ground that certain answers of the plaintiff, as his own witness, related to transactions and communications with his deceased brother, W. S. Harris. The testimony covered by the exceptions 1 and 2 did not show on its face such a transaction or communication. The testimony of Richard Howard, afterwards given, does not show its incompetency under Revisal, § 1631, when properly considered.

[1] If there was a transaction or communication between plaintiff and the deceased, it should have appeared to be so when the objection was made, so that the court could rule intelligently upon it. As we view it, the testimony was admissible.

[2-4] The exception which refers to the use of the word "we," in the sentence, "It was before we bought the next spring," must be overruled, because that sentence is a part of a mass of testimony, some of which was plainly competent, and the particular sentence was not separated from the rest of the statement and made the sole ground of exception. State v. Ledford, 133 N. C. 714, 45 S. E. 944, and Nance v. Telegraph Co., 177 N. C. 313, 98 S. E. 838, where the cases are collected. Stocks v. Cannon, 139 N. C. 60, 51 S. E. 802, does not apply.

[5] We do not see how Jesse Harris was interested in the result of this action (Brown v. Adams, 174 N. C. 496, 93 S. E. 989, L. R. A. 1918C, 911), or how his interest, or any he ever had, could be affected favorably by his testimony. The facts seem to show, on the contrary, that his testimony was, in one aspect of the case, unfavorable to himself, and therefore he was not disqualified. Bunn v. Todd, 107 N. C. 266, 11 S. E. 1043. Plaintiff derives his title or interest to the property in dispute under the agreement between him and his brother, W. Sanford Harris, and not under the witness. Bunn v. Todd, supra; Mull v. Martin, 85 N. C. 406. There are other answers to the objections not necessary to be considered.

[6] Upon the question of nonsuit, we are of the opinion that there was evidence as to the trust for the consideration of the jury. Among other testimony, we may refer to that of Gray Credle, which seems to be not only some evidence, but very full and sufficient evidence, of the trust.

We do not agree with the learned counsel that the judge excluded from the consideration of the jury the intention to create a trust in favor of the plaintiff as to one-half interest in the land. The form of the issue called for a finding as to this intention, and we also think that the charge includes it as an element of the equity which is sought to be established by the plaintiff. The jury say that one-half of the purchase money was furnished by the plaintiff, and that Sanford Harris acquired the legal title in trust to hold one-half interest in the land for his benefit. This is sufficiently clear as to the intention of the parties.

The court charged substantially that the jury must find from evidence, which is clear, cogent, and convincing, that George Harris, the plaintiff, not only furnished one-half of the purchase money, but that Sanford Harris acquired the title, which was to be held, as to one-half interest in the land, in trust for the plaintiff.

Bispham on Equity (9th Ed.) § 80, states that resulting trusts are substantially divided into four classes. It is then said that the nature of resulting trusts of the first of these classes—that is, where one pays the purchase money, but takes the title in the name of another—was clearly explained by Lord Chief Baron Eyre in Dyer v. Dyer, 2 Cox, 92 (1 Lead. Cases in Eq. [4 Eng. Ed.] 165, 203); it being there held, as the clear result of all the cases, without a single exception, that the trust of a legal estate, whether freehold, copyhold, or leasehold, whether taken in the names of the purchaser and others jointly, or in the names of others without that of the purchaser, whether in one name or several, whether jointly or successively, results to the man who advances the purchase money. To illustrate the doctrine thus stated, suppose A. advances the purchase money of an estate, and a conveyance of the legal interest in it is made either to B., or to B. and C., or to A., B., and C. jointly, or to A., B., and C. successively. In all these cases, if B. and C. are strangers a trust will result in favor of A.

"The reason of this doctrine is that the man who pays the purchase money is supposed to become, or to intend to become, the owner of the property, and the beneficial title follows that supposed intention. This doctrine is an analogy to the common-law rule, that where there is a feoffment without consideration the use will result to the feoffor. It applies to both realty and personalty, and trusts of this nature are expressly excepted out of the statute of frauds. The person in whose favor a trust is claimed to result must pay the purchase money as his own; if he merely advances it as a loan, no trust will result. Where money is advanced, and there is nothing more in the transaction than is implied from the violation of a parol agreement, equity will not decree the purchaser a trustee. A resulting trust of this kind must arise, if at all, from the payment of the purchase money at the time of the conveyance. If the purchase money is paid by several, and the title taken in the name of one, a trust will result to the others in proportion to the amount paid by each. But to create a resulting trust in such a case, the payment must be of some definite part of the purchase money."

The annotator of this text cites in its support Summers v. Moore, 113 N. C. 394, 18 S. E. 712 (opinion by Shepherd, C. J.), which states the doctrine in substantially similar language. The rule is well-stated in the first two headnotes, as follows:

[7-9] "1. Where, upon a purchase of property, the conveyance of the legal title is taken in the name of one person, while the consideration is given or paid by another at the same time or previously and as part of the same transaction, the parties being strangers to each other, the presumption, in the absence of rebutting circumstances, is that he who supplies the money intends the purchase for his own benefit, and not for another, and that the conveyance in the name of the other is a matter of convenience and arrangement for collateral purposes, and a resulting trust immediately arises from the transaction, and the person named in the conveyance will be a trustee for the party from whom the consideration proceeds.

"2. In such case the burden is upon him who claims the resulting trust, and, as the law gives a peculiar force and solemnity to deeds, it will not allow them to be overthrown by mere words, but only by facts strong, clear, and unequivocal."

[10] It will be perceived from this statement of the law that the trust is based upon the presumed intention of the party arising from the payment of the purchase money or his share of it and the court in this case substantially followed the rule in its charge to the jury.

[11] There was ample evidence to show a contribution to one-half of the purchase money, and also evidence from which the jury could reasonably infer that Sanford Harris had bought the land in trust to hold, as to one-half interest therein, for the plaintiff. This evidence consisted, in part, of his own declarations or admissions tending to prove such a transaction before the purchase, or such an intention of the parties at the time that he should hold the title, not for himself as the sole owner of the land, but for their joint and equal benefit, and the judge evidently referred to this evidence when he gave the instruction as to what would constitute such a trust, and as to the quantum of proof.

[12, 13] The charge must be read as a whole, giving effect to every essential part of it, and not disconnectedly; it must have a natural and reasonable construction, and should be considered upon the supposition that the jurors are men of understanding and intelligence. State v. Exum, 138 N. C. 599, 50 S. E. 283; Kornegay v. Railroad Co., 154 N. C. 389, 70 S. E. 731; and Bradley v. Mfg. Co., 177 N. C. 153, 98 S. E. 318, citing other cases.

The other exceptions are either formal or without merit.

No error.

4. CHATTEL MORTGAGES ¶229(2) — PLEADING — REGISTRATION OF MORTGAGE.

In mortgagee's action against purchaser of mortgaged crops, failure of complaint to allege that mortgage was registered would not have been fatal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Currituck County; Devin, Judge.

Action by W. H. Gallop against G. W. Beveridge and others, partners trading as the Elizabeth City Milling Company. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

This was an action by plaintiff to recover $295.20, the value of certain cotton sold to the defendant the Elizabeth City Milling Company by one A. Cherry, against whom the plaintiff held a mortgage. The complaint alleged that the mortgage was duly recorded in Currituck county. At the trial the defendant demurred ore tenus, and moved to dismiss upon the ground that the complaint did not state a cause of action. A copy of the mortgage was set out in full as a part of the complaint. The demurrer was sustained, and the plaintiff appealed.

Aydlett, Simpson & Sawyer, of Elizabeth City, for appellant.

Thompson & Wilson, of Elizabeth City, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. [1] The mortgage describes the property as follows:

"My entire crop of Irish and sweet potatoes, corn, etc., grown in the year 1916 on the lands of Thomas Harris, being one-half of crop grown on said land."

This was a sufficient description. It was not necessary to mention in detail every article of the crop. The words "Irish and sweet potatoes, corn, etc.," were sufficient to indicate that all the crop of every description was embraced in the mortgage, and that the lien was not limited to the articles specifically named. The description of the land on which it was to be raised was "the lands of Thomas Harris," and certainly extended to the crops raised by the mortgagor during 1916 on the lands of said Harris in the county of Currituck, in which the mortgage was registered.

The word "etc.," or "et cetera," means other crops. In Railroad v. Metcalfe, 4 Metc. (Ky.) 199, 81 Am. Dec. 541, it was held that a resolution of the board of directors of a railroad company authorizing a mortgage of the road and its property, "etc.," embraced its franchises, rights, and privileges. Besides, in this case the clause at the end, "being one-half of the crop grown on said lands," clearly indicated an intention that the mortgage should embrace one-half of the crops of every description.

[2-4] The point was further taken in this court, though not raised by exception on the trial, that the complaint was insufficient, in that it did not recite that the mortgage was registered before the cotton was bought by the mill company. If the complaint on this ground did not state a cause of action, the exception could be taken for the first time in this court, of course; but the allegation that the mortgage was "duly registered" would indicate that it was registered in due time. Indeed, a failure to allege that it was registered at all would not be fatal.

1. VENUE $\S$ 8 — STATUTORY PROVISIONS — COMMON LAW.

The venue of civil actions is a matter for legislative regulation, and is not governed by the rules of common law.

2. VENUE $\S$ 17—JURISDICTIONAL DEFECT.

Venue of civil actions is a matter of procedure, and in absence of statutory provision is not jurisdictional.

3. ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL $\S$ 77—PLACE OF TRIAL.

Revisal 1905, §§ 415, 417, relating to continuation of suit, upon death of a party, by or against the personal representative or successor in interest, contemplate the trial of the action where instituted, notwithstanding section 421.

4. STATUTES $\S$ 231 — CONSTRUCTION — REVISAL—SEPARATE SECTIONS.

One section of the revisal must be construed in connection with the other sections thereof, and apparent inconsistencies reconciled; the whole, and not a part, representing the legislative will.

5. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS $\S$ 436 — VENUE — CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE — "INSTITUTE."

Revisal 1905, § 421, requiring actions against executors and administrators to be "instituted" in the county where the bond was given, refers to original actions against the personal representative, and does not entitle the representative made a party under sections 415 and 417, upon defendant's death, to remove the suit to the county where the estate is administered; the word "institute," when applied to legal proceedings, signifying the commencement of the proceedings—citing Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Institute.

6. STATUTES $\S$ 225 — CONSTRUCTION — CHANGE IN PHRASEOLOGY.

A change in phraseology, when dealing with a subject, raises a presumption of a change of meaning.

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; Devin, Judge.

Action by A. C. Latham and others against Samuel W. Latham, to which Carrie W. Hancock, as executrix of the estate of Samuel W. Latham, and individually, was made a party. From an order denying a motion to remove the suit to another county, Carrie W. Hancock appeals. Affirmed.

This was a civil action instituted in the superior court of Beaufort county, in October, 1916, to recover for alleged conversion by Samuel W. Latham of the proceeds of the sale of certain lands. The action was commenced in the right county. Complaint was filed December 27, 1917. No answer was filed.

Shortly thereafter, on the ——— day of ———, 1918, Samuel W. Latham died, leaving a last will and testament, naming Carrie W. Hancock executrix without bond. The will was probated in Craven county, and Carrie W. Hancock qualified as executrix.

At October term, 1918, an order was made directing that said Carrie W. Hancock, as executrix and individually, be made a party defendant to the suit. Pursuant thereto, summons was issued, returnable to November term, 1918. At November term, 1918, Carrie W. Hancock, executrix, appeared and filed her motion to remove the suit to Craven county, as a matter of law, under the provisions of Revisal, § 421. The motion was denied, and the executrix appealed.

E. A. Daniel, Jr., and Small, MacLean, Bragaw & Rodman, all of Washington, N. C., for appellant.

Guion & Guion and Moore & Dunn, all of Newbern, for appellees.

ALLEN, J. [1,2] The venue of civil actions is a matter for legislative regulation, and is not governed by the rules of the common law. Cooperage Co. v. L. Co., 151 N. C. 456, 66 S. E. 434. It deals with procedure and is not jurisdictional, in the absence of statutory provision to that effect. McCullen v. Railroad, 146 N. C. 568, 60 S. E. 506.

When we turn to the statutes, we find in Revisal, § 415, that in case of death of a defendant the court "may allow the action to be continued by or against his representative or successor in interest," and section 417 requires the summons to the personal representative to be returnable before the clerk, and not in term, "commanding him to appear before him on a day to be named in said summons, which shall be at least twenty days after the service thereof, and answer the complaint, and the issue joined by the filing of the said answer shall stand for trial at the term of the superior court next following."

[3] These sections clearly recognize the continuity of the action and the right to have it tried where instituted, and to avoid delay the personal representative must appear before the clerk and answer so that the issues may be tried at the next term, thus showing that no right of removal was contemplated, because of the requirement to answer and be ready for trial before the term, at which he would have to make his motion to remove. The executrix says, however, that the question is controlled by Revisal, § 421, which is as follows:

"All actions upon official bonds or against executors and administrators in their official capacity shall be instituted in the county where the bonds shall have been given, if the principal or any of the sureties on the bond is in the county; if not, then in the plaintiff's county."

[4, 5] This section must be construed in connection with the other sections of the Revisal, the whole, and not a part, representing the legislative will (36 Cyc. 1167), and apparent inconsistencies must be reconciled, and when so considered it must be held that the latter section refers to original actions instituted against the personal representative, as its language, standing by itself, indicates. It says that actions against executors and administrators "shall be instituted in the county," etc., not tried, and "institute, when applied to legal proceedings, signifies the commencement of the proceedings; when we talk of instituting an action, we understand bringing an action." 4 Words and Phrases, 3661.

A similar question was considered in Trust Co. v. Kauffman, 108 Cal. 222, 41 Pac. 469, in which a local action was brought in the proper county, but before trial the subject-matter was transferred by legislative act to another county, and a motion to remove to the latter county was made. The motion was denied, and the court, in its opinion, uses language very pertinent in the construction of the statute now before us. It says:

"The Constitution (article 6, § 5) declares that 'all actions for the enforcement of liens shall be commenced in the county in which the real estate, or some portion thereof, is situated; and at the time this action was 'commenced' the property was situate within the boundaries of San Diego. The Constitution does not, however, require that the action shall be 'tried' in the county in which the property is situated."

The same principle was applied in Blake v. Freeman, 13 Me. 134, in University v. Railroad, 49 Wis. 161, 5 N. W. 329, and in Hannon v. Power Co., 173 N. C. 522, 92 S. E. 354; the court saying in the latter case:

"The question of venue is governed by the locus 'at the commencement of the actions.'"

[6] It is also a rule of construction that a change in phraseology when dealing with a subject raises a presumption of a change of meaning, and it appears that the General Assembly, when providing for the commencement and trial of actions says, in section 419, "Actions for the following causes must be tried in the county," etc.; in section 420, "Actions for the following causes must be tried in the county," etc.; while in section 421, on which the executrix relies, nothing is said about the place of trial, and the language changes from "shall be tried" to "shall be instituted."

We are of opinion the motion to remove was properly denied.

Affirmed.

WALKER et al. v. WOODHOUSE et al.
(No. 27.)

1. TRUSTS ¶277—CREDIT TO TRUSTEE ON ADVANCES TO BENEFICIARY PROPER.

In an action to recover a sum, and interest, alleged to have been bequeathed to defendant in trust for plaintiff, in which defendant proved he had received the money, not under the will, but in testator's lifetime, under parol agreement, wherein the limitation as to expenditure of more than $100 on behalf of plaintiff referred only to plaintiff's education, the defendant trustee was entitled to a credit for the sum of $370.80, advanced at plaintiff's request for plaintiff's necessities.

2. TRUSTS ¶219(1) — INTEREST ON FUNDS NOT INVESTED NOT RECOVERABLE FROM TRUSTEE.

In an action by beneficiary against a trustee, where it was determined that the trust was not received by the trustee under a will, but under a prior parol agreement, whereby he was to keep money in a safe, separate and apart from other funds, and was not to pay interest thereon, plaintiff could not recover interest.

3. TRUSTS ¶371(8)—IN ACTION BY BENEFICIARY ANSWER OF TRUSTEE SUFFICIENT.

In a beneficiary's action to recover a trust alleged to be received by trustee under a will, trustee's answer containing a section setting up a parol trust, which was established by the trial, but which section did not allege plaintiff's execution of a deed to another as a condition of receiving the money, held sufficient, under the rule of liberal construction, to permit evidence thereon, where other parts of the answer set out such condition, and defendant offered to make payment of the balance upon the condition being performed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Currituck County; Devlin, Judge.

Action by Pearl Scott Walker and husband against D. W. Woodhouse and another. Judgment for plaintiffs for the sum of $1,000, subject to a credit of $370.80, and both named parties appeal. Plaintiff's appeal affirmed; defendant's appeal reversed.

This action was instituted by the plaintiff to recover the sum of $1,000 and interest alleged by her to have been bequeathed to D. W. Woodhouse to hold in trust for the plaintiff by and under the terms of the will of Hiram Gregory, deceased. The defendant answered, admitting that he had received $1,000, but denying that he had received such amount, or any part thereof, under the terms of said will, and averring that he had received same during the lifetime of Hiram Gregory under a parol agreement, whereby he was to hold same in trust for the plaintiff. The allegations of the defendant with respect to the trust, under the terms of which the jury found he held said money, are set out in sections 10, 15, and 16 of the answer as follows:

(10) "For further defense the defendants aver that shortly before the death of Hiram Gregory, grandfather of the feme plaintiff, the said Gregory left with the defendant Woodhouse the sum of $3,000, which, by agreement, was to be placed in the safe of the said Woodhouse, and to remain there until his grandchildren May, Elsie, and Pearl Scott, should become 21 years of age, at which time the said defendant was to pay over to said three grandchildren $1,000 each out of the money so left, without interest, with the right to expend as much as $100 on each child for education; and with this understanding and agreement the said D. W. Woodhouse accepted the $3,000, and has kept the same separate and apart for the said grandchildren in his safe, and has not used it or mingled it with his own funds, but has at all times kept it in his safe in accordance with the request and agreement made with Hiram Gregory and referred to in his will."

(15) "The defendant Woodhouse admits and has always admitted that he has in hand, of the $1,000 left with him for the feme plaintiff upon her execution of her interest in the deed after she became 21 years of age, the sum of $429.12, which he herewith tenders to the plaintiff, and has always been ready to pay the same over to her; that the money is now in his safe, and has been in his safe and ready to be paid over to her whenever she executed the deed as set out in the will. He also owes her $81.40, with interest thereon from April 15, 1910, being the amount which he received from S. M. Beasley, executor of Hiram Gregory, the grandfather of feme plaintiff; that he has always been ready to settle this with her when she became of age, and does hereby tender it to her, with interest."

(16) "The defendant consents that upon execution of the deed by plaintiffs as stipulated in the will the plaintiffs may have judgment against him for the above amounts so tendered and the cost up to the filing of this answer and the final judgment, and that a decree may be so entered."

The defendant trustee further contended that of the $1,000 so received he had advanced the plaintiff during her minority, at her request, the sum of $570.80 for necessities, which she promised to pay out of said sum, of which $200 had been advanced for the purpose of meeting her expenses incidental upon her marriage. Plaintiff was married at the age of 16. The plaintiff admitted that the defendant had expended $570.80 for her benefit and at her request, but contested her liability to be charged therewith unless the defendant consented to pay interest, which he refused to do because by the terms of the trust he was to pay no interest and was to keep the money in his safe for the plaintiff, which he did. Upon the third issue, to wit, "What amount has defendant paid out for necessities for plaintiff prior to her coming of age?" Plaintiff in apt time requested the court to charge the jury as follows:

"The court instructs you that, upon all the evidence in this case, if you find the facts to be as testified, your answer to the third answer should be $100; that in no view of the case you answer said issue in a larger amount."

Refused, and plaintiff excepted.

The defendant offered evidence tending to prove that it was one of the conditions of the trust that the plaintiff should execute a deed to Hiram, the grandson of Hiram Gregory, conveying to him her interest in what is known as the Hobbs tract of land before receiving any part of the money, and tendered an issue to be submitted to the jury involving this question. His honor excluded the evidence and refused to submit the issue, upon the ground that the answer did not allege that this was a part of the trust, and the defendant excepted to each of these rulings.

The jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Did the defendant receive the sum of $1,000 under the will of Hiram Gregory, to hold in trust for the plaintiff, Pearl Scott Walker, as alleged in the complaint?

"A. No.

"(2) Did the defendant Woodhouse receive the sum of $1,000 from Hiram Gregory during his lifetime to hold in trust for the plaintiff, Pearl Scott Walker, as alleged in the answer?

"A. Yes.

"(3) What amount has defendant paid out for necessities for plaintiff prior to her coming of age?

"A. $370.80."

Judgment was entered thereon in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $1,000, subject to a credit of $370.80, and the plaintiff appealed, upon the ground that the defendant could not be credited with more than $100. The defendant also appealed, alleging as error the refusal to admit evidence and to submit the issue as to the execution of the deed by the plaintiff conveying her interest in the Hobbs tract.

Meekins & McMullan and Thompson & Wilson, all of Elizabeth City, for plaintiff. Aydlott, Simpson & Sawyer and Ehringhaus & Small, all of Elizabeth City, for defendant.

ALLEN, J. [1] There is no error on the plaintiff's appeal, as the limitation on the amount to be expended by the trustee in behalf of the plaintiff refers only to the education of the plaintiff, and as the jury has found, and she practically admits, that the sum of $370.80 was advanced by the defendant at her request and for necessities, it was proper to charge her with this amount.

[2] The defendant is not chargeable with interest, because the jury has found that he received the sum of $1,000 to hold in trust as alleged in the answer, and the answer alleges that the trust was accepted with the understanding that he was not to be charged with interest, and was to keep the money in a safe, separate and apart from other funds, which he did.

[3] The question presented by the defendant's appeal depends upon a construction of the answer, as it is clear that he was entitled to offer evidence as to all of the terms of the trust and to have an issue submitted thereon if the pleadings raised the issue. His honor was of opinion that the terms of the trust were alleged in section 10 of the answer, and as the plaintiff failed therein to allege that the plaintiff was required to execute the deed before receiving any part of the money left with him, the evidence was not competent, because there was no allegation, and that no such issue was raised by the pleadings, but under the Code system, which prevails in this state, the answer must be considered as a whole; it must be "liberally construed," and if it can be seen from its general scope that a defense is alleged, the fact that it has not been stated with technical accuracy or precision will not deprive him of the defense. If in any portion of the pleading it presents facts sufficient to constitute a defense, or if facts sufficient for that purpose can be gathered from it, the pleading will stand, as every reasonable intentment and presumption must be made in favor of the pleader (Brewer v. Wynne, 154 N. C. 472, 70 S. E. 947); and, applying this principle, we are of opinion that the defendant sufficiently alleges that the plaintiff was required to execute the deed as a condition to receiving the money.

In section 15 of the answer the defendant admits that he has the money in hand, "left with him for the feme plaintiff upon her execution of her interest in the deed after she became 21 years of age," and he tenders the balance due, which he says he is ready to pay "whenever she executed the deed"; and in section 16 the defendant consents for judgment to be entered against him for the balance due "upon the execution of the deed to the plaintiff." It would have been better and more orderly for the defendant to have set out all of the terms of the trust in section 10 of the answer; but upon an inspection of the whole pleading it is a reasonable and fair construction that section 10 was directed particularly to those parts of the trust by which the amount to be recovered would be ascertained, and sections 15 and 16 to the condition upon which she would be entitled to the money.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment upon the plaintiff's appeal be affirmed, and that upon the defendant's appeal it be reversed, with directions to submit an additional issue as tendered by the defendant. The issues as found by the jury will not be disturbed.

Plaintiff's appeal affirmed.

Defendant's appeal reversed.

Under Revisal 1905, § 3234, when a crime has been committed on a boundary water course which lies wholly in one of the counties, either county has jurisdiction of the offense.

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW —68(4)—POLITICAL QUESTIONS — COUNTIES — BOUNDARIES —TAXATION.

The establishment of boundary between two counties being a political question, the Legislature, even after taxes are assessed, can decide where the boundary is, even though erroneously in fact, and direct to which county the tax from the disputed territory shall be paid.

4. BRIDGES —10(2) — CONSTRUCTION — BOND ISSUE — PERMISSIVE PROVISION OF STATUTE.

Pub. Loc. Laws 1919, c. 53, authorizing construction of bridge between Martin and Bertie counties and bond issues therefor, and specifying amount which bond issue of each county shall not exceed, is merely permissive as to the amount of bonds each county can issue, and not mandatory.

5. BRIDGES ⇐7 — CONSTRUCTION — COST.

The Legislature has the power to have bridge between two counties constructed entirely at the cost of the whole state, though no part of the bridge and its approaches will be upon the soil of the other counties contributing to its erection, the construction and maintenance of bridge being a matter of public concern of benefit to people of the entire state.

6. BRIDGES ⇐10(2) — CONSTRUCTION — BRIDGE BETWEEN COUNTIES — APPORTIONMENT OF COST — CONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTE.

Pub. Loc. Laws 1919, c. 53, authorizing construction of bridge between Martin and Bertie counties, and apportioning Martin county's contribution to cost of construction at not more than $150,000, and Bertie county's contribution at not more than $50,000, held constitutional, though the river is in Bertie county and the improvement embraces construction of approach to bridge in Bertie county, the greatest proportion of benefit accruing to Martin county.

7. COUNTIES ⇐178 — BRIDGES — CONSTRUCTION—BOND ISSUE—VOTE OF PEOPLE.

Under Pub. Loc. Laws 1919, c. 53, authorizing construction of bridge between Martin and Bertie counties, and bond issues to defray cost thereof, the counties can issue the bonds without a vote of the people, the construction of bridge being a necessary expense.

8. BRIDGES ⇐10(2) — CONSTRUCTION — BRIDGE BETWEEN COUNTIES—APPORTIONMENT OF COST.

In view of Revisal 1905, § 1318, subsec. 29, and section 2696 as amended by Laws 1917, c. 103, as amended by Laws 1919, c. 185, Legislature could have authorized construction of bridge between Martin and Bertie counties at Martin county's expense, though the river is in Bertie county, and the improvement embraced construction of approach in Bertie county, the principal benefit of the bridge accruing to Martin county.

9. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ⇐70(1) — JUDICIAL ENCROACHMENT ON LEGISLATURE — SPECIAL IMPROVEMENTS — PROPERTY BENEFITED.

It is for the Legislature, and not the courts, to determine what property will be benefited by road and bridge improvements, and court will not interfere with legislative determination, unless its action is palpably arbitrary and a plain abuse.

10. HIGHWAYS ⇐121 — CONSTRUCTION — COST.

The construction and maintenance of roads and bridges is a matter of general public concern, of benefit to people of the entire state, and Legislature may cast expense thereof upon state at large, or on territory specially and immediately benefited, even though the work may not be a part of the total area attached.

11. STATUTES ⇐97(2) — SPECIAL LAWS — HIGHWAYS AND BRIDGES.

Const. Amend. art. 2, § 29 (see Pub. Laws 1915, c. 99), prohibiting enactment of local, private, or special act authorizing the laying out or construction of streets, highways, bridges, or alleys, does not prohibit legislation authorizing the raising of proper funds by a sale of bonds, or by taxation, required for the public good, though such bonds should be for improvements in some fixed place, or in restricted territory determined upon by local authorities, in pursuance of general laws on the subject.

12. STATUTES ⇐97(1) — SPECIAL LAWS — CONSTRUCTION OF BRIDGES.

Pub. Loc. Laws 1919, c. 53, authorizing bond issue for construction of bridge between Martin and Bertie counties, is not in violation of Const. Amend. art. 2, § 29 (see Pub. Laws 1915, c. 99), prohibiting local, private, or special legislation relating to construction of bridges.

13. COUNTIES ⇐190(2) — TAXES — EXCEEDING CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATION.

Revisal 1905, § 2696, as amended by Laws 1917, c. 103, as amended by Laws 1919, c. 185, and Laws 1919, c. 312, held to authorize the levy of a tax beyond the constitutional limitation for bridge construction purposes within Const. art. 5, § 6, requiring the special approval of the Legislature to exceed the limitation of taxation for even necessary purposes.

14. BRIDGES ⇐7 — CONSTRUCTION — STATUTES—BOND ISSUE.

Pub. Loc. Laws 1919, c. 53, authorizing construction of bridge and bond issue to defray expense thereof, does not, by reason of provision limiting amount of bond issue to "actual cost" of the bridge, prohibit issuance of bonds before completion of work.

Appeal from Superior Court, Martin County; Connor, Judge.

Controversy submitted without action by Martin county and others against Wachovia Bank & Trust Company. From the judgment rendered, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This is a controversy submitted without action upon facts agreed, and involves the validity of $150,000 bonds proposed to be issued by the county of Martin under authority of Pub. Loc. Laws 1919, c. 53, entitled "An act to authorize the boards of commissioners of Martin and Bertie counties to build a bridge over the Roanoke river at Williamston, N. C., and for other purposes."

The defendant put in the highest bid for this issue, $160,869.50 and accrued interest to date of delivery, which bid was accepted by the county of Martin, but the defendant now declines to accept and pay for said bonds upon the ground that the bonds are not legal and binding obligations of said county. The court upheld the validity of the bonds, and adjudged that the county of Martin should execute and deliver the same to the defendant, and that the defendant should pay said bid and costs of action. Appeal by defendant.

Manly, Hendren & Womble, of Winston-Salem, for appellant.

Dunning & Moore, and H. W. Stubbs, all of Williamston, John W. Hinsdale, Jr., of Raleigh, and Reed, McCook & Hoyt and W. Henry Hoyt, all of New York City, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. This is a controversy submitted upon an agreed case without action, relating to a proposed issue of $150,000 of bonds of Martin county for the purpose of paying the county's share of the cost of building a bridge at Williamston over the Roanoke river, which divides Martin and Bertie counties, including the causeway or continuation of the bridge through the swamp on the Bertie side to the highlands.

It is provided that the entire work is to be constructed by the two counties jointly, at their joint expenses, with federal and state aid. The proposed road or approach on the Bertie side will run through swamps and other lowlands, and is necessary to the use of the bridge and practically a part of it. The bonds were awarded by Martin county to the appellant as the highest bidder on 30th June, 1919. The appellant is willing to comply with its bid, provided the county can lawfully issue these bonds and levy sufficient taxes to pay them. This proceeding was instituted in order to determine this question.

The defendant bank refuses to take and pay for said bonds upon the ground that they are not legal because—

"The act authorizing such bond issue violates the constitutional amendment, art. 2, § 29 (see Pub. Acts 1915, c. 99), which declares that the Legislature shall not pass any local, private, or special act relating to ferries or bridges; and for the further reason that the Legislature had no power under the Constitution to authorize Martin county to issue bonds to pay a part of the costs of building the road in Bertie county under the exclusive control of Bertie."

The court below adjudged that the bonds are valid obligations of the county; that the county is authorized to levy a sufficient tax to pay the principal and interest of the bonds without regard to the tax limit prescribed by the state Constitution; and that the proceeds of the sale of the bonds may be used by Martin county—

"In constructing the road approaching the bridge in the county of Bertie, whether said road be wholly in the county of Bertie, or partly in the county of Bertie and partly in the county of Martin."

The plaintiff relies upon three different statutes for authority to issue the bonds and to levy sufficient taxes to pay principal and interest thereof, i. e.:

(1) Chapter 53, Public Local Laws 1919, entitled "An act to authorize the board of commissioners of Martin and Bertie counties to build a bridge over the Roanoke river at Williamston and for other purposes."

(2) Chapter 103, Laws 1917, amending Rev. § 2696, as amended by chapter 185, Laws 1919, which is now sections 137-143, c. 69, Cons. Stat.

(3) Chapter 312, Laws 1919, entitled "An act to enable all counties to provide funds to pay the cost of constructing or improving roads with federal aid, and to pay the cost of maintaining such roads."

Under each of these three acts Martin county is authorized to issue bonds for road and bridge purposes and to levy sufficient taxes to pay such bonds.

The first act is applicable only to Martin and Bertie counties, and specifically authorizes them, "by joint action and agreement, to build and construct a bridge over the Roanoke river at Williamston, as the same has already been surveyed and laid out, and to build and construct the road leading from the bridge on the Bertie side to the highlands of Bertie county"; authorizes each county to issue bonds for this purpose, the total amount not to exceed "the actual cost of said bridge and road," the Martin county bonds not to exceed $150,000, and the Bertie county bonds not to exceed $50,000, and further authorizes each county to levy a "sufficient tax to pay the bonds issued by it."

The second act provides, in substance, that "any county in the state" may build a public road or a bridge in the county, and any two counties may jointly build a highway bridge over a stream which divides them, and may apportion the cost between themselves in such proportion as they may agree upon; but the cost must not exceed 2 per cent. of the assessed valuation of the taxable property in the two counties. County bonds may be issued for such roads or bridges in an amount not exceeding "the actual cost" thereof, and a "sufficient" county tax may be levied to pay the bonds.

The third act provides that any county may issue its bonds to pay its share of the cost of constructing or improving public roads in the county with federal or state aid, or both, and may levy a "sufficient" tax to pay such bonds; and that the term "road," as used in the act, includes bridges and culverts in all cases where they constitute a part of the road which is to be so constructed or improved. The act provides, however, that certain portions of it shall not be enforced in 31 counties named therein (which do not include Martin), unless it is adopted by the voters at an election.

Pursuant to the first act, which for convenience may be called the "special act," Martin and Bertie counties having previously taken appropriate action for building at their Joint expense the bridge and road prescribed in that act, Martin county now proposed to issue the $150,000 of bonds in question to pay its share of the cost. It appears upon the face of the special act that the road or approach referred to therein is to be almost wholly in Bertie.

It may be noted here that the bridge proper across the river is in Bertie, for the boundary of Martin county is the low-water mark on the south side of the river. This appears from chapter 4, Laws 1729; 25 St. Records, 212; 2 Rev. Stat. 164; which boundary is recognized by the subsequent acts creating Edgecombe county out of Tyrrell (Laws 1741, c. 7; 23 St. Records, 164; 2 Rev. Stat. 124); the act creating Halifax county out of the territory of Edgecombe (Laws 1758, c. 13; 23 St. Records, 496; 2 Rev. Stat. 133); and, finally, the act creating Martin county out of Halifax and Tyrrell (Laws 1774, c. 32; 25 St. Records, 976; 2 Rev. Stat. 145). Indeed, it has been the usual procedure in establishing new counties that, where a river or other stream is the dividing line, said river has remained within the limits of the county from which the new county has been taken.

[1] But counties are merely instrumentalities and agencies of the state government.

[2, 3] It has been enacted that, when a crime has been committed on a boundary water course which lies wholly in another county, either county has jurisdiction of the offense (Rev. § 3234); and that a grand jury may be authorized to indict for offenses committed in another county (State v. Lewis, 142 N. C. 626, 55 S. E. 600, 9 Ann. Cas. 361); and that, as to civil matters, not only the Legislature can change the boundaries at will with or without provision that the annexing county shall pay a part of the debt of the county from which the territory was taken (Mills v. Williams, 33 N. C. 556; Com'rs v. Com'rs, 95 N. C. 189; Com'rs v. Com'rs, 79 N. C. 565; Watson v. Com'rs, 82 N. C. 17), but the establishment of the boundary being a political question, the Legislature, even after taxes are assessed, can decide where the boundary is (even though erroneously in fact), and direct to which county the tax from the disputed territory shall be paid. R. R. v. Washington, 154 N. C. 333, 70 S. E. 634.

The act of the Legislature here has authorized Martin county to issue $150,000 bonds as its just contribution to the entire cost of the bridge and its approaches from its beginning in Martin to the highlands in Bertie. The Legislature was doubtless moved to so enact by the representatives of that county in the General Assembly. As the bridge itself and the long approach through the swamp are in Bertie county, almost the entire expense, but for the apportionment authorized in the act by agreement of the commissioners, would have fallen upon Bertie, though doubtless the greatest proportion of the benefit would have accrued to the county of Martin. The bridge, therefore, would not have been constructed but for the apportionment in the act which has been approved by the county commissioners of the two counties, and which was doubtless made in consequence of their agreement before the act was passed.

[4] The act, however, is merely permissive as to the amount of bonds each county can issue, and not mandatory.

[5] It was entirely within the power of the Legislature to have built the bridge entirely at the cost of the whole state, as in the numerous cases of state bonds issued to build railroads, though no part of the bridge and its approaches would have been upon the soil of the other 98 counties contributing to its erection.

[6] The act of the Legislature authorizing the two counties in the vicinity, and apportioning the contribution of Martin county at not more than $150,000, and of Bertie at not more than $50,000, was not forbidden by any provision of the state Constitution.

[7] Being a necessary expense, these counties, under the authority of the Legislature, can issue the bonds without a vote of the people. Herring v. Dixon, 122 N. C. 424, 29 S. E. 368, and cases cited thereto in the Anno. Ed.

Rev. § 1318, subsec. 29, provides:

"When a bridge is necessary over a stream which divides one county from another, the board of commissioners of each county shall join in constructing or repairing such bridge; and the charge thereof shall be defrayed by the counties concerned, in proportion to the number of taxable polls in each."

In Bridge Co. v. Com'rs, 151 N. C. 216, 65 S. E. 895, it was held that this provision would apply irrespective of whether the division line between counties ran up the middle of the stream, or whether the stream lay, as is not unusual (and as in this instance), entirely in one of the counties. In McPeeters v. Blankenship, 123 N. C. 651, 81 S. E. 876, where the boundary ran up the middle of the stream between Yancey and Mitchell counties, it was held that the commissioners of Yancey could not build the bridge without the joinder of the commissioners of the other county, but "should have applied to the Legislature for an act authorizing the county of Yancey to construct the bridge at its sole expense."

[8] It therefore appears that the Legislature might have authorized the county of Martin to build this bridge entirely at its own expense. Certainly, if the Legislature could direct, as it does under Rev. § 1318, subsec. 29, that the expense should be divided between the counties concerned "in proportion to the number of taxable polls of each," it has the power to provide for any other method of apportioning the expense. In this case, chapter 103, Laws 1917, amended by chapter 185, Laws 1919, has provided that "any two counties may jointly build a highway bridge over a stream which divides them, and may apportion the cost between them in such proportion as they may agree upon." Chapter 53, Public Local Laws 1919, apportioning $150,000 to Martin, was evidently proposed in consequence of such agreement.

It has never been questioned that the construction of a bridge over a stream dividing two counties is a necessary and public purpose for which each county may constitutionally raise money. Bridge Co. v. Com'rs, 151 N. C. 215, 65 S. E. 895; Mills v. Com'rs, 175 N. C. 215, 95 S. E. 481. There is ample authority also in other jurisdictions that "it is not necessary that any part of a highway or bridge be within the territorial limits of the political subdivision on which the burden of its construction is imposed by the Legislature provided such political subdivision is benefited thereby." State v. Williams, 68 Conn. 131, 35 Atl. 24, 421, 48 L. R. A. 465, affirmed Williams v. Eggleston, 170 U. S. 304, 18 Sup. Ct. 617, 42 L. Ed. 1047; 13 Ruling Case Law, title "Highways," § 13; 4 Ruling Case Law, title "Bridges," § 10.

[9] And it is for the Legislature, and not for the courts, to determine what property is benefited under such circumstances, unless the legislative action is palpably arbitrary and a plain abuse. Houck v. Drainage District, 239 U. S. 254, 36 Sup. Ct. 58, 60 L. Ed. 266; Byram v. Marion County, 145 Ind. 240, 44 N. E. 357, 33 L. R. A. 476. To the same purport Taylor v. Com'rs, 55 N. C. 141, 64 Am. Dec. 566; Holton v. Mecklenburg, 93 N. C. 430; Wood v. Oxford, 97 N. C. 227, 2 S. E. 653; Elizabeth City v. Com'rs, 146 N. C. 539, 60 S. E. 416; State v. Williams, supra; Mobile v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 26 L. Ed. 238; Kelly v. Pittsburgh, 104 U. S. 78, 26 L. Ed. 658; Thomas v. Gay, 169 U. S. 265, 18 Sup. Ct. 340, 42 L. Ed. 740; Transit Co. v. Kentucky, 199 U. S. 202-204, 26 Sup. Ct. 36, 50 L. Ed. 150, 4 Ann. Cas. 493; State v. Marion County, 170 Ind. 595, 85 N. E. 513; Duval County v. Jacksonville, 36 Fla. 196, 18 South. 339, 29 L. R. A. 416; State v. Atkin, 64 Kan. 174, 67 Pac. 519, 97 Am. St. Rep. 343, affirmed Atkin v. Kansas, 191 U. S. 207, 24 Sup. Ct. 124, 48 L. Ed. 148; State v. Edmondson, 89 Ohio St. 93, 105 N. E. 269, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 305, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 934; Thurston v. Caldwell, 40 Okl. 206, 137 Pac. 683.

[10] The rule to be deduced from these authorities may be thus summed up: The construction and maintenance of roads and bridges is a matter of general public concern. The whole body of the people of this state is benefited by them. The Legislature may cast the expense of such public works upon the state at large, or upon territory specially and immediately benefited, even though the work may not be within a part of the total area attached.

The decisions in Com'rs v. State Treasurer, 174 N. C. 141, 93 S. E. 482, 2 A. L. R. 726, and Com'rs v. Boring, 175 N. C. 105, 95 S. E. 43, may be distinguished from this case in that Martin county is not issuing bonds in behalf of any other political subdivision, and the road and bridge in question is an essential part or adjunct of the bridge which begins in Martin county. The proportionate part of the costs, i. e., three-fourths, is a fair estimate doubtless of the proportional part of the benefit which will accrue to that county from the construction of the bridge, including the causeway through the swamp on the Bertie side (which is an indispensable part of the bridge), having been enacted at the instance of the representatives of Martin county in the General Assembly, and approved by the commissioners of that county. The road on the Bertie side is an "approach" to the bridge, and, indeed, is essentially a part of the bridge, for at places there are large arches as an outlet for the overflows of the river, which are not infrequent. These approaches are in law, as well as in fact, a part of the bridge. Brown County v. Keya Paha County, 88 Neb. 117, 129 N. W. 250, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 790; 4 Ruling Case Law, tit. "Bridges," § 2.

Besides, the apportionment in the act is merely premissive as to the amount of bonds each county may issue, and, being within the powers of the General Assembly, is not reviewable by us.

We have discussed this proposition first, for it seems to be the real defense set up in this case. As to the other exception, that the special act (Public Local Laws 1919, c. 53) is within the constitutional prohibition of local, private, or special legislation, and forbidden by Const. Amend. § 29, art. 2 (see Pub. Laws 1915, c. 99), that matter has been fully discussed and conclusively settled by Brown v. Road Commissioners, 173 N. C. 598, 92 S. E. 502, and Mills v. Commissioners, 175 N. C. 215, 95 S. E. 481. That amendment provides:

"The General Assembly shall not pass any local, private or special act or resolution: * * * Authorizing the laying out, opening, altering, maintaining or discontinuing highways, streets or alleys; relating to ferries or bridges. * * * Any local, private or special act or resolution passed in violation of the provisions of this section shall be void."

Chapter 53, Public Local Laws 1919, provides that the board of commissioners of Martin and Bertie are authorized by joint action to build and construct a bridge over the Roanoke river at Williamston, as the same has already been surveyed and laid out, and to build and construct a road leading from the bridge on the Bertie side to the highlands of Bertie county, and that to raise funds for that purpose the commissioners of Martin are authorized to issue bonds not to exceed $150,000, and the commissioners of Bertie not to exceed $50,000, with provisions as to issuing the bonds and levying taxes to pay the interest, and to provide a sinking fund for the payment of bonds at maturity. The only necessary part of this act is the legislation authorizing a special tax. Even if the primary purpose of the act was not to authorize the bonds and tax, and if the provision authorizing the building of the bridge was unconstitutional, the latter is mere surplusage, and the bond and tax provisions would be valid, and the work could be done under the implied power and under the general statutes above set out.

In Brown v. Road Commissioners, supra, chapter 456, Public Local Laws 1917, "authorized and directed" the board of commissioners of a county named in the act to issue bonds "for road purposes" in a certain township named therein, and provided for a sufficient annual tax in the township to pay the principal and interest of the bonds. The court held that this act was primarily a statute to provide for raising revenue for road purposes, and therefore was not within the constitutional prohibition. Brown, J., said:

"An analysis of the act shows that its primary purpose is to authorize the sale of bonds for road purposes in North Cove township, and to require the levying of a tax to pay the interest and principal of the bonds. * * * It only provides the means for constructing and repairing them. * * * Speaking of such legislation as affected by a constitutional provision, * * * the Pennsylvania court in Re Sugar Notch Borough, 192 Pa. St. 349, 43 Atl. 985, says: 'The restrictions of the Constitution upon legislation apply to direct legislation, not to the incidental operation of statutes, constitutional in themselves, upon other subjects than with those with which they directly deal.' So in this case, the bond issue being the direct legislation, the fact that it provides that the proceeds of the bonds are to be used for road purposes will not bring it within the prohibition of the constitutional amendment."

In support of this proposition the court referred (173 N. C. 600, 92 S. E. 502) to the absolute necessity of special legislation authorizing county and township bond issues and taxes for roads. The object of the amendment was not to inhibit the Legislature from granting such permission in cases where, under our Constitution, legislative permission is necessary, but it was intended to prevent taking up the time of the General Assembly, and filling up the volumes of statutes in authorizing the laying out of highways and other local matters, which the county commissioners were fully authorized and empowered to act upon without legislative permission.

In Mills v. Commissioners, supra, chapter

575, Public Local Laws 1917, was held not to be in conflict with above-cited amendment to the Constitution (section 29, art. 2). The act there considered authorized the people of the county named in the act to issue bonds "for the purpose of building bridges across the Catawba river" jointly with another county named, and to levy a special tax to pay the bonds. Hoke, J., placed the decision upon the ground above stated in Brown v. Com'rs. He said:

"It is well understood that our General Assembly, at session after session, was called on by direct legislation to authorize a particular highway or street, or to establish a bridge or ferry at some specified place. * * * The Legislature in these cases was in fact called on to usurp, or rather to exercise, functions which were more usually and properly performed by the local authorities, and it was in reference to local and special and private measures of this character that these amendments were adopted; and as stated in Brown's Case, supra, it was never intended to prohibit legislation authorizing the raising of proper funds by the sale of bonds or by taxation for measures required for the public good, though such funds should be for improvements in some fixed place or in restricted territory determined upon by local authorities in pursuance of general laws on the subject."

[11] This is a clear conception and statement of the purpose and the applicability of section 29, art. 2, of the Constitution. We could not add to it or make any change therein without making it less clear. It cannot be improved upon. The Brown and Mills Cases were, we think, rightly decided, and are reaffirmed. They have been cited with approval in Parvin v. Com'rs, 177 N. C. 510, 99 S. E. 432.

The same view is taken in Morrill v. Supervisors, 112 N. Y. 585, 20 N. E. 549, and Bridge Co. v. Attica, 119 N. Y. 204, 23 N. E. 542. In Robertson v. Board of Supervisors, 112 Miss. 54, 72 South. 852, the court held that an act providing for the issuance of bonds to pay for the improvement of public roads did not violate a section of the Constitution of that state almost identical with section 29, art. 2, of our Constitution, for the reason that it did "not provide for the 'laying out, opening, altering, and working roads and highways,' but for the raising of revenue with which to pay for the working of roads and highways, the method by which they have been or are to be laid out, opened, altered, and worked being governed by the general laws relating thereto." The same principle was enunciated in Re Sugar Notch Borough, 192 Pa. 349, 43 Atl. 985, already quoted in the citation from the opinion in Brown v. Commissioners, supra.

More than 150 statutes, more or less of similar purport, relating to the roads or bridges in certain counties, townships, or road districts therein named, were passed at the last session in reliance upon the Brown and Mills Cases. Under the authority of these statutes many hundreds of thousands of bonds have been issued, or are about to be issued, and contracts have been let, or are about to be let, for the construction of roads and bridges in all parts of the state. It is of the highest importance, therefore, that the authority of those cases shall be sustained.

The primary purpose of the special Martin county act above was to authorize the bonds, and the levy of a tax to pay the principal and interest thereof. Under their power to undertake public improvements involving a necessary expense, Martin and Bertie could have built the bridge and approaches and road thereto without any act of the Legislature, and could have issued bonds for that purpose, and by agreement apportioned the total cost between them. The only really necessary legislation was to authorize a special tax to pay the bonds. Com'rs v. MacDonald, 148 N. C. 125, 61 S. E. 643.

Lastly, it is contended in the defendant's brief that in R. R. v. Cherokee, 177 N. C. 65, 97 S. E. 758, the court held that a general act giving every county, or certain named counties, optional authority to levy special taxes, was unconstitutional, and a "special act" was necessary, and that a contrary decision was made in Parvin v. Com'rs, 177 N. C. 508, 99 S. E. 432. The court in the Cherokee Case divided, the dissenting opinion expressing the view that the legislative authority to levy a special tax under Constitution, art. 5, § 6, did not require a "special act" for that purpose, but only the "special approval," which could be given as well by a general act empowering any or all counties to do so. Parvin v. Com'rs did not, as the defendant contends in his brief, overrule the Cherokee Case, but distinguished it by pointing out that it was based on a statute enacted in 1913, prior to the constitutional amendment. In the Parvin Case the court held that a general statute passed since the amendment, i. e., chapter 284, Laws 1917, providing that the "county commissioners of any county, for the purpose of laying out and opening * * * the public roads and bridges of said county," may order an election to take the sense of the qualified voters of the county upon the question of issuing bonds for that purpose, was sufficient. This is the latest utterance of the court.

The Constitution, art. 5, § 6, requires the "special approval" of the Legislature to exceed the limitation of taxation for even necessary purposes. If the Cherokee Case were construed to prohibit this approval being given by a general act, and Const. art. 2, § 29, prohibits a special act, this will prevent such approval being given in any case.

[12, 13] We think, therefore, that the special act (chapter 53, Public Local Laws 1919, relied upon as authority for the bonds does not conflict with the constitutional amendment (article 2, § 29), which prohibits local, private, or special legislation in certain cases. We are also of opinion that the two general acts (chapter 103, Laws 1917, as amended by chapter 185, Laws 1919, and chapter 312, Laws 1919), referred to in the beginning of this opinion, also satisfy the constitutional requirement of "special approval of the General Assembly" authorizing the levy of a tax beyond the constitutional limitation.

[14] The provision limiting the amount of the bond issue to the "actual cost" of the bridge or road is not a prohibition against issuing bonds before the work is done. The amount of bond issue may be based upon the estimate of the cost made either before or after the work is done. Any other construction of the statutes might make it impossible for the county to proceed with the work, for contractors usually insist that the financial arrangements be made before the work is begun. Should it happen that the work can be let at a less total cost than the amount received from the bond issue, the surplus can be invested in the sinking fund required to pay off the bonds at maturity.

The Roanoke river, as is well known, is the only one in the entire Union of its length between the falls and its mouth, and of no greater width, that is not spanned by any bridge at all. In this state there are numerous public bridges across the French Broad, the Catawba, the Yadkin, the Cape Fear, the Neuse, and the Tar rivers where they are wider than the Roanoke. Particularly is this so as to the bridges across the Neuse at New Bern and the Pamlico at Washington, and the railroad bridge across Albemarle Sound is 5½ miles long. It is patent that the construction of this bridge, and indeed of bridges at divers other points, over the Roanoke, is a public necessity, not only for the people of the fertile country on each side of that stream, but will be to the great benefit of the entire state.

After the fullest consideration of all the arguments adduced, the judgment below is affirmed.

(178 N. C. 39)

GUIRE v. BOARD OF COM'RS FOR CALDWELL COUNTY. (No. 473.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 10, 1919.)

1. STATUTES  $\Leftrightarrow$  143, 168—AMENDING STATUTE—EFFECT OF INVALIDITY.

Act of March 10, 1919, amending Pub. Loc. Laws 1917, c. 67, being wholly void, could not have the effect of repealing or amending the latter act, which remained in full force.

2. COUNTIES  $\Leftrightarrow$  178—BONDS—ELECTION—VALIDITY—INTEREST RATE.

Although Pub. Loc. Laws 1917, c. 67, under which a bond election was held, limits interest to 5 per cent., the people having voted an issue thereunder at a rate not exceeding 6 per cent. was equivalent to a vote for bonds at any less rate, and an approval of an issue of 5 per cent. bonds and the submission of the question at a rate not exceeding 6 per cent., while irregular, did not invalidate the election.

3. COUNTIES  $\Leftrightarrow$  183(2)—SERIES OF BONDS—STATUTE.

The provision of Pub. Loc. Laws 1917, c. 67, § 1, for three series of bonds payable at different dates is merely permissive or discretionary with the board of county commissioners, and an issue is not invalid because they failed to provide for three series.

4. COUNTIES  $\Leftrightarrow$  52—ISSUE OF BONDS—MEETING OF BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS—ADJOURNED SESSION.

Where a meeting of the board of county commissioners at which bids were to be received and accepted for an issue of bonds was properly advertised according to Pub. Laws 1917, cc. 147, 174, it was competent for the board to adjourn over to another day in the near future to complete such business, and those interested must take notice of the same.

Appeal from Superior Court, Caldwell County; Harding, Judge.

Action by V. D. Guire against the Board of Commissioners for Caldwell County. From a judgment holding the county bonds proposed to be sold valid, and enjoining the issue of bonds bearing more than 5 per cent. interest, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This case was before this court at the last term, and our decision therein is reported in 177 N. C. at page 516, 99 S. E. 430, where the facts are stated, so far as pertinent to that appeal. We there held that the act of 1919, increasing the rate of interest, as fixed by the Public Local Laws of 1917, c. 67, from 5 per cent. to a rate not exceeding 6 per cent., was invalid, not having been passed in accordance with Const. art. 2, § 14. Since that case was decided, the board of commissioners of the county has properly advertised the meeting for the sale of the bonds, and the meeting was held accordingly, at which the commissioners received and accepted a bid for the bonds at a 5 per cent. interest rate. The plaintiff sought and obtained a restraining order, and at the hearing of the application for an injunction the court, by consent of the parties found the facts, and concluded therefrom that the bonds proposed to be sold to the successful bidder will be valid obligations of the county. The court held the bonds to be valid, and so adjudged, but enjoined any issue of bonds bearing more than 5 per cent. interest.

J. T. Pritchett, of Lenoir, for appellant.
Mark Squires, of Lenoir, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). We will now consider the case with reference to the objections of the plaintiff and their validity, as they are presented in the record, and in the findings and judgment of the court:

[1] First. The Public Local Laws of 1917, c. 67, provided for a second election, if at the first one there was an adverse vote by the people. There is no dispute as to the regularity of the election, except in one respect which will presently be noticed. There were two elections held. At the first of these, held in 1917, the result was against a bond issue, and at the second the vote was in favor of issuing the bonds at a rate of interest not exceeding 6 per cent. Both elections were held under chapter 67 of the Public Local Laws of 1917, as appears by the record, the second, though, was held after the passage of the amendatory act of 1919. That act amended the act of 1917 only in one respect, viz., by striking out "five per cent." and inserting in lieu thereof the words "not exceeding six per cent.," and for that reason the call for the election specified the rate, which was not to exceed 6 per cent., but the election was held and conducted under the act of 1917, the other act making no provision for an election, but simply changing the rate of interest. The latter act being wholly void, it could not have the effect of repealing or amending the act of 1917, which remained in full force, notwithstanding the same. There was no intention, expressed or implied, to repeal the old law, but the only purpose was to amend it, and this purpose failed altogether by reason of the invalidity of the later act. This principle is well settled by the authorities. 36 Cyc. 1098, and the numerous cases in the notes which sustain the text. Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. State of Texas, 177 U. S. 28, 20 Sup. Ct. 518, 44 L. Ed. 657; City of Lexington v. Bank, 165 Mo. 671, 65 S. W. 943; Wilkison v. Board, etc., of Marion Co., 158 Ind. 1, 62 N. E. 481; Barker v. Potter, 55 Neb. 25, 75 N. W. 57; Russell v. Ayer, 120

N. C. 180, 27 S. E. 133, 37 L. R. A. 246. Many other cases are cited in the defendant's brief to the same effect.

[2] The people having voted for the issue of bonds at a rate not exceeding 6 per cent., it was equivalent to a vote for bonds at any less rate, as the greater includes the less, and therefore they have approved an issue of bonds at 5 per cent. The submission of the question was irregular, it is true, but not sufficiently so to invalidate the result, when the court has perpetually enjoined any issue above the proper rate, as was done in this case. This is amply protective of the interests of the taxpayers. It was held in City of Quincy v. Warfield, 25 Ill. 317, 321, 79 Am. Dec. 330, that, where bonds were issued bearing interest at 12 per cent., whereas no more than 8 per cent. interest was allowed in the statute by which they were authorized, the bonds were good at the rate of 8 per cent., or pro tanto, and that all in excess of that rate must be rejected. The court said:

"It is said the bond is void, because it stipulates for a greater rate of interest than 8 per cent. per annum. In the case of Johnson v. Stark County, 24 Ill. 75, we recognized the doctrine that in exercising a power, all acts performed in excess of or beyond the power delegated must be rejected as unwarranted; but if, after the rejection of such acts, there has been enough done to show a proper execution of the power, the act will be sustained, irrespective of the acts performed beyond the power delegated. In other words, so much of the act done as is within the power granted shall be upheld, whilst all beyond the power shall be rejected as an excess of power. Upon this ruling in this case, we must decide, and do decide, that the bond is valid and binding on the city, with interest to be calculated at 8 per cent. per annum. It is not vitiated by the excess, but only pro tanto, and the court trying the case should have made the deduction, and given judgment for the bond, with interest at 8 per cent. per annum, the city having no power to stipulate for interest beyond that rate."

And likewise it was held in Parkinson v. City of Parker, 85 Pa. 313, that—

"The right of a borough to borrow money within the prescribed limits, and issue certificates therefor, bearing interest, is conferred by the borough law of the state, and the fact that the bond in this case called for 8 per cent. interest did not invalidate it, and it was only void for the excess over the legal rate of interest."

[3] Second. The proposed issue of bonds is not invalid upon the ground, alleged by the plaintiff, that the commissioners of the county have not provided for three series of bonds payable at three different dates. That arrangement, as authorized by the act of 1917, was merely permissive or discretionary with the board, and was manifestly intended to be so, as otherwise the provisions of the act would be conflicting. It empowers the commissioners, in the exercise of their discretion, to fix the maturity of the bonds, so that they will be payable at such time, or times, not exceeding 40 years from the date thereof, and at such place, or places, as the board may determine, and also conferred upon them the power to prescribe the form and tenor of the bonds. This general authority was broadly given, upon the theory that a restricted one might militate against an advantageous sale of the bonds. Public Local Laws of 1917, c. 67, § 1.

[4] Third. The meeting at which bids were to be received and accepted was properly advertised according to Public Laws of 1917, cc. 147, 174. The notice as to the first meeting was a strict compliance with those statutes, and as the board could not finish the transaction and consummate the sale at that meeting, it was competent for them to adjourn over to another day in the near future, as they did, and complete the business. This very question was decided in McChesney v. City of Chicago, 201 Ill. 344, 66 N. E. 217, where it was held that such an adjournment was clearly legal, as the interested parties must take notice of the same, when the first meeting has been properly advertised. But in our case the board did give special notice of the second meeting. The object of this provision of the law was to prevent secret or clandestine sales of municipal and other bonds of public corporations, and this purpose was fully accomplished in the present instance.

Fourth. This contention is substantially the same as the first one. The particular form of the objection here is that the call for the election and the notice of the same was confined to the issuing of bonds at a rate not exceeding 6 per cent., but the form of the objection is immaterial, as we are concerned more with its substance. It involves the same principle we applied to the first contention and upon which we decided it. If the people voted for bonds at a rate not exceeding 6 per cent., they were intelligent enough to know that it meant a 6 per cent. rate or any rate below it, which of course included a 5 per cent. rate. Suppose the act of 1919 had not been passed, then they could have voted only for a rate not exceeding 5 per cent. under the act of 1917, as it provides for such a rate, that is, a maximum rate of 5 per cent. If the result had been favorable to the issuing of the bonds, can it be doubted that the commissioners could have validly issued them at any rate below 5 per cent.? The object of fixing a maximum rate of interest was to enable the commissioners to get a lower rate than 5 per cent., if they could do so, and there was no other reason for it. One of the familiar maxims of the law is, "Utile per inutile non vitiatur," which means that surplusage does not vitiate that which, in other respects, is good and valid; and there is another, "Surplusagium non nocet," or that surplusage is innocuous and must be disregarded. Broom's Legal Maxims (6th Am. Ed.) p. 462, marg. p. 603. Where an award recited that the three arbitrators had concurred in it, whereas one had not, but had dissented, it was held (White v. Sharp, 12 M. & W. 712), applying the maxim, that the award was good, as the recital, so far as it stated the higher number of concurring arbitrators, was immaterial and useless, as the two were sufficient. So here the 5 per cent. was valid, and sufficient to sustain the election, and the recital of the 6 per cent. or 1 per cent. more, being surplusage and useless, does not vitiate that which is legal. The election was held under the act of 1917, by clear and specific reference to it in the call for it. There was no machinery provided in the act of 1919 for holding an election, and in this respect the former act was left intact. All of the objections of the plaintiff were properly overruled.

Affirmed.

STATE v. HALL. (No. 10254.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 25, 1919.)

CRIMINAL LAW §1042—APPEAL—RESERVATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW—INCONSISTENCY OF VERDICT WITH EVIDENCE.

Where defendant did not raise in the circuit court the question of error in sentencing on a verdict inconsistent with the evidence, in that defendant had been found guilty on a count charging him with procuring a name to be forged on a note, and on a count charging him with himself writing the name, such question is not properly before the Supreme Court for consideration on defendant's appeal.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Kershaw County; W. H. Townsend, Judge.

Oliver Hall was convicted of forgery, and he appeals. Appeal dismissed.

W. B. De Loach, of Camden, for appellant.

W. H. Cobb and A. F. Spigner, Sols., both of Columbia, for the State.

GARY, C. J. The defendant was convicted under an indictment charging him in one count, with making, causing, and procuring to be falsely made, forged, and counterfeited a certain note of the said Oliver Hall, in the sum of $450, payable to the Bank of Camden, S. C., by then and there writing and indorsing thereon the name of W. T. Hall, and in the second count, with uttering and passing said note, which he then and there knew to be a forgery.

The only exception upon which he appealed is as follows:

"For error in his honor, the presiding judge, in passing the sentence upon the defendant that he did; the verdict of the jury being inconsistent with the evidence, as the said jury found the defendant guilty on both counts in the indictment, one count charging the defendant with procuring the name of W. T. Hall to be written upon the said note, and the other count charging the said defendant with writing the name of W. T. Hall upon the said note."

The question presented by the exception was not raised in the circuit court, and therefore is not properly before this court for consideration.

Appeal dismissed.

STATE v. ROGERS. (No. 10265.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 25, 1919.)

1. BIGAMY §4—OBJECTIONS TO INDICTMENT NOT WELL TAKEN.

Indictment charging bigamy held sufficient as against objections that it did not show jurisdiction of court, that state was not named as a party, and that it did not run in name of state.

2. BIGAMY §9—ORIGINAL MARRIAGE LICENSES ADMISSIBLE IN EVIDENCE.

In prosecution for bigamy, the original marriage licenses issued to defendant by clerk of court, who was authorized by Civ. Code 1912, § 3745, to issue them, in form prescribed by section 3746, held admissible in evidence under section 3750, where proved by clerk of court, who had them in his possession under section 3747.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Oconee County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge.

Alex Rogers was convicted of bigamy, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Following is the indictment referred to in opinion:

"The State of South Carolina, County of Oconee.

"At a court of general sessions, begun and holden in and for the county of Oconee, in the state of South Carolina, at Walhalla Court-house, in the county and state aforesaid, on the first Monday of March in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and nineteen, the jurors of and for the county aforesaid, in the state aforesaid, upon their oath present:

"That Alex M. Rogers, late of the county and state aforesaid, on the 11th day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and thirteen, at Walhalla courthouse, in the county of Oconee, and state of South Carolina, did marry one Myrtle Lusk, and her, the said Myrtle Lusk then and there had for wife, and that the said Alex M. Rogers, afterwards, and while he was so married to the said Myrtle Lusk as aforesaid, to wit, on the 11th day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and eighteen, with force and arms, at Walhalla Courthouse, in the county of Oconee, and state of South Carolina, feloniously and unlawfully did marry and take to wife one Celia May Bolick, and to her the said Alex M. Rogers was then and there married, and her the said Alex M. Rogers then and there had for wife, the said Myrtle Lusk Rogers, his former wife, being then alive, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state.

"John K. Hood, Acting Solicitor."

J. R. Earle, of Walhalla, for appellant.

John K. Hood, Acting Sol., of Anderson, for the State.

HYDRICK, J. [1] Defendant appealed from sentence on conviction of bigamy. He complains of error in overruling his demurrer to the indictment on the ground: (1) That it did not show jurisdiction of the court; (2) that the state was not named therein as a party to the action; and (3) that it does not run in the name of the state. It appears from inspection of the indictment, which will be reported, that none of these objections are well taken. It is in the usual form, which has been approved by immemorial practice and the authorities. 1 Bish. Cr. Proc. §§ 409, 411.

[2] There was no error in admitting in evidence the original marriage licenses issued to defendant by the clerk of court. They were proved by the testimony of that officer, who was authorized by the statute (1 Civ. Code 1912, § 3745) to issue them, and who issued them in the form prescribed by the statute (Id. § 3746), upon the application of defendant, and who had possession of them by virtue of the provision of the statute (Id. § 3747). The statute (Id. § 3750) makes the original license, or a copy thereof, together with the certificate of marriage, indorsed thereon and properly filled out, and signed by the person who performed the marriage ceremony, and by both the contracting parties, sufficient evidence of the contract of marriage between the parties therein named, in any of the courts of this state.

Both licenses and the certificates indorsed thereon were in exact accord with the provisions of the statute, and were competent evidence. Besides, the fact that both marriages took place in Oconee county was proved by the testimony of the person who performed both ceremonies. Therefore the contention that there was no evidence of the several marriages is clearly untenable, as is also the contention that defendant was not confronted with the witnesses against him. Judgment affirmed.

1. MORTGAGES  $\Leftrightarrow$ 34 — PAROL AGREEMENT WITH DEBTOR TO RECONVEY ON PAYMENT VALID.

Where grantor, holding legal title to land as security for payment of a debt, conveys land for amount of debt, grantee's agreement with grantor's debtor to convey property to debtor on debtor's payment of debt need not be in writing.

MORTGAGE.

Evidence held to show that grantee, to whom grantor had conveyed property, the legal title of which he was holding as security for payment of debt, agreed to convey property to grantor's debtor upon payment of debt to grantee.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Florence County; H. F. Rice, Judge.

Action by Lodge No. 13, Joint-Stock Company of South Carolina, against C. R. Brown. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed and remanded.

McNeill & Oliver, of Florence, for appellant.

C. J. Gasque, of Florence, for respondent.

GAGE, J. The subject-matter in dispute is a storehouse and lot in the city of Florence. The parties litigant are negroes—the plaintiffs a fraternal lodge, and the defendant a preacher of the gospel. So much gives some necessary uncertainty to the transaction under inquiry.

The plaintiff claims equitable title to the house and lot, the legal title of which is in the defendant. The plaintiff alleges in the complaint that one Cohen, a white man, had the legal title before the defendant, Brown, took it from Cohen, and that while Cohen had the legal title there was a contract (in writing) betwixt the plaintiff and Cohen, whereby Cohen agreed with the plaintiff to convey to it the house and lot when the plaintiff should pay him $500. About the above-stated facts there is no doubt at all; the plaintiff and Cohen both so testified, and there is no testimony to the contrary. Cohen got tired waiting on the plaintiff to perform its contract, and conveyed the title to Brown, and the legal effect of that transaction is the matter under review.

The plaintiff testified that it made a parol agreement with Brown before he took title from Cohen, and practically the same contract as that which it had with Cohen. The defendant seems to deny so much, and contends that he discovered through counsel that Cohen had, not a mortgage on the property as he had been informed, but a deed to the property, and that he bought the legal title from Cohen; that he is now owner of the property, and owes no duty to the plaintiff. That was the issue tried by the circuit court, and the decree was in favor of the plaintiff. The five exceptions do but renew the same issue here.

[1] 1. The appellant is mistaken (exceptions 1, 3, and 4) to contend that such a contract, as has been stated, between the plaintiff and Brown, needs to be in writing. A court of equity would soon have its hands tied by that doctrine. 3 Pomeroy, Eq. § 1196.

2. The other exceptions go to the fact, found by the circuit court, that there was such an agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant. The plaintiff testified plainly and directly to the point that, before and when Brown purchased from Cohen, he knew of Cohen's contract with the plaintiff, and he took the title under a like agreement with the plaintiff. Brown's testimony thereabout is at least of doubtful meaning. He thus answered his counsel on the direct examination:

"In the year 1911, December, Robert Lanes came to me and told me that Mr. Cohen had a mortgage on their hall property which he was about to foreclose, and that the mortgage called for $500, and he asked me would I take that mortgage up and give them a chance to redeem it. I told him, 'Yes, I would,' on condition, if the authorities of the lodge would come to me and bring me $40 interest, and make me out papers, and promise to keep up the taxes and insurance and repairs on that property, I would take up the mortgage and give them a chance to redeem it. He went away and brought these two gentlemen here, Mr. Sweet and Mr. McCants, and I repeated the same to them, and they said they would present the matter to the lodge. They came to me in January, 1912. They said, 'If the lodge agrees, we will bring you the papers.' These men never did return. At that time I was presiding elder, and stayed the most of my time in the mountains."

Brown further testified that he was called into Cohen's store by Cohen, and Cohen told him then that the plaintiff had advised Cohen that Brown was to buy the property and was to give the plaintiff the same chance that Cohen had given it. It was then, upon an inspection of the deed Cohen had, that Brown first discovered that Cohen had not a mortgage, as he had been led to believe, but a deed; and upon that discovery he altered his attitude to the plaintiff. He took a deed to the property and held the plaintiff at arm's length as tenants.

[2] The circuit court was right, therefore, to conclude that Brown had made a parol contract with the plaintiff, whereby Brown held the legal title, on the trust that the plaintiff should have it when the plaintiff should pay him $500.

The decree of the court is affirmed, and the cause remanded, to have that decree performed.

Where testimony was susceptible of more than one inference, court properly submitted case to jury.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Colleton County; H. F. Rice, Judge.

Action by George Pollard against the Savannah River Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Nathans & Sinkler, of Charleston, for appellant.

M. P. Howell, of Walterboro, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. Plaintiff recovered judgment for injury to his hand, caused by contact with a negligently placed and exposed trim-saw in defendant's planing mill. The only errors assigned are in the refusal of defendant's motion to direct the verdict, on the grounds of assumption of risk and contributory negligence.

Plaintiff was put to grading and trimming the lumber to specified lengths, as it came from the planer. His position was about 10 feet from the planer and 4 feet from the trimsaw. When a piece of the right length came through, he handed it to another laborer, who put it on a chain, by which it was carried on to be loaded into a car. But if a piece came through that was too long, it was his duty to take it off and trim it to the right length. When he had trimmed a board, and was turning toward the other laborer, his hand came in contact with the saw and was injured.

[1-3] There was testimony that the saw was improperly placed so near to where the grader had to stand as to make it unnecessarily dangerous to him in doing his work, and that it could have been made safe by boxing or covering it, which was usually done in other mills also, that plaintiff had complained of the danger, and defendant's foreman had promised to remedy the unsafe arrangement, and that plaintiff continued in the service in reliance upon that promise. On both issues, the testimony was susceptible of more than one inference, and therefore the case was properly submitted to the jury. Bodie v. Railway, 61 S. C. 468, 39 S. E. 715; *Lorick v. Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; T. J. Mauldin, Judge.

Action by F. M. Farr, as administrator, against the Pacolet Manufacturing Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. New trial granted.

Bomar & Osborne, of Spartanburg, for appellant.

Wallace & Barron, of Union, and John Gary Evans, of Spartanburg, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This is an action for damages, actual and punitive. The cause was tried before Judge Mauldin and a jury, and resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $3,000 actual damages. After entry of judgment, defendant appeals, and by 30 exceptions alleges error and seeks reversal. These exceptions allege error in not directing a verdict in favor of the defendant, allege error on the part of his honor in his charge to the jury, and allege error in the admission of certain testimony.

His honor was right in submitting the cause to the jury. There was an abundance of evidence for that purpose. The jury only awarded actual damages. Counsel for appellant admit that a directed verdict should not have been granted as to actual damages. The evidence was conflicting as to what the duties of plaintiff's intestate were, whether or not he was to sweep up the oil or not, or whether or not his duty was simply to remove the waste and clear it out, and not to clean up the oil on the floor and under the machines, and whether he was employed in the dual capacity to sweep up and remove the waste simply, and stop the machines, 15 in number, and not to sweep up oil and make the place safe for himself and others. During the trial of the case, and throughout the case, the defendant's contention was that under the law it had the right to delegate to the plaintiff's intestate the duty to sweep and clean the floor, and to keep and maintain the same free from oil, and that the plaintiff's intestate could not hold the defendant responsible for his own failure to do this, or for the injuries resulting therefrom. The presiding judge did not admit the correctness of this position, and failed to charge the jury, as requested, along this line, that the master had the right to employ a servant for the specific duty of making the place safe, and the consequences of the failure of the servant employed for this specific duty, where it results in injury to himself.

There was a square issue of fact under the evidence as to whether or not the plaintiff's intestate was employed by the defendant for the specific duty of sweeping and cleaning the floor, and of cleaning the waste oil and everything off of the floor, so as to make it safe for himself and all others who were employed there. If he was employed, and it was his plain and known duty, to sweep the floor, clean it up, and remove all obstructions therefrom, or anything that would impede or obstruct any one employed to work, and had to use the floor, or render it unfit or unsafe, then the defendant was entitled to have its request charged involving this point.

At no time did his honor instruct the jury on this particular point, as asked for, and he was in error in not doing so, and the exceptions raising this question are sustained, and a new trial must be granted.

CLEVELAND v. CANNADY et al.
(No. 10289.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 25, 1919.)

ATTACHMENT ~~63~~—CHECK GIVEN TO SECURE CARRIER NOT ATTACHABLE AS PROPERTY OF SELLER.

A purchaser of potatoes from a resident of Georgia, who gave the agent for the carrier at destination in South Carolina a certified check for amount of draft attached to the bill of lading by the seller and forwarded to a bank, but delayed, could not, in his action against the seller for damages, attach the check in the hands of the carrier's agent as the property of the seller, as it was deposited to protect the carrier.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; I. W. Bowman, Judge.

Action by Grover Cleveland against J. C. Cannady and H. C. Harvley, agent for the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company. From an order denying a motion to vacate the attachment, defendant Harvley appeals. Reversed.

Cothran, Dean & Cothran, of Greenville, for appellant.

H. P. Burbage, of Greenville, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. On March 23, 1919, the defendant Cannady, a resident of Douglas, in the state of Georgia, on an order from plaintiff, shipped a carload of potatoes to Greenville, S. C., and consigned them to himself, with directions to notify himself. He made draft on plaintiff, for whom they were intended, for the price thereof, $978.53, attached it to the bill of lading, which he indorsed, and delivered both to a bank for collection of the draft and delivery of the bill of lading on payment thereof. The shipment arrived on March 26th, but the bill of lading and draft were delayed, and did not reach there until March 31st. On arrival of the potatoes, plaintiff applied to Harvley, the agent of the railway company, for them; but Harvley told him that he could not deliver them without production of the bill of lading, indorsed by Cannady. As the potatoes were perishable, and plaintiff was anxious to get them at once, he deposited with Harvley a certified check for the amount of the draft to indemnify Harvley against loss by reason of his delivering the potatoes to him without the order of Cannady, contained in the indorsed bill of lading, and the potatoes were delivered to him. This was done without the knowledge or consent of Cannady.

On the same day (March 26th) plaintiff brought this action against Cannady, making Harvley, as agent of the railway company, a party defendant, and alleging that, when he took the potatoes out of the car, he discovered that they were not the kind or quality ordered, and were badly damaged by decay, and claimed damages to the amount of $400. He procured a warrant of attachment against the property of Cannady, which was issued on the ground that he was not a resident of this state, and had the same levied on the check in Harvley's hands, as Cannady's property.

The court erred in refusing Harvley's motion to vacate the attachment, made on the ground that Cannady had no property in the check. Cannady had nothing to do with the arrangement between plaintiff and Harvley. The carrier delivered his property to plaintiff without his authority, and was therefore liable to him for the resulting damage. The check was deposited to protect the carrier, and not for Cannady or for his benefit. If Cannady had consented to that arrangement, a different question would have been presented; but he repudiated it and notified the carrier that he would hold it liable for the value of his potatoes, and the fact that the carrier took indemnity from plaintiff would be no defense to Cannady's suit against it. Suppose the carrier had taken only a promise to indemnify or a bond? Its liability to Cannady is the same, whether it had taken any indemnity or not. Having deposited the check to protect the carrier, plaintiff cannot be allowed to destroy or diminish the security which he agreed that it should afford the carrier by seizing it under his attachment. The jurisdiction of the court depended upon Cannady's property in the check. As he has none, the attachment should have been set aside. Grocery Co. v. Elevator Co., 72 S. C. 450, 52 S. E. 191, 2 L. The consignee can recover penalty against railroad in action against railroad, instead of against Director General of Railroads, where action was commenced and cause of action arose before issuance of General Order No. 50. Fraser, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Sumter County; Ernest Moore, Judge.

Action by W. P. Smith against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Mark Reynolds and L. W. McLemore, both of Sumter, for appellant.

R. D. Epps, of Sumter, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. The record contains this statement:

"This action was commenced in the magistrate's court August 30, 1918, to recover one hundred dollars, ($100.00) and costs, to wit, fifty-six dollars, the alleged value of the carload of wood and forty-four dollars penalty, six dollars of the penalty being expressly waived. The car was alleged to have been shipped on or about the 26th January, 1918, from Swimming Pens siding, to the plaintiff, at Sumter, S. C., within a reasonable time after the said shipwood was lost through the negligence of the defendant, and a claim of fifty-six dollars was filed with the agent at Sumter, S. C., within a reasonable time after the said shipment should have arrived.

"The case was tried before the magistrate without a jury on September 27, 1918. The magistrate reserved his decision until November 9, 1918, when he rendered a verdict for one hundred dollars for the plaintiff, as sued for. A motion for a new trial was made before the magistrate on the following grounds:

"I. Evidence showed that R. E. Brown, the shipper, was the owner of the shipment and the real party in interest.

"II. That Smith, the plaintiff, had no interest whatever in the cause of action; Brown having testified that the loss would be his, that Smith had made no obligation to pay, nor was there any charge on his books against Smith for shipment.

"III. That there was no evidence whatever that Smith was the consignee aggrieved, or any evidence that Smith had authorized the suit, and the verdict is without any evidence to support it.

"This motion was overruled and appeal was taken to the Circuit Court, on the same exceptions to the Supreme Court herein.

"Synopsis of Answer.

"For a first defense: That the A. C. L. R. R. Company did not enter with plaintiff into the transaction alleged in the complaint, because at the time this alleged defendant was not carrying on business of common carrier and was not operating business of railroad carrier, between the points named in the complaint, but prior to that time the U. S. government had taken entire charge of the railroad property and facilities of this defendant, and was operating same, to the complete exclusion of this defendant.

"For a second defense: General denial.

"For a third defense: That the defendant railroad company is now being operated by the U. S. government as a war measure, and that it has been so operated for some time prior to the movement of the shipment referred to in the complaint, and that no penalty can be awarded in this case against the defendant, as it would be in effect an award of a penalty against the United States, and that the application of a penalty by state statutes is necessarily suspended while the United States is operating the defendant road.

"The circuit judge affirmed the judgment of the magistrate, and the defendant appealed to the Supreme Court from the said judgment."

The defendant appealed upon the following exceptions:

"I. Because there was no evidence that W. P. Smith, the plaintiff, was the owner of the shipment and the real party in interest, and the magistrate erred in holding that he was the real party in interest.

"II. Because there was no evidence that W. P. Smith, the plaintiff, had any interest whatever in the cause of action; Brown having testified that if he lost the case the loss would be his, and in further testifying that Smith had made no obligation to pay for the said shipment, nor was there any charge on his books for the shipment.

"III. Because the magistrate erred in rendering a judgment for the penalty, when there was no evidence whatever that Smith was the consignee aggrieved, and because there was no evidence whatever that the plaintiff authorized any suit in this case, nor that any penalty be collected against the defendant.

"IV. Because the magistrate erred in rendering a judgment for the penalty, as the operation of the railroad by the United States government would necessarily preclude the awarding of a penalty against the government.

"V. Because the verdict was without any evidence to support it."

[1] In so far as the exceptions assign error in the findings of fact by the circuit court, they are not reviewable by this court, except for the purpose of determining whether there was any testimony whatever tending to sustain such findings. Without undertaking to discuss the testimony in detail, we are satisfied that there was evidence to that effect. The exceptions in that respect are therefore overruled.

[2] The only other question raised by the exceptions is whether there was error in allowing the penalty, amounting to $44. In deciding this question, it will not be necessary to consider whether the action should have been brought against the defendant, or against the Director General of Railroads. The record shows that the case was tried before the magistrate on the 27th of September, 1918. Therefore it was commenced, and the cause of action arose, before the issuance of General Order No. 50, on the 28th of October, 1918, which contains the proviso that—

"This order shall not apply to actions, suits, or proceedings, for the recovery of fines, penalties, and forfeitures."

Affirmed.

HYDRICK, WATTS, and GAGE, JJ., concur.

FRASER, J. I dissent. The consignee does not testify. The shipper, who does testify, admits that the loss, if any, is the loss of the shipper, and not of the consignee. I do not see how the consignee can recover, when he never had title to the wood, and is not to lose in case this suit shall fail.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Charleston County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge.

Le Roy Simmons was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Logan & Grace, of Charleston, for appellant.

Thomas P. Stoney, Sol. of Charleston, for the State.

HYDRICK, J. Defendant was indicted for the murder of Ethel Scriven, and convicted of manslaughter. The crime was committed in the city of Charleston, about 11 o'clock at night, on July 21, 1918. Defendant was the only witness to the fatal encounter. He testified that he had been going with deceased for about a year, but they had had a falling out that day, and about 9 o'clock that evening she saw him in company with another woman, and called him, but he refused to go to her, saying that he had told her he did not care to have anything more to do with her, whereupon she threatened to cut his throat, but went on off. On his way home in company with Julius Scurven, he went out of his way to avoid meeting her; but she saw them on Line street, near Coming, and came toward him with a brick in her hand, with which she attempted to strike him, but was prevented by his getting behind Scurven. She then went back, and around the block, and met them on Sheppard street, and came up with something in her hand. He did not know what it was, but afterwards found out that it was a rock, and as she came up she said, "Now, I am going to kill you." He then drew his knife to protect himself, and Scurven walked on and left them. She then took his hat off his head and said she was going to cut it up. He said, "Give me my hat," and reached for it, when she raised the thing in her hand to strike him, and he stabbed her. She told him he had cut her, and asked him to take her to a doctor, which he tried to do; but she fell, and he called Scurven, who was a block away, to come and help him take her to a doctor. He came, and they got her up; but she fell again. He then left her there, and went to his brother's house, and Scurven went to tell her people. Deceased was found by others and taken to a hospital, where she died from loss of blood. There was testimony that the fatal wound was a stab "in the cheek of the thigh," and that it was inflicted from the rear.

Defendant was arrested about 5 o'clock the next morning at his brother's house, and taken to the police station, where he was asked if he had killed deceased, and admitted that he had. He told the officers that he had thrown the knife with which he had stabbed her into a certain lot, where it was found with blood on it, and afterwards identified by him as his knife. Two policemen testified that these admissions were freely and voluntarily made, and were not influenced by threats, hope of benefit, or other inducement held out to him. About 1 or 2 o'clock the same day he was carried to the coroner's inquest, where he made a statement, which was reduced to writing, read over to him, and signed by him, after being told by the coroner "that the state would not compel him to make a statement, it was up to him whether he would or not, and whatever he said would be held for or against him." In that statement he said:

"She grabbed my hat off my head, and said she was going to cut up my hat. I ran behind her to try and get my hat, and she picked up a rock, and to keep her from hitting me I stabbed her."

In other respects the statement is not materially different from his testimony at the trial. The testimony of the policemen and the statement made to the coroner were objected to as incompetent, under the circumstances. The grounds relied upon in argument are that defendant was a negro youth of 19 years, ignorant of his rights and without friend or counsel, and was not warned or advised by the policemen who had him in their custody, that he had the right to refuse to answer their questions; and as to the statement made to the coroner the further objection is urged that defendant was carried to the inquest about 1 or 2 o'clock in the afternoon, without having been given breakfast or dinner. He so testified.

[1] With regard to the objection last mentioned, while there is no evidence to contradict defendant's statement, the record falls to show that he made any such complaint at the time of or before making his statement to the coroner. He did not even say at the trial that the fact had any influence upon him in making the statement. No reason appears why he should have been starved into making a statement, since it appears that he had already freely and voluntarily told the policemen about his connection with the homicide. So, even if true, it cannot avail appellant, not even as a makeweight, because the circumstances do not warrant the inference that it was done to influence him to make a statement, or that it actually had any such effect.

[2] The following cases show that the other objections urged are untenable: State v. Baker, 58 S. C. 111, 36 S. E. 501; State v. Middleton, 69 S. C. 72, 48 S. E. 35; State v. Henderson, 74 S. C. 477, 55 S. E. 117. These cases show, too, that in deciding whether confessions made to an officer having the party in custody are free and voluntary, or are influenced by threats or other inducements the conduct of the officer will be rigidly scrutinized; nevertheless, that it rests in the judgment and discretion of the trial judge to decide, in the light of all the circumstances, whether the proper foundation has been laid for the admission of such testimony, and that his ruling will not be disturbed, unless it is clearly wrong and prejudicial. We see no error in the rulings complained of.

[3] There was ample testimony to sustain the verdict, as will appear by reference to the statement above of the evidence and its tendencies. The jury evidently found that it was not necessary for defendant to strike in self-defense, and that he did so in sudden heat and passion, aroused by deceased's snatching off his hat and threatening to cut it up. The court was asked to charge:

"The mere fact that a person intended to kill another when he struck at him is not sufficient to prove that his intention was malicious and murderous, since he may have been acting in self-defense. Nor does the fact that the slayer intended, not to kill, but only to disable, make the killing manslaughter. And, though a person killing another bore express malice against him, he is not guilty of murder, when he acted in self-defense."

[4, 5] The request was refused on the ground that it involved a charge on the facts. Technical consideration of the request shows that it was hardly objectionable on that ground while it contains only propositions of law, it will be noted that the statement found in the second sentence is not expressly qualified by the same condition which qualified those contained in the first and third, to wit, that the slayer was acting in self-defense. It is so qualified only by implication from the manner of its connection with the first sentence. As appellant had testified that he did not intend to kill deceased, the second sentence, without the qualification indicated being clearly expressed, might have been misunderstood by the jury, and construed as an expression of the judge's opinion that, if appellant did not intend to kill, but only to disable, they could not convict him of manslaughter. That would have been an erroneous conception of the request and of the law; because, even though appellant did not intend to kill, but only to wound or disable deceased, yet, having used a deadly weapon, if he struck the fatal blow, not in self-defense, but in sudden heat and passion, aroused by sufficient provocation, he was properly found guilty of manslaughter. As the proposition contained in the first and third sentences bore only on the charge of murder, which was eliminated by the verdict, the refusal to give them was clearly harmless.

[8] Besides, the jury was very fully, clearly, and correctly instructed as to the law of the case in the general charge, and other requests which were given, wherein the request refused was substantially charged, though not in the same language. But a party has no right to complain, if the law of the case is correctly charged, though not in the precise language preferred by him, especially if his request is so framed that it might be misleading. Considering the charge as a whole, we are satisfied that appellant was not prejudiced by the refusal of the request.

Judgment affirmed.

BARNHILL v. CHEROKEE FALLS MFG. CO. (No. 10275.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 26, 1919.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT §288(11)—WHEN QUESTION OF ASSUMPTION OF RISK IS FOR JURY.

Whether an 18 year old employé of average intelligence, but of limited experience, appreciated the danger of sliding a loaded wheelbarrow down an unguarded gangway from which he was thrown into a river, when one of the legs of the wheelbarrow slipped off, held for the jury, though the conditions were obvious.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT §217(2)—APPRECIATION OF DANGER NECESSARY TO ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

A master, to relieve himself from liability on ground that servant assumed risk, must show, not only that the servant knew the danger, or that it was so obvious that he should have known it, but also that he comprehended or appreciated it.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Cherokee County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge.

Action by John W. Barnhill, administrator, against the Cherokee Falls Manufacturing Company. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

G. W. Speer, of Gaffney, and John Gary Evans, of Spartanburg, for appellant.

Butler & Hall, of Gaffney, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. This is an action for damages for the wrongful death of plaintiff's intestate, Casper Barnhill, while employed by defendant. One end of defendant's dam on Broad river had been washed away, and Barnhill and other laborers were carrying stones in wheelbarrows from the opposite side of the river across the dam, the top of which was 12 feet wide, to repair the breach. The dam was about 4 feet lower than the river bank, and a gangway was constructed of two pieces of timber, 10 inches wide and 16 feet long, laid side by side, with one end on the bank and the other on the dam. For convenience, it was placed near the edge of the dam. It had no guard rails, and its slope was so great that the men were unable to roll their wheelbarrows down it, when loaded, but had to slide them down by bearing down on the handles, so that the legs would serve as brakes. The floodgates in the dam were under the gangway, and were raised, and the river was rushing through them in a torrent. While Barnhill was sliding his wheelbarrow, down the gangway, one of the legs slipped off, and he was thrown into the river and drowned. He had been working for defendant about 10 days, and had been rolling stone about 3 days. He was 18 years old, and of average intelligence, but of limited experience, never having worked away from home before, except for a few days. Defendant's officers and agents were on the ground daily, and observed the conditions and method of doing the work. There was testimony that the gangway could have been placed at the center of the dam, and, if it had been so placed, Barnhill would have fallen on the dam, and not into the river, and, if there had been guard rails on it, he could not have fallen off.

Plaintiff alleged negligence and recklessness in failing to provide a safe place to work, in that the gangway was too narrow and unprotected by guard rails. At the close of his testimony, which tended to prove the facts above stated, defendant moved for a nonsuit, on three grounds: (1) That there was no evidence of recklessness; and (2) none of negligence; and (3) that Barnhill assumed the risk. The court refused the motion on the second ground, but granted it on the first and third. The ruling as to the first and second grounds is not questioned, but appellant assigns error in granting the nonsuit on the third ground.

[1] The trial judge based his ruling on the fact that the risk was obvious, from which he concluded, as matter of law, that it was assumed. No doubt, in the majority of cases, assumption of the risk follows, as matter of law, from the fact that danger is obvious.

But it is not always so, since one may know the facts and be ignorant of the danger growing out of them. Nonappreciation of the danger is inconsistent with the supposition that, in entering upon or remaining in the service, the servant exercised that deliberate choice which is an essential element of contract, upon the implication of which the doctrine rests. When we say that a man appreciates a danger, we mean that he forms a judgment as to the future, and that his judgment was right. McKee v. Tourtellotte, 167 Mass. 69, 44 N. E. 1071, 48 L. R. A. 542.

While it appears that Barnhill was a youth of ordinary intelligence, and therefore it should be presumed that he comprehended what a person of ordinary prudence and of his intelligence and experience would have understood from the situation, it also appears that he was only 18 years of age and of limited experience and that he was set to work with older and more experienced men, and was working under the immediate supervision of defendant's officers. Did he form a correct judgment of the danger of the situation? Or did he simply proceed in reliance upon the supposed superior knowledge and experience of his fellow workmen and of defendant's officers and agents in providing the place and method of work, without forming or exercising his own judgment? While the circumstances warrant the inference drawn by the court, we do not think that was the only inference of which they were susceptible. The conditions were obvious, but the circumstances were such that the jury should have been allowed to say whether Barnhill appreciated the danger incident to them.

[2] Where the master's fault is the cause of injury to his servant, he is prima facie liable, and if he would relieve himself of the consequences, on the ground that the servant assumed the risk, he must show, not only that the servant knew the danger, or that it was so obvious that he should have known it, but also that he comprehended or appreciated it.

Judgment reversed.

MULL et al. v. TOUCHBERRY. (No. 10255.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 25, 1919.)

1. CONTRACTS ¶168—ON EXPRESS UNDERTAKING MATTERS NECESSARY TO CONTRACT ARE IMPLIED.

From an expressed undertaking, the law will also imply whatever the parties reasonably may be supposed to have meant, and whatever is essential to render the transaction fair and honest.

2. SALES ¶267 — EXPRESS WARRANTY OF QUALITY EXCLUDES IMPLIED WARRANTY.

Where, by the contract of sale of an automobile, the seller expressly warranted the car to be first-class in all respects, and fully worth the value paid, such express warranty or undertaking excluded any implied warranty of quality.

Appeal from Richland County Court; M. S. Whaley, Judge.

Action by A. P. Mull and others against E. C. Touchberry. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The second and third paragraphs of the second defense of the answer, directed to be reported, read as follows:

(2) That on the 19th day of December, 1917, for a full consideration, the plaintiff sold and delivered to this defendant the automobile therein referred to, and received from him one used automobile and defendant's check for eight hundred and fifty ($850.00) dollars, having received from plaintiff the day before the sum of forty-five ($45.00) dollars, on account of said transaction; that the said transaction was based on the guaranty and warranty of plaintiffs that the automobile so sold to defendant was first-class in all respects, and fully worth the value paid for the same, on which guaranty this defendant relied, as was well known to plaintiff; that as soon as defendant had an opportunity to test the said automobile he discovered that it was far below the guaranty in value, and not worth the price paid; and that he promptly reported said fact to plaintiffs and tendered the car to them, demanding a rescission of the contract embracing a return of his check and of his used car.

(3) That plaintiffs' warranty referred to was that the said car was very powerful, would climb any hills in the vicinity in high gear, would travel 16 to 20 miles on a gallon of gasoline, and was as good a car as a Buick Six; that said warranties have failed, and the said car is not worth the consideration paid therefor.

Weston & Aycock, of Columbia, for appellant.

Robert Moorman, of Columbia, for respondents.

GAGE, J. The appeal is by the defendant from the charge of the court. The action is on an unpaid check given by the defendant to the plaintiff in part payment of an automobile. The answer alleges that the vendor sold the vendee the machine upon a special warranty, expressed in the second and third paragraphs of the second defense. Let so much of the answer be reported.

The court submitted those warranties to the jury upon proper instructions, and the verdict was for the plaintiff. The defendant desired the court to instruct the jury that the defendant might stand, besides on the express warranties, on that warranty implied by law, to wit, that a sound price calls for a sound article. The court ruled that, inasmuch as the defendant had pleaded an express contract of warranty, there was no room for implication.

The challenge of that statement of the law is the major issue in the case. The argument of the appellant is:

"The rule excluding the defense of implied warranty, where an express warranty exists, had its origin in the rule of evidence excluding everything except that which was embraced in the express warranty, which was usually in writing. Stucky v. Clyburn, Cheves, 186, 34 Am. Dec. 590; McLaughlin v. Horton, 1 Hill, 383."

It is true that in the cases cited, and in most of our reported cases, the warranty was expressed in writing; and the courts have in some of the cases denied the operation of an implied warranty, upon the ground that the allowance of it would impeach the written word. It is not apparent how the invocation of a contract implied by law can be called the proof of another contract than that which the parties have reduced to writing. Aside from that question, however, it was clearly and succinctly stated as early as 1833 that—

"The soundness of the [article] is the subject of express warranty; it shows that that was the subject of the contract, and the plaintiff's liability cannot be extended beyond it, either by parol or legal implication." (The italics are supplied.) Johnson, J., in McLaughlin v. Horton, 1 Hill, 383.

[1] The reason, or it may be the policy, of the rule is that, when two persons have expressed their whole contract by writing or by word of mouth, there is no warrant to think they have left any other contract to be implied. 6 R. C. L. p. 589; 2 Parsons on Contracts, p. 515. It is true that—

"From an expressed undertaking, the law will also imply whatever the parties may be reasonably supposed to have meant, and what is essential to render the transaction fair and honest." Bishop on Contracts, § 105.

[2] But that is not saying that, where the expressed undertaking has limited the liability of a vendor, the same may be enlarged by that different contract implied from the simple act of sale. The right of the plaintiff to hold the defendant to the contract which the defendant says was expressed arises, not so much out of a rule of evidence, nor out of the pleading; it arises out of the sense of the transaction. If, therefore, the defendant had particularly alleged, as it is contended he did, two defenses, the one a contract implied by law, and the other a contract expressed by the parties, yet we should hold that the expressed contract fixes the plaintiff's liability.

The appellant argues that the rule we have stated shuts the defendant up to confine his defense to an express warranty; but the defendant shut himself up when he alleged the parties made a particular agreement.

All the other exceptions are to language quoted by the court from the books at, we infer, the suggestion of the plaintiff's counsel. In each instance the court properly modified the quotations, so as to rob them of any appearance of a charge upon the facts.

The judgment is affirmed.

EVANS et al. v. WATKINS et al.
(No. 10253.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 25, 1919.)

1. PARTIES ⇐59(2) — SUBSTITUTION OF ASSIGNEE ON ASSIGNMENT AFTER SUIT ALLOWED.

The cause of action being assignable, nonsuit should not be granted because of assignment after commencement of action, but, under provision of Code Civ. Proc. 1912, § 170, substitution of assignee should be allowed.

2. ASSIGNMENTS ⇐24(1)—RIGHT OF ACTION FOR INJURY TO PROPERTY ASSIGNABLE.

Right of action for injury to property is assignable.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Chesterfield County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

Action by G. F. Evans against Robert Watkins and another. From a judgment granting a nonsuit, and refusing substitution of Frank Lewellyn as plaintiff, plaintiff and Lewellyn appeal. Reversed.

Hanna & Hunley, of Chesterfield, for appellants.

J. A. Knight, of Chesterfield, and Pollock & Pegues, of Cheraw, for respondents.

HYDRICK, J. The plaintiff, Evans, brought this action against the defendants to recover damages for injuries done to his mule, which was struck by an automobile, owned by the defendant Mary Watkins and driven by the defendant Robert Watkins, and plaintiff attached the automobile, under the provisions of the act of 1912 (27 St. at Large, 737). Defendants admitted the injury, but alleged that it was caused by the negligence of Frank Lewellyn, who had charge of the mule at the time.

[1] At the trial Lewellyn was examined as a witness for plaintiff, and, on cross-examination by defendants, he was allowed to testify, over objection of plaintiff, that he had paid plaintiff for the mule, and that the cause of action for damages had been assigned to him, after the commencement of the action and before the trial. Evans had not informed his attorneys of the assignment to Lewellyn. Upon the fact being brought out at the trial, defendants moved for a nonsuit, and Evans and Lewellyn moved for an order substituting Lewellyn in place of Evans as plaintiff. The court granted the nonsuit and dismissed the complaint.

This was error. The motion to substitute should have been granted. Section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"No action shall abate by the death, marriage, or other disability of a party, or by the transfer of any interest therein, if the cause of action survive or continue."

Then follows provisions relating to the case of death, etc., and the section continues:

"In case of any other transfer of interest, the action shall be continued in the name of the original party, or the court may allow the person to whom the transfer is made to be substituted in the action."

[2] The right of action being an injury to property, was assignable (Montgomery v. Kerr, 1 Hill, 291; Miller v. Newell, 20 S. C. 123, 139, and cases cited at top of page 140, 47 Am. Rep. 833; 4 Cyc. 24), and the substitution prayed for should have been granted.

Judgment reversed.

MEDLIN v. HODGES. (No. 10268.)

1. GAMING §50(1)—WHEN EVIDENCE SHOWS INTENT TO DELIVER IN FUTURE SEED SOLD.

All the testimony in action for breach of contract to sell and deliver cotton seed in the future held to tend to prove that the seller was, at the time of contract, the owner of the seed, and that it was then the bona fide intention of both parties that it should be actually delivered and received, so that there was no error in not leaving the questions to the jury.

2. GAMING §49(3)—INTENT TO RECEIVE SEED SOLD FOR FUTURE DELIVERY EVIDENCED BY CIRCUMSTANCES.

To show that it was the buyer's intention, at time of contract to sell and deliver cotton seed in the future, to actually receive it, his testimony in terms to that effect, which would not be conclusive, is not necessary; but such intention is to be determined from the whole event.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Marlboro County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

Action by J. T. Medlin against H. M. Hodges for breach of contract for sale and future delivery of cotton seed. From a judgment on a verdict directed for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Defendant's exception is as follows:

"His honor erred in directing the jury to find for the plaintiff, when the contract was for future delivery, and it was for the jury to decide whether under the evidence adduced it was established that the defendant was the owner or assignee of the cotton seed when the contract was made, or that it was the bona fide intention of both parties at the time of making the contract that the cotton seed should be actually received and delivered in kind by the parties to the agreement at the future period mentioned."

Stevenson, Stevenson & Prince, of Bennettsville, for appellant.

Townsend & Rogers, of Bennettsville, for respondent.

GAGE, J. [1, 2] The one exception is that it was for the jury, and not for the court, to find (1) whether the defendant, Hodges, contemporaneously with the execution of the contract, was the owner of the cotton seed which was the subject of the contract; and (2) whether at the same event the bona fide intention of both the seller and the buyer was that the cotton seed should be actually delivered by the one side and received by the other side. Let the exception be reported.

The written contract was concluded September 1, 1915. It is true that there was a parol agreement before that day, and in the spring of the year; but on August 16th Hodges wrote a letter to Medlin, setting out what he esteemed the parol agreement to be, and asked Medlin to "acknowledge the trade," and September 1st Medlin wrote to acknowledge the contract so stated. And on October 14th Hodges wrote to Medlin:

"You remember, when seed began to advance in August, I wrote to you and reviewed our verbal trade, and asked for your individual contract."

So that the parleying had before September was reduced to a written contract, evidenced by the letters above mentioned. On September 1st Hodges, by the letter of October 14th, admitted that he had planned to buy seed from other parties and so perform his contract with Medlin, "and sell my own seed at an advanced price." Hodges, who was a farmer, worth by his own declaration in a letter to Medlin from $50,000 to $75,000, was therefore the owner on September 1st of the seed he had agreed to sell. The same fact is manifest from the letter of December 20th, hereinafter quoted in another connection. There is, therefore, no reasonable conclusion to be drawn, other than that Hodges was owner of the 3,000 bushels of cotton seed when the contract was made; all the testimony tends to prove so much, and there is none contrary.

The brief of the appellant does not question but that Hodges' bona fide intention at the making of the contract was to actually deliver the seed; for he did soon after that event so deliver 718 bushels. The argument only is that there is no testimony to show that Medlin's bona fide intention, at the making of the contract, was to actually receive the seed. The argument is that Medlin never expressly testified to what his then intention was. What a party's intention at a given time depends, not so much upon what the party may subsequently testify it to have then been, as upon what all the circumstances attending the transaction shows it to have been. It would be vain for a person to swear that his intention at a given time and about a given act was one thing, when all the circumstances tended to show it was another thing. We have held that a declaration, even in the written contract, of the intention of the parties, is not conclusive of the fact. Maybank v. Rodgers, 98 S. C. 285, 82 S. E. 422.

So in the instant case that which Medlin intended when the contract was made, whether he intended to actually receive the seed, must be determined by the whole event. The whole event, resting largely on correspondence, is this: At the time stated Medlin was engaged in the business of buying cotton seed at Bennettsville; that is a common business in the state; the contract was evidenced in informal fashion; Medlin bought for himself and for the Buckeye Cotton Oil Company; the transaction involved only $1,200; the proposition to sell came from Hodges; the sale was made by Hodges for a particular purpose, and with the expressed intention on his part to put himself in funds with which to pay for fertilizers, so that he intended to deliver the actual seed and receive the actual money; 718 bushels of seed were received from Hodges by Medlin on September 18th; Medlin frequently and persistently demanded a delivery of the balance of the seed; every feature of the transaction suggests that the parties contemplated an actual sale and an actual delivery of cotton seed then in the hands of the vendor; and there is no feature of it to suggest even that the parties intended to deal in futures, in violation of the statute law.

Although the answer set up the mala fides of both parties to violate the statute, the defendant offered no testimony which tended to prove the allegation; he did not testify; in his letter to Medlin of December 20th he expressly declared that he sold the seed to Medlin because he thought Medlin had property in his name and was otherwise reliable; and in the same letter he declared:

"I would have shipped you every seed of 3,000 bushels by the middle of September, but I was warned not to let a car of seed, only at my risk, leave Brownsville before being paid for, unless the general market was forty cents per bushel."

And Hodges made practically the same statement in a letter of November 27th to Medlin. The entire testimony is susceptible of only one reasonable inference, and that is that Hodges intended to deliver the seed and that Medlin intended to receive them; there is none to the contrary.

The judgment is affirmed.

ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL  $\S$ 15—WHEN MOTION TO DISMISS FOR OTHER ACTION PENDING PROPERLY OVERRULED.

Motion to dismiss action by W. against M., to recover possession or value of property mortgaged by M. to W. for price of fertilizer sold by W. to M., because of pendency, when it was brought, of action of M. against W. for damages for breach of warranty of fertilizer, and to cancel mortgage, which motion was made before, and renewed after, M.'s action was discontinued, held properly overruled.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Florence County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

Action by Winslow Wright & Co., a partnership, against Thos. Edward McKnight. From an order overruling a motion to dismiss, defendant appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Arrowsmith, Muldrow, Bridges & Hicks, of Florence, for appellant.

McNeill & Oliver and Willcox & Willcox, all of Florence, for respondents.

HYDRICK, J. In February, 1913, plaintiffs sold defendant some fertilizer and took his note for the price thereof, due October 15, 1913, and secured by mortgage of defendant's crops and some chattels. In October, 1913, defendant brought an action against plaintiffs for damages for breach of warranty of the fertilizer, and for cancellation of his note and mortgage. Plaintiffs answered, denying the warranty and the allegations upon which cancellation was sought. Thereafter plaintiffs brought this action in claim and delivery to recover possession of the mortgaged property, or the value thereof. Defendant answered, pleading, inter alia, another action pending, to wit, that which he had brought against plaintiffs.

Both cases were referred to a referee, and when they were called for trial before the referee a contention arose as to which case should be first tried. The referee ruled that the action first brought—that of the defendant herein against the plaintiffs herein—should be first tried; but, on the insistence of defendant herein that his plea in abatement should be first decided, the referee considered and overruled it. Defendant then moved for a continuance of the cases, until the court should decide upon the validity of his plea, and that motion was overruled. A motion for continuance on the ground of surprise was then made and overruled. Thereupon, on motion of defendant, and by consent of plaintiffs, an order was taken discontinuing defendant's case against plaintiffs.

Thereafter this case came on to be heard on the report of the referee, whereupon defendant renewed his motion to dismiss it, on the ground of another action pending at the time it was commenced. The motion was properly overruled, as clearly appears from the authorities cited by respondent.

Appeal dismissed.

Appeal of BROOKLAND BANK.

MARTIN et al. v. MARTIN et al.

(No. 10277.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 26, 1919.)

1. HOMESTEAD §18—SEPARATION OF HUSBAND AND WIFE DOES NOT AFFECT HIS HOMESTEAD RIGHT.

Husband, who has been separated from wife for 14 years, and who during such time has not supported wife, is nevertheless "head of a family," and entitled to a homestead; the separation not having absolved him from supporting wife.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Head of a Family.]

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE §4 — SEPARATION DOES NOT AFFECT HUSBAND'S DUTY TO SUPPORT WIFE.

Husband's separation from and failure to support wife does not absolve him from duty of supporting her.

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE §3(1/2)—HUSBAND FAILING TO SUPPORT WIFE REMAINS HEAD OF FAMILY.

The fact that a husband does not support his wife does not deprive him of his legal rights as the head of the family.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lexington County; W. H. Townsend, Judge.

The Brookland Bank levied execution on a judgment against A. W. Martin, and brought action to enjoin sale of A. W. Martin's interest in land sold in partition proceedings by W. A. Martin and others against A. W. Martin and others, and A. W. Martin files a petition asking that a homestead be set apart to him out of the proceeds of sale. Petition granted, and the Brookland Bank appeals. Affirmed.

C. M. Efrid, of Lexington, for appellant.

Weston & Aycock, of Columbia, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. The sole question is whether A. W. Martin is head of a family and entitled to claim a homestead in lands, as against his judgment creditor, the Brookland Bank, under the following agreed statement of facts:

"He was married a number of years ago, and lived in and around the town of Swansea, in the said county and state, and to him and his wife were born quite a number of children, all of whom are now of age and self-supporting. None of them reside with him. He and his wife separated 14 years ago and have not lived together since that time. There is no animosity or ill feeling existing between them, but about that time they simply agreed for reasons mutually satisfactory to separate and live apart, but no immoral conduct on the part of either was the cause of the separation. He now lives in the city of Columbia, and conducts a mercantile business for another person, in which he has no interest as owner. His wife lives in the town of Swansea, in the county of Lexington, and owns in her own right a valuable farm, consisting of 295 acres, near the town of Swansea, and an improved lot in the town. She supports herself entirely from the profits of the plantation and property, and is not in any way dependent upon her husband for support. He has not contributed anything whatever to her support for a number of years, and is not now doing so. He occasionally visits her, and she visits him, also; but they do not live together as one family."

[1-3] The circuit court correctly held that Martin is the head of a family, and entitled to the homestead. The separation did not absolve him from the duty of supporting his wife, which is imposed upon him by the law. Gilliam v. Railway, 108 S. C. 195, 199, 93 S. E. 865. Nor did it change the marital relation. She is still his wife, and has the right to require him to perform his duty; and they may yet be reconciled and live together. The fact that a husband does not support his wife does not deprive him of his legal rights as the head of the family. He may be an invalid, and she may, in fact, support him; nevertheless he is in law the head of the family. The circumstances stated cannot change the law.

Judgment affirmed.

WILLIAMS v. PHILADELPHIA LIFE INS. CO. et al. (No. 10258.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 25, 1919.)

1. INSURANCE §136(5)—INSURER NOT LIABLE ON POLICY OF WHICH INSURED HAD NO KNOWLEDGE.

If insurer sent general agent a policy essentially different from that for which insured had applied, and if insured at no time had knowledge thereof or assented thereto, insurer is not liable thereon, though policy had not been canceled at time of insured's death.

2. INSURANCE §136(2)—WHAT CONSTITUTES DELIVERY OF POLICY TO INSURED.

Generally, when an insurance company sends a policy the contents of which is known to, and assented to, by the insured, to the company's general agent for delivery to the insured, then delivery is effected, and the contract of insurance is of force.

3. EVIDENCE §442(1)—COLLATERAL AGREEMENT WITH AGENT AS TO PREMIUM OF POLICY INADMISSIBLE.

Where application provided that all "agreements made by or with the company or the agent taking this application are reduced to writing and made a part of the application," evidence of agreement between general agent and insured's husband, a special agent, that initial premium should be paid by a bonus to be earned by husband as agent, held incompetent in action on the policy, where such agreement was not made part of application.

4. INSURANCE §141(2) — PREPAYMENT OF FIRST PREMIUM MAY BE WAIVED.

Parties to insurance contract may waive that part of contract requiring prepayment of initial premium before insurance shall take effect.

5. INSURANCE §646(4)—RECITAL OF PAYMENT OF FIRST PREMIUM PRESUMED TRUE.

Where policy reciting payment of first premium was sent to general agent for delivery, first premium will be presumed to have been paid.

6. INSURANCE §141(1)—WAIVER MAY ARISE BY IMPLICATION.

Waiver often rests in a subtle operation of mind and speech; it may arise by expression, but more often by implication.

7. INSURANCE §141(2)—WHEN WAIVER OF PAYMENT OF FIRST PREMIUM MAY BE INFERRED.

If insurer, with a right to payment of first premium before taking effect of insurance, shall make any speech or perform any act from which a reasonable inference may be drawn that the insurer does not stand upon its rights, then waiver may be inferred.

8. INSURANCE §668(3) — WHERE DEFENSE WAS NO CONTRACT, MEANING OF LETTER OF INSURER FOR JURY.

In action on life policy, where defense was that no contract of insurance was ever entered into between the parties, the meaning of a letter from insurer to insured held for jury.

Fraser, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lancaster County; George E. Prince, Judge.

Action by H. F. Williams, as administrator of the estate of Margaret E. Williams, deceased, against the Philadelphia Life Insurance Company and others. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. Order of nonsuit set aside, and new trial ordered.

Following is the statement of facts referred to in opinion:

The defendant is a Pennsylvania corporation, in the business of insuring lives; the Gordon Investment Company is a corporation under the laws of North Carolina, in the business of selling life insurance; the plaintiff was husband to Margaret, and was, at the time in issue, an agent of the defendant company, duly constituted by writing to canvass for applications for life insurance in York county, and also, by his testimony, agent for the Gordon Company; and one Gordon was president of the Gordon Company.

On 22d December, 1910, Margaret made application to the defendant, through H. T. Williams, printed as "Agent" on the application blank, and the Gordon Company, printed as "General Agent" on the application blank, "for $5,000 insurance on the 20-year term plan, annual premium $40.25, payable semiannually"; that application was written into a detached printed form, six by eight inches in size, which, for identification, may be called part 1, though not so marked.

This part 1 is in these words:

"I, Margaret E. Williams, hereby make application to the Philadelphia Life Insurance Company for $5,000 insurance on the 20 yr. term plan; annual premium $40.25, payable semiannually. I was born on the 12th day of April, 1876. Age nearest birthday 34 years.

ical examiner of the company, and to accept the policy when issued.

"I hereby agree that all representations and agreements made by or with the company or the agent taking this application are reduced to writing herein and made a part of this application and the policy issued hereunder.

"Dated at Yorkville, S. C., this 22d day of December, 1910.

"Witness: H. T. Williams, Agent.

"Margaret E. Williams.

"General Agent, Gordon Insurance & Inv. Co."

Upon the face of the original of part 1 is rubber stamped the numerals "18090," and upon the back of it is rubber stamped "James H. Perry, General Agent, 27 Dec. 1910." Detached from this application paper, but a part with it, is a large sheet of paper printed on the back "Application Part 2," which embodies (1) the declaration of the applicant made to the company's medical examiner, and (2) the declarations of the medical examiner. The concluding sentence of part 1 are those words already set out in it; and at the end of the applicant's declaration in part 2 are these words:

"I hereby agree, for myself and all parties who may have an interest herein, that all the foregoing statements and answers and those made to the medical examiner are true and complete, and are offered to the company as a consideration for the contract which I hereby agree to accept; that no other information or answer than is herein contained, whether known to, made by, or given to any person, shall be considered as a part of the contract; that should this policy become a claim during its first year, nothing herein shall prevent the company from introducing any information as evidence of fraud; that the policy granted herefor shall not take effect until issued, delivered, and the premium paid thereon to the company or to an agent holding the premium receipt from the company during my lifetime and while in good health."

One of the applicant's answers is that the premiums were to be paid by the husband, H. T. Williams.

This application, part 2, has rubber stamped on the face of it "Dec. 27, R. E. G.," and on the folded back of it is the same number, "18090," and on the folded face there was indorsed, as "at the office of the company," the following:

"Name, Margaret E. Williams.

"No., 18090.

"Age, 35.

"Amount, $2,000.

" $\frac{1}{2}$  annual premium, \$52.56.

"Policy date, Dec. 28, 1910.

"Beneficiary, estate.

"G. A., J. H. Perry.

"Agent, Gordon Ins. & Inv. Co.

"H. T. Williams."

And on the folded back there is indorsed the following:

"Approved, December 30, 1910.

"For $5,000.00 only.

"Fairly good family history.

"T. Hewson Bradford, Medical Director."

*Approved:

"20 E. A. S. 20

"12/30/10.

$2,000.00.

E. B."

So much for the applications and the writings in and upon the same.

There was put in evidence a 20-year endowment accumulated surplus policy of insurance, signed by the defendant, No. 18090, dated 28th December, 1910, for $2,000, to Margaret E. Williams, the annual premium for which is $101.06, payable semiannually in equal parts.

Pasted within this policy's sheets is a photographic copy of the declarations of Margaret, made to the medical examiner, and the examiner's declarations, before referred to in an application, part 2, for a $5,000 policy.

And on the back of this policy there purports to be a "Copy of Application." No original was proven, but the same is a modified copy of the application for $5,000 insurance, before referred to; for it is a literal copy thereof, save in these particulars, to wit: The original is for $5,000; the copy is for $2,000. The original states nearest birthday to be 34 years; the copy states nearest birthday to be 35 years. The original is for 20-year term plan, premium $40.25; the copy is for 20 end A. S. plan, premium $101.06. The original calls for payment of dividends at the end of each year; the copy calls for payment of dividends at the end of 20 years.

On the top margin of the third page of the policy in pen script is this significant admission, to wit:

"At the request of the insured the premiums hereon are changed to semiannual installments of fifty-two 56/100 dollars each, payable on the 28th day of December and June of each year hereafter during the premium paying period of this policy.

"Philadelphia, Dec. 31, 1910.

"William H. Hubbard, Secretary."

This policy for $2,000 was never put into the hands of Margaret or her husband. Thereabout the defendants' actuary wrote a letter, dated 13th April, 1911, to H. T. Williams, after Mrs. Williams' death, as follows:

"Philadelphia Life Insurance Company, Home Office, North American Building, Philadelphia.

"April 13, 1911.

"Ernest M. Blehl, Actuary,

"Mr. H. T. Williams, Yorkville, S. C.:

"Dear Sir: In re Policy No. 18090—M. E. Williams.

"In reply to your telegram of to-day, I beg to state that your application for a policy on this life was on twenty-year term plan, and same for several reasons would not be approved. We did, however, issue a contract in January, on twenty-year endowment, accumulated surplus plan, and forwarded it to the Gordon Insurance & Investment Company for delivery, but same was returned to this office for cancellation, as not taken.

"If you desire the policy revived on twenty-year endowment, accumulated surplus plan, please advise."

There is no mark of cancellation on the policy. Margaret died in March, 1911, of an operation.

No premium was actually paid to the defendant, though the plaintiff would have made payment had he the opportunity to do so; for payment, the husband relied on that answer in the application which made him the payer of the premiums; and upon his parol contract with the Gordon Company (printed in the application blank as general agent of the defendant), which contract, when performed, constituted the defendant his debtor by way of a bonus to the amount of $125, for writing an aggregate of $50,000 insurance.

Williams & Williams & Stewart and Jones & Jones, all of Lancaster, for appellant.

Wilson & Wilson, of Rock Hill, Stack & Parker, of Monroe, N. C., and C. N. Sapp, of Columbia, for respondents.

GAGE, J. Let the statement of facts appended hereto be reported with the opinion.

The major and decisive issue in the case is one of law, and it is this: Did the testimony tend to prove a contract of life insurance betwixt the parties?

We are of the opinion that the written testimony tended to prove such a contract, and that, therefore, the order of nonsuit ought not to have been ordered, the second nonsuit now granted in this cause. 105 S. C. 305, 89 S. E. 675.

Beyond question a policy for $2,000 was written on the life of Mrs. Williams by the defendant, and was sent from Philadelphia to Monroe, N. C., to the Gordon Insurance & Investment Company (hereinafter called the Gordon Company), described on the application blank as the "general agent" of the defendant, for delivery to Mrs. Williams. So far, therefore, as the defendant company's part in the contract is concerned, it was fully intended to be performed and was performed.

The original policy was before the trial court and before us, and it is uncanceled.

The prime argument of the defendants' counsel at the trial was thus expressed by him:

"Mr. Parker: Your honor, we produce this policy as the policy which was sent to the Gordon Insurance Company. We propose to deny that it is a binding contract."

The major argument at that time and now is that the company is not bound by the policy, because Mrs. Williams was not bound, and that she was not bound because she had never applied for a policy of that character, but for a policy for $5,000 of an essentially different character, and that she never knew of and never assented to the $2,000 policy which the company wrote.

[1] That postulate of law is based on the case of Insurance Co. v. Young, 23 Wall. 105, 23 L. Ed. 152, decided in 1874 and it is, of course, sound if the facts are right.

But in the instant case there is written in pen script, on a margin of the $2,000 policy, by one of its chief officers, the man who signed the policy, that which tends to prove an admission by the company that Mrs. Williams knew of, and assented to, the $2,000 policy. The writing is set out in the statement of facts, but is here repeated. It reads.

"At the request of the insured the premiums hereon are changed to semiannual installments of fifty-two and 50/100 dollars each, payable on the twenty-eighth day of December and June in each year hereafter during the premium paying period of this policy.

"Philadelphia, December 31, 1910.

"Wm. H. Hubbard, Secretary."

Thereby the secretary of the company declared that the insured requested the premiums "hereon"—that is to say, on the instant policy—should be paid semiannually, and the there stated premiums were those chargeable on policies of the character on the instant $2,000 policy, and not those chargeable on the $5,000 policy.

It is irrelevant to inquire how Mrs. Williams got that knowledge, for the defendant declares in writing that she had it. The case does not show that this significant declaration of the company was even called to the trial court's attention. And the letter of the company's actuary to H. T. Williams (set out in the statement of facts) tends to show that the $2,000 policy was forwarded by the company to its general agent at Monroe, N. C., the Gordon Company, for delivery to the insured. The defendant did all it could to make and to deliver a contract of insurance.

[2] There will be no question about the truth of the following postulate, that generally, when an insurance company sends a policy the contents of which is known to and assented to by the insured, to the company's general agent for delivery to the insured, then delivery is effected, and the contract of insurance is of force. The defendant admits so much in the argument. See opinion in the former appeal, cited supra.

The other exceptions become irrelevant, save that which refers to payment of the initial premium. The court did not rule upon that issue, though it was made; but an exception goes to the exclusion of testimony offered by the plaintiff to prove payment, and a sustaining ground goes to an absence of proof of payment to sustain the nonsuit. We shall therefore consider the question of payment to guide the court on the new trial, for the issue must arise there, and the cause has already been tried on the circuit many times.

There is no pretense by the plaintiff that the initial premium was paid in money or its equivalent by the applicant, or by anybody for her in the company's hands, or into the hands of anybody acting for it.

The only contention of the plaintiff is that the defendant company, by and through its general agent, the Gordon Company, agreed by parol with H. T. Williams, the agent of the company, to sell insurance, and the husband of the applicant and by the words of the application constituted the payer of the premiums, that the initial premium should be paid by a bonus to be earned by H. T. Williams as selling agent for the company.

The defendant denies that any such contract was made, and it contends that, if made, the proof of it is cut off by two clauses in the applications, part 1 and part 2, set out in the statement of facts.

Reverting to these clauses, that in part 2 of the application has no relevancy to the present issue; it expressly refers to statements and answers touching the applicant's health and habits.

That clause found in part 1 of the application needs, therefore, only to be considered; it is short, and we repeat it here. It is:

"I hereby agree (1) that all representations and agreements (2) made by or with the company (3) or the agent taking this application (4) are reduced to writing and (5) made a part of this application (6) and the policy issued hereunder."

The numerals are supplied.

[3] Plainly, the agreement of H. T. Williams with the Gordon Company, to which H. T. Williams offered to testify, was not so reduced to writing and made a part of the application. For that reason it is incompetent, and the court was right to exclude it.

Nevertheless, the court ought not to have ordered a nonsuit (1) upon the ground that there is no testimony tending to show that the initial premium had been paid; or (2) upon the ground that there was no testimony tending to prove that the company had waived so much of the contract of insurance as prescribed a prepayment of the initial premium.

The written agreement of the parties, it is true, was that the policy should not take effect until the premium thereon was paid.

[4] But payment may be effected by many mediums; and the parties may forego that part of the contract which prescribes prepayment by a waiver of it.

[5] The policy recites payment of the premium, and it was sent to the general agent for delivery. So much raises the presumption that the premium was paid.

[6] It is true that waiver is defined to be the voluntary relinquishment of a known right; but it often rests in a subtle operation of mind and speech. It may arise by expression, but more often by implication.

[7] If the company, who had a right under the contract, especially a right like the instant one, shall make any speech or perform any act from which a reasonable inference may be drawn that the company does not stand upon its right, then waiver may be inferred.

[8] In the case at bar the letter of the 13th April, 1911, before set out in the statement of facts, was a declaration by the company which has at least a doubtful meaning. It should have been left to a jury to find if the company thereby meant that the delivery therein referred to should depend upon a prepayment of the premium, and if the policy was returned for nonpayment, or because it was declined by the applicant, or for any other reason, and whether the "revival" therein referred to meant the revival of a policy always dead, or one which was once alive, but which afterwards became dormant.

The order of nonsuit is set aside and a new trial is ordered.

GARY, O. J., and HYDRICK and WATTS, JJ., concur.

FRASER, J. I dissent. If it be true that the insured was willing to take a different kind of policy from that originally applied for, had expressed her willingness to do so, and that the general agent had the authority to waive the payment of the initial premium in cash, and to substitute therefor a parol agreement to look to future unearned profits for the payment of the initial premium, still the record shows that the agent of the deceased, who was authorized to make the payment, did not do so, but took for his own use the profits when earned, and thereby failed to carry out the agreement on behalf of the insured.

SPARKS v. McCRAW. (No. 10272.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨1009(1)—FACTS REVIEWABLE IN SUIT BY BANKRUPTCY TRUSTEE TO ESTABLISH TRUST.

In an action by trustee in bankruptcy against bankrupt's former president and general manager to have property purchased with bankrupt's funds impressed with a trust in favor of the creditors of the bankrupt, court, on appeal, will review the facts, the action being in equity, and not an action at law.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨901—BURDEN OF PROOF ON APPELLANT TO SHOW INSUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In equity cases the burden is upon appellant to show that the preponderance of the evidence is against the findings or any particular finding complained of.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨1071(3)—INSUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE TO ESTABLISH IMMATERIAL FINDING, NOT REVERSIBLE ERROR.

In action by trustee in bankruptcy for bankrupt corporation against former president and general manager of corporation to impress a trust upon certain property purchased with corporation's funds, in favor of the creditors of a corporation, insufficiency of evidence to sustain finding that former president declared in a statement that, if he ever went into bankruptcy, his creditors would get nothing, is immaterial, such finding not affecting the result.

4. TRUSTS ⇨84—WHEN PROPERTY PURCHASED BY PRESIDENT IN TRUST FOR CREDITORS.

Where president and general manager of corporation purchased property in own name with corporation's funds, property will be impressed with a trust in favor of creditors of the corporation.

5. TRUSTS ⇨873—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE TO IMPRESS TRUST ON PROPERTY BOUGHT WITH CORPORATION'S FUNDS.

In action to impress trust upon property purchased by former president and general manager of bankrupt corporation with corporation's funds, in favor of creditors of corporation, it was unnecessary, in finding that the former president had purchased property with funds of corporation, to specify amount for which he was to account, since, having appropriated corporation's funds it was his duty to specify.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Cherokee County; T. J. Mauldin, Judge.

Action by J. R. Sparks, as trustee for Bonner McCraw Company, bankrupt, against A. B. McCraw. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Following are the findings of fact and conclusions of court referred to in opinion:

"This is an action by J. R. Sparks, as trustee of the Bonner McCraw Company, bankrupts, against the defendant, A. Bonner McCraw, to recover from him certain real estate described in the complaint, and to require him to turn over the same, or the proceeds thereof, and all moneys, notes, mortgages, and other evidence of the amount of money or property of the bankrupt in the possession of, or under the control of, the defendant.

"The contention of the plaintiff, briefly stated, is that the defendant, as the president and general manager of the Bonner McCraw Company, bankrupt, a corporation, used and converted the money and property of the corporation for the purpose of acquiring property in his own name, and, at the expense of the corporation and its creditors, to promote his individual interests.

"The defendant by his answer denies generally all allegations of the complaint material to plaintiff's cause of action, and further avers that the corporation was indebted to him in the sum of $1,300 or more, and that, if the court should find anything to be due him to the corporation, the sum above stated should be set off against the same.

"All issues were referred by this court to G. W. Speer, Esq., as special referee to take the testimony and report his findings of fact and conclusions of law to this court, with leave to report any special matter. Several references were held, at which a great volume of testimony, oral and documentary, was submitted, including evidence taken before the referee in bankruptcy, so far as the same should be relevant to the issues made in this case.

"On October 12, 1917, the referee filed his report, in which he found from the evidence that the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint are sustained, and recommended that the title to the property sought to be recovered be adjudged to be in the trustee, the plaintiff, with such other recommendations as are designed to carry into effect the decree of the court.

"To this report the defendant filed exceptions, and the cause came on to be heard by me as presiding judge of the court of common pleas for Cherokee county, during the spring term of the court. The cause was submitted to me then, and arguments made by counsel for the plaintiff and defendant. The cause was marked 'Heard' by me, and taken under advisement until such time as I might give the matter careful consideration.

"The evidence in the cause is abundant to support the findings and conclusions of the referee.

"The defendant was the president and manager of the bankrupt corporation; he and his wife were the sole stockholders. They had no other property when the business was organized, and all the property acquired by the defendant individually has been acquired through the use of the corporate property. As early as 1912, the first year of the business, the defendant used $1,000 of the corporate funds, with which he purchased the house and lot now occupied by his family, and paid the remaining $1,000 of the purchase money by giving a mortgage on the premises to a local building and loan association. This debt to the B. & L. was repaid by checks of the corporation down to whatever amount may remain due. No meeting of the stockholders was ever held, and no attempt was made to declare a dividend out of the profits of the business, if there were any, but the money was used as if it were the private property of the defendant, and no means were adopted to separate the funds from the corporate ownership.

"Later on the defendant, by use of the corporate funds, commenced to acquire in his own name other real estate, described in the complaint, and made improvements thereon out of the funds of the corporation in the nature of dwellings thereon, while part of the funds so used were withdrawn directly from the corporation by checks in many instances, in others the indebtedness of the defendant individually to the contractors and materialmen were discharged by crediting their accounts on the books of the corporation with the amounts due them by the defendant personally. The defendant claims that he has paid back into the corporation more money than he withdrew, but this claim is not found to be true by the referee; but from the very nature of the defendant's course of dealing with the corporate funds and property the funds redeposited by him belonged to the corporation, and could not be regarded as the discharge of any personal obligations of the defendant. He could not pay his own debt to the corporation with money belonging to the corporation. However, the results do not lend support to the contention of defendant.

In 1915 and 1916, while he was acquiring this property, the creditors began to suffer, as shown by the list of claims filed against the bankrupt corporation. When the petition in bankruptcy was filed on May 25, 1917, the corporation admittedly owed some $10,000 or $12,000, with assets as scheduled amounting to $7,400, which included notes and open accounts to the amount of $2,900, leaving $4,500 as stock in trade and merchandise. The amount of claims actually filed with the referee in bankruptcy exceeded the amount scheduled by a considerable sum, and the actual value of the assets much less.

"The defendant, as manager of the corporation, was not able to account for the loss to creditors, nor was he able to give a satisfactory account of the conduct of the business or of its assets. In a statement made by the defendant to one of the creditors on February 23, 1917, he represented that the corporation was solvent, with net assets amounting to $6,950, which, as shown by the evidence, was absolutely untrue, as the business was then insolvent. His conduct in converting property of the Gaffney Live Stock Company, a creditor, shows the utter disregard had by the defendant for the rights of creditors of the corporation. Testimony was introduced to show that the defendant admitted to creditors that he was using the corporation's money to build houses on lots purchased by him in his own name, and that when he sold these lots he would pay the creditors their accounts. There is testimony also to show that the defendant, in a statement made to or in the presence of one Allison, declared that if he ever went into bankruptcy his creditors would get nothing.

"In a statement made by the defendant, as manager and president of the bankrupt corporation, to the federal income tax officials for 1916, he represented that the business had on hand, January 1, 1916, stock of the value of $6,784, to which he added purchases during the year to the amount of $17,510; that he sold during the year goods to the amount of $18,190, and had left a stock of goods of the value of $6,304; and that his total indebtedness was the sum of $2,065. This, as proven by subsequent investigation before the referee, was untrue.

"No rational account is given of the proceeds of the $18,190 realized from the sale of goods. The net results of the business is an unexplained loss to creditors of some $10,000, while the defendant has acquired property in his own name to the extent of several thousand dollars, which plaintiff seeks to recover.

"It was the duty of the defendant, as manager and president of the bankrupt corporation, to show that he exercised the utmost good faith in his transactions and dealings with corporate funds and property, and especially is this rule applicable when it is shown that the manager has acquired property to his own advantage, while the corporation and its creditors have suffered loss. This the defendant has failed to do.

"The facts and circumstances related above, along with other evidence in the case, leads to the same conclusion as arrived at by the referee.

"It was contended in argument that the loss shown in assets and the volume of debts ascertained was largely due to the liberality of the defendant in extending credit to his friends. The schedule as filed by the defendant for the bankrupt does not sustain this contention. The open accounts, as scheduled by the defendant, amount to only $2,800, which is a relatively small credit business from sales of $18,190 during the year, and falls far short of explaining the deficiency of some $10,000 over and above the total amount of assets. It is also shown by the testimony that the defendant has used the rents from portions of the property described in the complaint for the personal use of himself and family; that he has traded one or more of these lots to other parties, who have no deeds, but who have made payments from time to time thereon; and the defendant admitted that he had no account of such statements, and that if the purchasers could not produce receipts showing payments made by them they would have to pay again.

"It is clear from the evidence as a whole that the defendant has used the corporation, its funds and property, as a means to gain an advantage to himself personally.

"It is therefore adjudged and decreed that the report of the referee herein be, and the same is hereby, affirmed and made a part of the judgment and decree of the court, and the exceptions thereto be overruled.

"Further decreed that the defendant turn over and deliver to the plaintiff herein, as trustee, all deeds and conveyances to the property described herein in his possession or under his control, and all mortgages held by him for the purchase money or any part thereof, and all other evidences of indebtedness held or controlled by him or affecting the property involved, the title to which is hereby adjudged to be in the plaintiff as trustee; that the trustee take charge of the said property and sell the same where not affected by the rights of purchasers or any equity of the defendant therein; that the defendant be, and he is hereby, enjoined perpetually from collecting any money or moneys as rent or purchase money from any of the property herein or purchasers thereof; that he do account to the plaintiff for all such sums of money heretofore received by him as rent or purchase money.

"Further decreed that the plaintiff, as trustee herein, shall take such steps to secure the property herein or its proceeds as he may be advised, protecting fully the rights of all persons who may have acquired any of the property as innocent purchasers, or who, as creditors without notice, may hold valid liens thereon.

"Further decreed that any sale or sales made hereunder by the trustee shall be for cash, after three weeks' notice published in one or more of the newspapers published in Gaffney, and that he make to the purchasers thereof deeds of conveyance thereto.

"Further decreed that the plaintiff may apply at the foot of this decree for such other or further relief as he may be advised to carry into effect the terms of this decree and its purposes."

Cornelius Otts, of Spartanburg, for appellant.

Dobson & Vassy and Butler & Hall, all of Gaffney, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. This action was brought by the trustee in bankruptcy of Bonner McCraw Company against A. Bonner McCraw, the former president and treasurer of the corporation and general manager of its business, to have certain property, which he purchased with funds of the corporation and took titles thereto in his own name, impressed with a trust in favor of the creditors of the insolvent corporation.

[1] It is not an action at law to recover the property so purchased, but an action in equity to subject it to a trust, and therefore we do not agree with respondent's contention that the facts are not reviewable.

[2] In equity cases the burden is upon appellant to show that the preponderance of the evidence is against the findings, or any particular finding, complained of. In this case appellant has not convinced us of error of any finding complained of except one. In stating the evidence and its tendencies, the court said:

"There is testimony also to show that the defendant, in a statement made to or in the presence of one Allison, declared that, if he ever went into bankruptcy, his creditors would get nothing."

[3] There is no testimony in the record before us to sustain that finding, but it is wholly immaterial; for, even if defendant made no such statement, it would not affect the result. But it appears that there was a great deal of testimony before the circuit court, which it was deemed unnecessary to set out in the record for appeal and it is possible that there was, in the record before that court, testimony to support that finding.

[4] The evidence abundantly sustains all the material findings of the court, and the conclusions therefrom are correct. Palmetto Lumber Co. v. Risley, 25 S. C. 309.

[5] Appellant complains that, having found that he had used the funds of the corporation to buy property, the titles to which he took in his own name, the amount for which he was to account should have been specified. This shows a misconception of the action. Defendant was a trustee, and as such he was called upon to account for the assets of the corporation, which he had appropriated to his individual use. It was therefore his duty to specify. If he kept the books and transacted the business of the corporation in such a way that it was impossible for him to show exactly how much of the funds of the corporation went into the property sought to be impressed with a trust, it is his own fault. But the evidence shows that when he went into business he had comparatively nothing, and that his private estate increased commensurately with the debts of the corporation. We find no error of substance in the decree.

Judgment affirmed.

STURGIS v. CITY OF ROCK HILL (four cases). (No. 10271.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 25 1919.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — 845(4) — EVIDENCE INSUFFICIENT TO SHOW POLLUTION OF WATER COURSE.

Evidence in action for damages held to sustain finding that there was no additional pollution by defendant city's sewerage purification plant of the stream flowing through plaintiff's lands.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — 845(4) — WHEN PURIFICATION PLANT DECREASED NOXIOUS ODORS FROM STREAM.

Evidence in action for damages held to show that defendant city's sewerage purification plant, by purification of a stream nearer plaintiff's land than the plant, decreased, rather than increased, foul smells and noxious odors.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of York County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

Separate actions by E. W. Sturgis, by W. T. Sturgis, by B. M. Sturgis, and by W. V. Sturgis against the City of Rock Hill. Judgments for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

The report of Special Referee John R. Hart is as follows:

"All of the above actions are similar in their natures. The respective plaintiffs ask damages against the city of Rock Hill, alleging that by reason of the city emptying its sewage at a point just above the lands of plaintiffs, and into a stream which flows through the lands of plaintiffs, the said stream has been polluted and made unfit for use; and that by reason of the construction and maintenance by the city of Rock Hill of a disposal plant near the lands of the plaintiffs, which disposal plant gives off such foul and noxious odors, that it has rendered the homes of the plaintiffs undesirable and unfit to live in, with consequent damages to the respective plaintiffs and in the sums as respectively set out in the complaints.

"The defendant, the city of Rock Hill, answers with a general denial, and pleads, further, that whatever compensation plaintiffs may be entitled to may only be awarded to plaintiffs by a board of arbitrators, pursuant to the terms of the statute, and therefore denies the jurisdiction of this court.

"By consent the issues of law and fact were referred to me as a special referee.

"As I understand the law as laid down in Parish v. Town of Yorkville, 106 S. C. 23, 90 S. E. 185, the only question that is before me, and the only question for me to decide, is, Have the plaintiffs shown damage to themselves at the hands of the defendant? I have nothing to do with the quantum of the damages, and it is with this view of the law that I frame my report.

"As previously stated, the plaintiffs contend that they are damaged from two sources—namely, pollution of the stream, and the creation of foul and noxious odors rendering their homes uninhabitable.

"To reach a decision on these two questions of fact has caused me much trouble and considerable time. The class of testimony offered has been unusually high. Both plaintiffs and defendant have presented witnesses whose integrity and veracity could not be impeached, yet whose testimony is in apparent conflict, the one with the other.

"Taking up first the question of the pollution of the stream: The plaintiff B. M. Sturgis, in response to the question as to how this stream was affected by the erection of this septic tank, answered that in one way it was affected by the odors arising therefrom. He also states that he had never used this land for a pasture. He also stated that the Carhartts were putting dyestuff into the branch prior to the erection of the septic tank. This last fact seems to have been established beyond question by other testimony to which I will allude later. The witness did state that the sediment found in the stream was not so thick prior to the installation of the septic tank.

"Mr. W. V. Sturgis, another plaintiff, stated that he did not use the water from the stream, but that a colored man on the place used it.

"Another plaintiff, Mr. F. W. Sturgis, states that he had the branch wired off, as he did not care to let the cattle drink from it, and that the odor from the branch was very offensive. He also stated that the presence of the tank so affected the water that his cattle would not drink it; and, further, in his testimony he states that this branch has been a foul one for about 25 years, and ever since Winthrop College sewage and the dyestuff was emptied into it, but that he could see no sewage matter in the stream.

"I have thus stated the testimony of the plaintiffs fully for the reason that this covers practically all of the testimony for the plaintiffs touching upon the foulness or pollution of the stream.

"As against this testimony the defendant offered many witnesses. The testimony of the witnesses Barnwell, Dr. Fennell, and Ludlow—these three witnesses qualified as experts, and the substance of their testimony was to the effect that the installation of the septic tank bettered the condition of the stream below it. Without reviewing the testimony of the witnesses by name, it was shown that an area comprising from one-fourth to one-third of the city of Rock Hill was drained into this branch. Three cotton mills are within its drainage area, and many of these mills still maintain open closets, and one emptied its dye water into the stream prior to the installation of the sewerage system. The testimony is too lengthy to review it in detail, but from all the testimony I am convinced that the stream has not been polluted by the erection of the septic tank, but, on the contrary, if there has been any change in its condition it has been for the better.

"I, therefore, find as a matter of fact that the stream has not been polluted by reason of the city erecting and using this septic tank.

"The next question, that of odors, is more difficult. Many witnesses, who were absolutely reliable, testified that there are pronounced odors arising from the septic tank and branch. Others equally as reliable testified to the contrary. The city went into the defenses fully and presented very strong testimony. The testimony of Messrs. Barnwell and Ludlow both convince me that the city has spared no expense, and has used all modern and scientific methods to purify its sewage, and that the septic tank in controversy is of the most modern design, and is properly constructed and operated. From the testimony of Mr. Barnwell it will be seen that for a time the tank was not properly operated, and during this time, particularly, the odors were extremely offensive; but, owing to a correction of the volume of sewage handled through this tank, this defect was overcome. Witnesses visited the tank for the special purpose of ascertaining if there were odors, and practically all of these witnesses testified that there was no odor other than that arising from the use of dyestuff and dye water, which was emptied into the septic tank. The testimony of Mr. Ludlow indicates the chemical action taking place in the tank is designed to purify the sewage, and would have no effect upon the odor in dye water, nor would it rob it of its color.

"On the other hand, witnesses of equal integrity, including the plaintiffs, testified that the odors arising from the tank were offensive in the extreme. The testimony of the witnesses of plaintiffs and defendant can only be reconciled by the assumption that at times there are odors and offensive odors, while at other times there are no odors. This might or might not be due to the condition of the tank, the manner of its operation, or the state of the temperature. In fact, some of the witnesses testified that the odors were more offensive during the morning and night. It will be idle to attempt to review the testimony witness by witness, in more than 100 pages of testimony taken in the reference. I am convinced from the testimony, and so find, that there are foul and noxious odors arising from the septic tank owned and maintained by the defendant, and these odors are of such an extreme nature as to pollute and contaminate the air in and around the premises of the plaintiffs, and interfere with their proper enjoyment and use of their homes and lands, and that the lands of the plaintiffs are thereby reduced in value to plaintiffs' damage, and I so find and recommend.

"As to the law of the case, I think it has been settled by the suit of Parish v. Town of Yorkville, reported in 96 S. C. at page 24, 79 S. E. 635, L. R. A. 1915A, 282. This case held that, when the right to institute condemnation proceedings is contested, 'the proper remedy is to bring an action in the court of common pleas in order that the court may, in the exercise of its chancery powers, determine such right.' See, also, Railway v. Riddlehuber, 38 S. C. 308, 17 S. E. 24, and other cases cited in the Parish Case.

"This being the law, the referee is limited in his findings merely as to the question of whether or not the plaintiffs are entitled to any damages, but is without authority to find or even suggest the quantum. I have previously stated that I do not think the plaintiffs are entitled to any damages for the pollution of the stream, but am of the opinion that they are entitled to damages by reason of the odors created by the defendant's septic tank.

"The referee also takes this occasion to commend counsel for both plaintiffs and defendant for the thorough manner in which they developed the testimony in the case, and for the assistance given to the referee."

Dunlap & Dunlap and J. Harry Foster, all of Rock Hill, and Thomas F. McDow, of York, for appellants.

Spencer, Spencer & White, of Rock Hill, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. The following statement appears in the record:

"These four suits involve the same issues, and were heard together. These suits were commenced May 21, 1917. The plaintiffs bring suit to recover compensation against city of Rock Hill, S. C., for alleged polluting of Watson's branch, a small stream heading in the city, and running through the lands of the plaintiffs; and compensation is also demanded by reason of alleged foul odors being emitted from a septic tank, or the sewerage system installed by the city just near Watson's branch. It is alleged that these foul odors make undesirable the homes of the plaintiffs, and also damage the value of their lands.

"By consent the issue as to whether the plaintiffs were entitled to compensation was referred to Hon. John R. Hart, as a special referee. A reference was begun in January, 1918, and by divers continuances concluded some time in May, 1918. The referee found that the stream was not polluted from the operation of the sewerage system, but found that the plaintiffs were entitled to compensation by reason of the foul odors emitted from this septic tank, or the sewerage system.

"Exceptions were taken by each side to the report of the referee, and the matter came on for trial before his honor, Judge R. W. Memminger, at the December, 1918, term of court for York county, and the court affirmed the finding of the referee that there was no additional pollution of the stream, and reversed the referee in his finding that the plaintiffs were entitled to compensation on account of odors, and dismissed the complaints. In due time a notice of intention to appeal was served in each of the four cases."

The referee's report will be incorporated. B. M. Sturgis testified as follows:

"I am one of the plaintiffs. I own 84 acres of land near this septic tank, through which a creek passes running from it. One way the stream is affected by this tank is by the odor. My house is 210 yards from this branch, and about 1,500 yards from the septic tank. * * * This stream also receives the dyestuff. I know that the dyestuff comes down along with the effluent from the tank. I do not know whether the odor comes from the tank or from the dye. I could not tell whether it is sewage or not. The stream rises back of Neely's stable, in Rock Hill. The septic tank has been there about six or seven years. I did not make the complaint until this year.

"Q. Do you claim that the condition of the tank affects the farming of your land? A. So far as the crops are concerned the septic tank does not affect them, but it is very unpleasant to live there. The stream is used by Winthrop College. It has been used since 1894 for putting dyestuff from the mills and other matter. I can't tell exactly how many years. The Winthrop College tank was about the same place where the city tank is now located. My property is not the nearest to the septic tank. This stream is not the only one that runs through my plantation. * * * There is another stream that runs into Watson's branch right at the tank."

W. S. Sturgis, another plaintiff, testified:

"I own about 135 acres. The stream runs through my place about 500 or 600 yards. My home is about 600 or 800 yards from this branch, and between 1,200 and 1,500 yards from the septic tank.

"Q. Is there anything in the conditions around your place to affect your crops? A. I cannot say that it affects my crops.

"Q. Do you think it would affect the value of your land any? A. I cannot say as to its affecting its value."

E. W. Sturgis, another plaintiff, testified:

"The effluent from the old Winthrop College sewage settled on my sand beds. The dye water came down the branch also, but there was not as much there.

"Q. Has this branch always been a fouled one? A. For about 25 years. Since Winthrop College sewage has been put in there. The matter that comes out of the tank is liquid, and you cannot see any sewage in it. So far as farming is concerned, the tank has not affected my place, but it is undesirable because of the bad odor."

N. C. Walker testified:

"I live in Rock Hill, and am an architect and engineer, and was living here when the sewerage plant was installed. I worked with Mr. Cothran on his preliminary plans of the system. Mr. Cothran was the engineer employed by the public service commission, and Herring and Gregory at that time were supposed to be about the best consulting sanitary engineers in the country, and they were employed by the commission, at Mr. Cothran's request, to act as consulting engineers. Mr. Cothran and I first made a survey, in which we went over the territory, and after making the topographical maps we decided on the approximate location of the disposal plant, and later on ran the actual survey following the natural drainage of the disposal plant site. I understand Exhibit B, the maps made by Mr. Miller, showing several branches that form Watson's branch, and the location of the business houses along Main street, the stables and other houses along the branches, and the mills and industrial enterprises. I also understand that portion of Rock Hill, as indicated on the map, which drains itself into the branch. * * * It is my opinion that one-third of the inhabitants of Rock Hill live within the area which drains into Watson's branch. This section includes a whole group of tenant negro houses, several mill villages, besides one of the best residential sections. One wing of the branch runs back to Neely's livery stable, on Black street, and another runs from Winthrop College and the Wymojo Mill. There are four branches which join and go right into the septic tank. I was familiar with all the branches before the installation of the plant, as I surveyed along all of them. We followed one wing from Black street through the Arcade Mill to the conflux. At that time it was one of the worst branches I ever saw. It passed through the negro settlement. The washerwomen all emptied their washing water into the branch, and all the back yards and surface closet washings went right into this branch. The arm of the branch from the Carhartt Mill, after passing through the mill village, goes through the old fertilizer yard, then right under the old laundry, then under Main street and through a negro settlement, as filthy a section as I ever saw. We had to be careful to keep our tape line from touching the water, as it was filthy. The Carhatt and Victoria Mills were putting their dye water and the Arcade its sizing water into the branches."

J. G. Barnwell testified:

"I am employed as city manager of Rock Hill, S. C. I came to Rock Hill in 1912. The Imhoff System was installed and completed three months after I came to Rock Hill. I have had charge ever since it was installed and turned over to me. I have been in charge as engineer of sewerage and water plants for the last 12 or 15 years here, in York, and in Columbia. The Imhoff tanks were installed at Rock Hill with Mr. Cothran as engineer for the commission, and with Herring & Gregory, sanitary experts and engineers of repute. I heard Mr. Miller testify this morning, and, while I have never attempted to take a census of the area around by Watson's branch, the housing facilities of that locality are near together, and the population dense, and I would say that area includes probably one-third of the population of Rock Hill. I have personally followed both prongs of Watson's branch, which join about the Arcade plant, the entire way to their sources. One prong of Watson's branch begins about the Carhartt Mills, passing between the laundry and Pepsi-Cola building, and goes across Black street, and on through the Victoria Mill village, and on to the Arcade Cotton Mill, where it joins the other prong that heads up at Winthrop. Another prong made in the very heart of Rock Hill. All the street washings from the pavements, horse droppings, and any surface draining that does not go into the sanitary system, goes into the branch from that wing. The Hamilton, Carhartt, Victoria, Arcade, and Wymojo Cotton Mills, the Rock Hill Buggy Company, a dense negro settlement included, I should say 50 per cent. of all of them are situated within the area which drains itself into Watson's branch.

"Q. Will you just explain to the court where about this Imhoff tank is and the character of the treatment of the sewage in this system? A. Dr. Carl Imhoff, of Germany, was the inventor of this tank, and Herring & Gregory obtained the patent rights in this country. Describing the tank as we have it here, it consists of a unit composed of two basins, each basin being divided into two compartments. These compartments are one above the other, and are known as a two-story tank. The upper compartment is known as the settling chamber; the lower compartment as the sludge-digesting chamber. The Imhoff tank is only a part of the purification works at the Arcade disposal plant, and this tank is further supplemented by sludge-drying beds, an automatic flush tank, and a sprinkler filter. Raw sewage enters first the settling compartments of the Imhoff tank. These tanks perform their function, and the liquids pass from the tank to the flush tank; from the flush tank they are conveyed by means of cast-iron lines to the spray nozzles, located on the sprinkler filter. The sewage is sprayed into the air from these nozzles and falls on the crushed stone filter. Through this filter the liquids percolate and are collected on the bottom in troughs and laterals, which collect the liquids, and convey them to the Watson branch, where they are finally disposed of into the stream. The treatment of the raw sewage at these works is as follows: Raw sewage enters the settlement compartments, which, as described, are located above the sludge-digesting chamber. The solids are settled out in this chamber, and fall through a longitudinal opening at the bottom of this chamber into the sludge-digesting chamber. The liquid passes out of this settling chamber and is collected into a 3,000-gallon automatic flush tank. When this tank is full it empties its contents through a spray nozzle system into the sprinkler filter. The process of purification at this point is the creation of the liquid which replenishes its lost oxygen. This replacement of oxygen is accomplished in two ways: First, the spraying of the liquid into the air; and, second, the air collected as it percolates through the well-ventilated crushed stone filters. The organic matter in the sewage is further attacked in the sprinkler by means of the aerobic bacteria, which live and are fed by the organic matter in the sewage. Two agencies are constantly at work at this point purifying the sewage—aerobic bacteria and oxygen. As previously described, the solids are settled out into the sludge-digesting chamber. The action taking place in this chamber on the organic solids settled therein is continuous. This destructive action is brought about by the presence of millions of purifying or anaerobic bacteria. These bacteria attack the solids settled therein and reduce it to a stage of complete decomposition. When the proper amount of decomposition has set in, or the sludge is 'ripe,' valves are opened, and the ripe sludge is allowed to pour out on the two sludge-drying beds. The sludge is allowed to stand on this bed until it is dry, and is then loaded with a shovel and spade, and carried with a wheelbarrow and deposited on the soil. The biological action on this organic matter has been so complete in the sludge-digesting chamber as to destroy even the fertilizer value of the organic matter, and it seems turned back to dust. The underlying principle of the treatment of raw sewage and organic matter present might be explained in the phrase, 'Dust we are, and to dust returneth.' The basic principle of the treatment is to accomplish this purpose."

J. L. Ludlow testified:

"I live at Winston-Salem, N. C., and am a civil and sanitary engineer. I am the engineer member of the board of health of North Carolina, and I am at present supervising engineer of construction for the government at Camp Greene, Charlotte. I have had quite a lot of experience in sewerage and sanitary work in South Carolina. I designed and built the sewerage system for Columbia, Union, Laurens, and Spartanburg, and designed the sewerage system for Charleston. I am familiar with the several maps testified about by Mr. Miller and placed in evidence, and I am familiar with, and have inspected, the Imhoff tank, concerning which these suits have been brought. I have seen the branch into which the effluent flows. That branch would be foul by nature on account of its origin and sources in the confines of the town. Q. Mr. Ludlow, you made a careful inspection and physical examination of the plant and saw it operating. Will you state what sort of plant it is, and whether it is functioning properly? A. I found the plant to be in very good condition, functioning very well, indeed, and performing as well as could be expected by most any plant. I have inspected a large number of other plants at other places. I think there would be no question but that the sewage collected and treated as it is at one point and discharged into the stream puts the stream below in better condition than it would be in the absence of the system and sewage treatment. I express this opinion with the assistance of the maps with reference to the natural drainage, and also from my observation of the surroundings and visit to the plant, and my knowledge of the improved condition that always follows the collection of sewage filth in any community, and the proper treatment at one point. The smells at this plant are very slight. Could hardly detect them at all. Had to go right down close to the tank and close to the place where the sprinklers operate, and near where the effluent enters the branch, to get any odor. Odors such as were there today would not go under any condition for a distance of 50 or 100 feet. I should not think they could possibly go over 200 yards. Untreated sewage proceeds a long way. The odors from a polluted, foul branch would travel farther, for the reason that decomposition taking place in a branch filling the air, while decomposition in Imhoff tank is buried under a mass of liquid, and is sealed away from the air. Where allowed to accumulate, as is usually the case, any ordinary rain would wash a considerable amount of organic matter down into the branch. I think the offensive odors from the dyestuff would be reduced to a slight extent by putting it through the tank. The odors from dyestuffs do not make any one sick, and are not deleterious to health, and do not cause disease. The records show that people working on big sewers of Paris are about the healthiest group of citizens of the city."

[1] It is only necessary to refer to the foregoing testimony to show that the exceptions assigning error on the part of his honor, the circuit judge, in his findings of fact that the plaintiff was not entitled to damages for the alleged pollution of the stream, cannot be sustained.

[2] We proceed to the consideration of the second question, to wit, Was there error on the part of his honor, the circuit judge, in his findings of fact that the plaintiff is not entitled to damages on account of the foul smells and noxious odors arising from the installation of the defendant's sewerage system?

The lands of the plaintiff do not adjoin the lands upon which the septic tank is located. His residence is about 1,500 yards from the septic tank, but is much nearer Watson's branch, which runs through his lands. The testimony shows that said stream was very foul for many years prior to the installation of the septic tank. The foulness of the stream had the natural effect of generating odors and poisoning the atmosphere. The only reasonable inference from the testimony is that the purification of the stream necessarily had the effect of making the atmosphere more wholesome and the odors less noxious.

The exceptions raising this question are also overruled.

Affirmed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

Action by Susan McFaddin against Charlie Lumpkin and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and certain defendants appeal. Reversed.

The will of Emanuel Holman was dated May 1, 1905, he died December 4, 1908, and the will was admitted to probate December 19, 1908. His deed to Mary Holman was executed and delivered January 7, 1907; and by it lands were conveyed to the use of Mary Holman, in trust nevertheless—

"to sell and convey to such person or persons, in whole or in such parcels, at such time or times, as she may be directed to do by the said grantor, free of all trusts, and upon the death of the said Melissa, before the death of the said Emanuel, the said Mary is to convey the same or the remainder thereof not previously conveyed, in fee simple, to the said Manuel, and upon the death of the said Manuel before such conveyance or before the death of his wife, Melissa, to convey the same to such person or persons as she may be directed to do by the will of the said Manuel Holman, and in default of such appointment, then the said Mary Holman shall become the owner in fee."

D. C. Ray and A. W. Ray, both of Columbia, for appellants.

Green & Green, H. F. Jennings, De Pass & De Pass, Alfred Wallace, Jr., and James H. Hammond, all of Columbia, for respondents.

WATTS, J. This action was heard by his honor, Judge Memminger, at the spring term of court, 1916, for Richland county, who filed his decree, from which appeal is taken. The action purports to be brought to marshal assets, adjust equities among the parties claiming portions of the land of Emanuel Holman, and to apply to the debts and expenses of this suit and of the estate the lands undisposed of, except in the residuary clause of the will, to the exoneration, as far as possible, of the specific devise under the will, and to set apart the remaining portions of the land devised to the respective devisees.

[1] The points made by the appeal are, first, what standing the infant defendants have in the court; the guardian ad litem not having excepted to the master's report. This is a matter of discretion with the court. It is the duty of the court to guard the rights of infants, whether exceptions have been filed to the master's report or not within the time fixed. The court can allow exceptions filed at any time, before or at hearing, by an infant. Mr. Justice Hydrick, in Barfield v. Barnes, 108 S. C. 12, 93 S. E. 428, says:

"However, the duty and responsibility of safeguarding the rights of infants rests primarily upon the judges of the circuit court."

It is their duty to safeguard an infant's rights in any case that comes before them, and to see to it that the interest of the infant is fully looked after, protected, and safeguarded.

[2] The next point made by the exceptions is second, that the deed to Mary Holman conveyed to her in her own right a vested remainder in such lands as should be left after such conveyances as were made by direction of Emanuel, defeasible only by execution of a new will by Emanuel Holman, directing her to convey the property to some one else, and that, not having done so, Mary becomes the owner in fee simple upon the death of Emanuel. An inspection of the deed shows that it does not refer at all to any existing will. The deed from Emanuel to Mary shows, first, Mary to sell and convey to such person as she may be directed to do by Emanuel; second, upon the death of Melissa before Emanuel, Mary to convey to Emanuel; third, upon the death of Emanuel before conveyance to him, or upon the death of Emanuel before Melissa; fourth, Mary to convey the land to such person as she may be directed to do by the will of Emanuel; fifth, in default of such appointment, then Mary to have the fee.

[3] A deed is a revocation of a will previously made pro tanto, unless provision is made to the contrary in the deed. There is nothing in the deed to show that the will previously made is to remain in force. No reference is made to it in the deed. Provision in the deed necessarily refers, not to an antecedent will, but to a will to be made in the future. The deed contemplated a future direction. The existing will was in the past, and direction, if any, was in the past. The deed contemplated and provided for a future direction, and there was no direction by the grantor after the execution of the deed by him, and these exceptions must be sustained.

This ruling carries with it the next exception, as to whether or not the plaintiffs' attorneys are entitled to a fee to be paid out of the lands involved here. They are not, and these exceptions are sustained.

[4] The next question is the contention that Susan McFaddin was not entitled to be paid $50, or any sum whatever, for the funeral expenses of Emanuel Holman. His honor, with the facts before him, found that she was, and we are not disposed to interfere with his finding, and this exception is overruled.

Judgment reversed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Kershaw County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

Action by Henry C. Barnes and others against Mary Leevy and others. From an order sustaining demurrers to complaint, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

David E. Anthony, of Washington, D. C., and J. Fraser Lyon, of Columbia, for appellants.

Kirkland & Kirkland, of Camden, Nelson & Gettys, of Columbia, and L. A. Wittkowsky, of Camden, for respondents.

FRASER, J. George Stafford dies leaving his will, wherein he devised a tract of land to his daughter, Sarah Cook, for life, with remainder to his granddaughter, Sarah Cook, for life, with remainder over "to the children of my said granddaughter who may be living at the time of her decease, to them and their heirs forever." The granddaughter, Sarah Cook, married George W. Barnes. Mr. and Mrs. Barnes, seeking to increase their income from this land, applied to the court for permission to mortgage this land in the sum of $3,000. To this proceeding the children then in being were made parties. Permission was given, the mortgage was made, and, as might have been expected, was not paid. An action was brought to foreclose the mortgage, to which only Mr. and Mrs. Barnes were made parties. It seems that the court refused to decree foreclosure unless the children then living who were minors were made parties defendant. The complaint alleges that they were not served with the summons and were not made parties. The land was sold, and is now claimed by the defendants. Mrs. Sarah Barnes is still alive.

This action is brought by the plaintiffs as contingent remaindermen for damages for waste and to enjoin future waste.

The defendants demurred to the complaint, and the demurrer was sustained upon three grounds: They will be considered in their order.

I. "Contingent remaindermen are not entitled to any action for waste, damages, nor injunction. See Pearson v. Yongue, 25 S. C. 162."

Pearson v. Yongue does not sustain the finding, for at page 167 of 25 S. C. we find:

"It may be said that unless these plaintiffs are entitled to an action, that here is a case, especially as to the commission of waste by the defendant, of a wrong without a remedy. We think not. It is not for this court to suggest proper proceedings in any case, but we may venture to say that there is a remedy within reach, wherein all questions raised here could be brought within the jurisdiction of the court, and its full judgment invoked and obtained."

Pearson v. Yongue was an action to establish the rights of contingent remaindermen and for damages for waste. This action includes an injunction to stay waste, and is not within the case of Pearson v. Yongue.

[1] The case of Carson v. Kennerly, 8 Rich. Eq. 259, shows that this holding cannot be sustained.

II. "This proceeding is a collateral attack upon a judgment of this court, which is not permissible. Kaylor v. Hiller, 77 S. C. 393, [58 S. E. 2]; Rice v. Bamberg, 59 S. C. 498 [38 S. E. 209]."

[2] This is a demurrer, and admits the facts set forth in the complaint. Even if the complaint, as set forth in the record, be held to allege that the judgment roll shows affirmatively that the plaintiffs were not served, yet that statement is a conclusion of fact. The judgment roll was made a part of the complaint, and the judgment is not in the record.

[3] We must therefore assume, unless the contrary appears in the record, that the facts set forth in the judgment roll do not show affirmatively that the plaintiffs were not served.

[4] If the judgment roll does not show affirmatively that the plaintiffs were not served, then this action is a collateral attack.

In Love v. Domain, 91 S. C., 389, 74 S. E. 830, we find:

"The recent case of New York Life Insurance Company v. Mobley, 90 S. C. 532 [73 S. E. 1032], is full authority for the position that judgment of the circuit court can only be attacked in a direct proceeding issued for that purpose when the jurisdictional defect does not appear upon the face thereof."

[5] When the jurisdictional defect does not appear on the face of the proceedings, the judgment is voidable only, and the remedy is by a motion in the cause.

When the jurisdictional defect appears on the face of the proceedings, the judgment is void, and may be disregarded.

This holding is sustained.

III. "In the case of Barfield v. Barnes, 108 S. C. page 1 [93 S. E. 425], the decision of the Supreme Court is entirely pertinent and conclusive against plaintiffs herein, wherein the title to the land rests upon precisely the same grounds. The demurrer sustained, and complaint dismissed."

[6] The case of Barfield v. Barnes may not be res adjudicata, but the holding of the circuit judge must be sustained under the doctrine of stare decisis.

The judgment is affirmed.

LEWIS et al. v. DUNLAP et al. (No. 10276.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 26, 1919.)

1. CONTRACTS  $\S$  101(1)—HAVE REFERENCE TO LAW IN FORCE AT THEIR DATE.

Every contract is made with reference to the law of force at its date.

2. USURY  $\S$  9—NOTE BEARING 10 PER CENT. INTEREST VALID IF NOT UNLAWFUL WHEN MADE.

Parties to note calling for 10 per cent. interest could calculate interest according to such rate, notwithstanding Civ. Code 1912,  $\S$  2518, making such rate of interest unlawful, where note was executed prior to enactment of such statute.

3. USURY  $\S$  9—RENEWAL, INCLUDING COMPOUNDED INTEREST AT 10 PER CENT., USURIOUS UNDER EXISTING STATUTE.

Although under Act Dec. 21, 1832 (18 St. at Large, p. 35), the taking of interest upon interest at 10 per cent. per annum would have been lawful under a written contract therefor, yet where a note made while that act was in effect provided for 10 per cent. interest, but not for the payment of interest upon interest at such rate, a new note, given after the taking effect of the 1898 act (Civ. Code 1912,  $\S$  2518), which, in including the amount of the first note, compounded interest thereon at 10 per cent., was usurious, for, although the Act Feb. 10, 1898 (22 St. at Large, p. 749), provides that it shall not apply to contracts made prior to March 2, 1898, compounding of interest on the old note was not provided for by any written contract made prior to such date, and the provision of the 1898 act was not intended to sanction the making of a new contract under the 1882 act after it had been superseded by the 1898 act.

4. USURY ⇐117—PAYEE OF RENEWAL NOTE SHOWN TO KNOW INTEREST COMPOUNDED AT USURIOUS RATE.

Evidence held to show that payee knew that interest added to new note had been compounded at illegal rate of interest by bank cashier, to whom he had handed old notes for computation of interest.

5. USURY ⇐98—ON RENEWAL NOTE USURIOUS FOR COMPOUND INTEREST PAYEE COULD RECOVER SIMPLE INTEREST.

Where new note was usurious because interest on prior 10 per cent. note included in the new note was compounded at 10 per cent. without prior written agreement to pay compound interest, payee could recover simple interest on amount of old note at 10 per cent. to date of new note, for in Civ. Code 1912, § 2519, providing, in case of usury, such portion of the original debt as shall be due shall be recovered "without interest" or costs, the quoted words apply to interest on the second or tainted note, and not to lawful interest on the prior or untainted note.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Without Interest.]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Abbeville County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge.

Action by Jessie J. Lewis, as executrix, and others against William C. Dunlap and others. From judgment rendered plaintiffs appeal. Modified.

Bonham, Watkins & Allen, of Anderson, for appellants.

Wm. N. Graydon, of Columbia, for respondents.

HYDRICK, J. This is an action against the administrators and heirs of W. A. Bigby to foreclose a mortgage given by him to R. A. Lewis. The defense is usury.

On November 22, 1886, Bigby gave Lewis and Morehead two notes, one for $2,871.50, due one day after date, with interest from date at 7 per cent. per annum, and the other for $600, due one day after date, with interest from date at 10 per cent. per annum. Both were lawful when given, and remained so until the subsequent transaction of 1907.

On January 11, 1907, the parties had a settlement, and Bigby gave Lewis a new note for $15,758.58, due one day after date, with interest from date at 8 per cent. per annum, payable annually, and, if not so paid, to become a part of the principal and bear interest at the same rate until paid. It also provided for the payment of attorney's fees for collection. This note was secured by the mortgage herein foreclosed.

The amount of this new note was made up of several items. One of the items has no special bearing on the issues to be decided, and the statement of the details concerning it is omitted, because it would only serve to confuse. The other items were a store account for $1,772.68, and old note for $500, and the two notes of 1886, on which interest was compounded at the respective rates therein mentioned.

The first question is whether compounding the interest on the $600 note and adding it to the new note tainted the latter with usury. Plaintiffs specially urge two reasons why it should not have that effect. First, because the act of 1882, which was of force when the note was given, permitted the taking of 10 per cent. upon written contracts therefor. The answer is that the new contract was made after the act of 1882 (18 St. at Large, p. 35) had been superseded by that of 1898 (vol. 1, Civ. Code 1912, § 2518), which provides that—

"No greater interest than seven (7) per cent. per annum shall be charged, taken, agreed upon or allowed upon any contract arising in this state for the hiring, lending or use of money, * * * except upon written contracts, wherein, by express agreement, a rate of interest not exceeding eight per cent. may be charged."

The act of 1898 (22 St. at Large, p. 749) is practically the same as that of 1882, so far as the rate allowed is concerned, except that the former allowed 10 per cent. and the latter only 8 per cent., when expressly agreed to in writing.

[1, 2] Every contract is made with reference to the law of force at its date. Here, then, we have the taking of interest on interest at 10 per cent. per annum without any written contract therefor, made during the time when such a contract could have been lawfully made. But it is agreed that the act of 1898 expressly provides that it shall not apply to contracts made prior to March 2, 1898. That provision was inserted out of abundance of caution to sanction the validity of contracts made under the previous law, which were lawful when made. Hence, under that provision, it would have been lawful for the parties to have calculated the interest on the note according to its terms, for it was a lawful contract when made. But the provision was not intended to sanction the making of a new contract, under the act of 1882, after it had been superseded by the act of 1898.

[3] As the note did not provide for the payment of interest on interest at 10 per cent.,

and as there was no written agreement to that effect, while the act of 1882 was of force, the compounding of the interest at that rate, in 1907 was a violation of the law in force at that time, and made the note taken therefore usurious.

[4] The second ground upon which it is contended that compounding interest did not taint the transaction with usury is that it was unintentionally done. The testimony is that Lewis handed the two notes to Greer, the cashier of the Bank of Belton, and asked him to calculate the interest on them, saying one of them bore 7 and the other 10 per cent., and that Greer, of his own motion, compounded the interest, because it was customary with him to do so. He says, however: "Mr. Lewis and Mr. Bigby accepted my calculations as correct." From this and the evidence that the calculations, which showed on their face that the interest had been compounded, were attached to the notes, the court did not err in finding that Lewis knew that the interest had been compounded. Greer was Lewis' agent, and his intention must be presumed to have been Lewis' intention, in the absence of evidence to show that what Greer did was against the intention of Lewis.

The act of 1898 (vol. 1, Civ. Code 1912, § 2520) makes the defense available to the defendants, notwithstanding the provision that it shall not apply to contracts made prior to March 2, 1898, because the contract of 1907 is the one to which the defense is made, and not to those of 1886.

[5] The court held that, under the statute (vol. 1, Civ. Code 1912, § 2519), which provides, in cases of usury, that "such portion of the original debt as shall be due shall be recovered, without interest or costs," plaintiffs were not entitled to recover interest on the notes of 1886, according to the terms thereof up to the date of the new contract in 1907, and based that conclusion on the case of Harp v. Chandler, 1 Strob. 461.

The opinion in that case does not support the conclusion stated. In that case, Harp held a note which Chandler had given to Croker. It was untainted. Chandler gave Harp a new note, which the testimony tended to show included interest on the old note, calculated at an usurious rate. Judge Wardlaw, speaking for the court, said:

"It is hard to resist the inference * * * that the note now sued on was given for the balance of a previous note, which was originally untainted by usury, but was by subsequent agreement calculated at some usurious rate of interest. If this were so, the verdict should have been (without interest and without costs) for the balance of the amount, which, when the second note was given, was really due on the first note calculated at the lawful rate of interest," etc.

The words italicized show that the words "without interest" in the parenthesis above meant without interest as provided for in the new note, and that the amount which was really due on the first note at the date of the usurious contract included the interest thereon, calculated at the lawful rate, and that that sum was recoverable, but without costs. In other words, that that sum (the principal of the old note and lawful interest thereon) was the original debt, which could be recovered, but without costs. That idea is expressed again further on in the opinion, at page 467, where he said:

"But the forbearance of a pre-existing debt is a new loan, and upon this principle only can excessive interest upon such forbearance be regarded as usury. The Legislature prohibits usury, and directs that in all cases whatsoever only the principal sum or amount lent shall be recovered without interest or costs. The original security remains untainted, but it has been as to the original parties, superseded by a new corrupt agreement, and therefore the amount lent on that new agreement, that is, the first principal and the lawful interest which was due when the new agreement took effect, shall be recovered, but without interest or costs."

Again, it clearly appears, from the words italicized, that the words, "without interest," in the last clause of the sentence, refer to interest on the tainted note, and not to the lawful interest on the untainted note, which, by the words italicized, is expressly included in "the amount lent on the new agreement." Again, on page 468, he says:

"Whenever, by acceptance of usurious interest, or an agreement for it once actually operating, a corrupt contract has been established concerning the debt contained in a security originally untainted, the amount really due on the day when that contract [evidently meaning the corrupt contract] commences to operate must be taken to be the principal sum from which all subsequent payments must be deducted to ascertain the balance which shall be recovered without interest and without costs."

The same principle is expressed thus in 39 Cyc. 1907:

"When usury inheres only in a renewal note given for principal and interest of a previous valid note, it is manifest from the principles hereinbefore stated that the subsequent usury cannot defeat the lender's right to recover principal and interest due on the valid note at the time of the usurious renewal."

And the case of Harp v. Chandler is one of those cited to sustain the text, showing that the author interpreted that opinion correctly.

It follows that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover (in addition to the store account and the $500 note, which have not been questioned) the principal and interest on the notes of 1886, calculated at the rates therein stipulated, after deducting payments made thereon, up to the date of the new note; but, as the new note was tainted with usury, by the incorporation therein of the amount due on the $600 note, calculated at an usurious rate, no further interest and no costs or attorney's fees can be collected.

The judgment of the circuit court is modified accordingly.

Judgment modified.

(178 N. C. 46)

RICHARDSON et al. v. WOODRUFF & SONS. (No. 22.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 17, 1919.)

1. SALES ⇨199, 201(1)—WHEN TITLE PASSES WITHOUT DELIVERY.

Present physical delivery of the goods is not always required to an executed contract of sale, as title will pass without such delivery, if that is the intention as expressed in the agreement.

2. SALES ⇨197—ON EXECUTORY SALE DAMAGE WHILE IN STORAGE IS BORNE BY SELLER.

Where defendants offered to sell a certain kind of potatoes at $12.50 a barrel for future shipment, August 1st, "any shrinkage to be stood by you after they go into cold storage," which plaintiffs accepted, the contract continued executory until the goods were shipped, August 2d, so that damage by reason of their storage by defendants was not to be borne by plaintiff.

3. EVIDENCE ⇨457—SALES ⇨88, 445(4)—WHEN MEANING OF TERMS OF CONTRACT FOR THE JURY.

In an action by the purchasers of potatoes by contract providing they should stand any shrinkage while in storage for future delivery, the goods being warranted sound and No. 1 at time of making the contract, question whether the potatoes were up to specifications, also the meaning of the terms "shrinkage to be stood by the purchaser," held for the jury, the terms being sufficiently ambiguous to permit explanation by parol.

4. ATTACHMENT ⇨225, 239—WHEN ATTACHABLE INTEREST IS NOT JURISDICTIONAL POINT.

Where defendant sellers in the purchasers' action for damages appeared, answered, and defended generally, the point that no attachment lay because defendants had no attachable interest in the potatoes involved, title to which had passed to plaintiffs, was no longer jurisdictional, and in such cases objections of law or fact to the sufficiency of the affidavit or the validity of the attachment should be raised and presented by motion or by special objection to the form or amount of judgment.

5. SALES ⇨201(7)—WHEN TITLE TO SHIPMENT TO SELLERS' ORDER REMAINED IN SELLER.

Where purchased goods were shipped to the sellers' own order, and rejected by the purchasers because not in compliance with specifications, title was in the sellers at the time of the purchasers' attachment levied on the goods.

6. SALES ⇨200(3)—WHEN CONSIGNEE HAS RIGHT TO INSPECT SHIPMENT.

Even when goods are shipped under open bill of lading on a contract of sale, and the shipment is made by common carrier for delivery at a distant point, the consignee buyer has the right of reasonable inspection to discover if the shipment meets the contract.

7. EVIDENCE ⇨544—EXPERT TESTIMONY AS TO CONDITION OF POTATOES AFTER COLD STORAGE ADMISSIBLE.

In an action for failure to furnish the quality of seed potatoes ordered, a witness for plaintiff purchasers, who examined the potatoes on their arrival at destination, having had 16 years' experience handling potatoes, held qualified to give his opinion as to the condition of the potatoes when taken out of cold storage by defendant sellers, who had held them for future delivery.

On Plaintiff's Appeal.

8. SALES ⇨442(4)—ON FAILURE TO MEET SPECIFICATIONS BUYER CAN RECOVER DEPOSIT AND DAMAGES.

Where seed potatoes were ordered for future delivery, but failed to meet specifications, the buyers could recover from the sellers in default not only the $500 advanced as a deposit when the contract was made, but the difference between the contract and market prices at the time and place of delivery, as provided in the executory contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pasquotank County; Devin, Judge.

Action by J. W. Richardson and the Produce Exchange Company against Frank C. Woodruff and another, trading as Woodruff & Sons. From judgment for plaintiffs both parties appeal. Affirmed on defendants' appeal; on plaintiffs' appeal new trial on the issue of damages ordered.

The action is to recover damages for failure to deliver 100 barrels of seed potatoes, pursuant to a contract of defendant with plaintiff J. W. Richardson, and in which company plaintiff had acquired an interest pending negotiations. The amount of $5 per barrel had been paid by plaintiff, at making order, on "deposit," to be applied towards the purchase money, pursuant to the terms of the agreement.

There was denial of liability by defendants, and a counterclaim for balance of the purchase money alleged to be due defendants, claiming that the potatoes were in all respects up to contract specifications.

On the issue as to damages the court restricted plaintiff to recovery, at most, of the $500 made on deposit, as stated.

As ancillary process in the cause, plaintiffs had sued out an attachment, and caused same to be levied on the potatoes that were shipped and after plaintiffs had declined to receive same.

The jury rendered the following verdict:

"(1) Did the defendants contract to sell to the plaintiffs 100 barrels of Irish potatoes at the price of $12.50 f. o. b. New York for shipment August the 1st, upon the terms set out in the correspondence offered in evidence?" Answer: "Yes."

"(2) Did the defendants fail to comply with the terms of said contract?" Answer: "Yes."

"(3) What damage, if any, are the plaintiffs entitled to recover therefor?" Answer: "$500 and interest."

"(4) What amount, if any, are the defendants entitled to recover of plaintiffs by reason of their counterclaim set up in the answer?" Answer: " * * * ."

There was judgment on the verdict for plaintiffs, and both sides appealed, assigning errors.

Meekins & McMullan, of Elizabeth City, for plaintiffs.

Robt. J. Woodruff and Geo. J. Spence, of Elizabeth City, for defendants.

Defendants' Appeal.

HOKE, J. The facts in evidence tended to show that, in answer to a letter of plaintiff, doing business in Elizabeth City, N. C., of date June 7, 1917, seeking to purchase a lot of "Peach Blow cold-storage" seed potatoes, and making inquiry as to price of 100 bags and per carload, defendants, doing business in New York City, wrote in reply from that place, on June 8th, as follows:

"We are in receipt of your letter of the 7th, asking us to give you prices on some Peach Blow cold-storage potatoes, but we have no Peach Blow, and we promptly wired you that we had 40 bags of Cobblers and 100 bags of Spaulding Rose No. 4. Spaulding Rose No. 4 is very similar to the Peach Blow. We quote you these at $12.50 per barrel f. o. b. New York, for shipment August 1. If you order, we shall expect deposit of $5 a barrel at once, the balance draft attached to bill of lading. Any shrink to be stood by you after they go into cold storage. Goods are sound and a No. 1 now in every matter. We await response to this matter.

"Yours very truly, S. D. Woodruff & Sons."

On June 11th plaintiff wrote from Elizabeth City, N. C., accepting offer of 100 barrels Spaulding Rose at price of letter, and on June 12th sent a telegram to plaintiff accepting offer, and on June 20th sent the $500 as required, etc. It was admitted that, on August 2d, Woodruff & Sons shipped from New York to their own order, 86 barrels of Irish potatoes, bill of lading attached, order notify New Bern Produce Company, and same arrived at Elizabeth City on August 8th.

There was testimony on part of plaintiff to the effect that the potatoes so shipped, on arrival at Elizabeth City, were utterly unfit for the purpose for which they were ordered, and were at the time they were put in cold storage, and at the time same were shipped out of cold storage on August 2d; "that the barrels were about one-half to two-thirds full; that they were sprouting, with sprouts one-half to three inches long; they were soft, shriveled up, and a great many of them rotten;" that plaintiff declined to accept the potatoes, and thereupon instituted the action for damages, and had issued and levied an attachment on same, as property of defendants.

Plaintiffs' testimony further tended to show that the term, "Any shrink to be stood by the purchaser after they go into cold storage" as contained in letter of defendant proposing sale, signified only "that when the barrels are filled they will stretch and cause the potatoes to shrink," and had no reference to the condition of the potatoes, except perhaps as to weight, but in other respects potatoes, if up to specifications, should have continued sound to time of arrival in Elizabeth City, and that the market value of seed potatoes at said time of arrival was from $18 to $25 per barrel.

The testimony of defendants tended to show that the potatoes were sound and fully up to specifications when put in cold storage, June 20, 1917; were properly cared for there, and were sound and all right when shipped; that the natural effect of taking potatoes out of cold storage, exposing same to the temperature then existent, from 2d August to 8th, would cause them to shrink and make them soft, etc.; that the term "shrinkage to be stood by you" covers both sprouting, rotting, and softening, and "was put in there to protect the defendants," etc.

[1-3] Upon this, the evidence chiefly relevant to the inquiry, it is insisted for the defendant that the facts showed an executed contract of sale at the time the potatoes were put in cold storage, on June 20th, and any damage by reason of such storage or which thereafter followed must be properly borne by the purchaser; but we do not so interpret the agreement. It is undoubtedly true, as defendant contends, that present physical delivery of the goods is not always required to an executed contract of sale, but that title will pass without it, if that be the intent of the parties as expressed in the agreement. In the last case on the subject (Teague v. Grocery Co., 175 N. C. 195-198, 95 S. E. 173, 175) a proper application of the principle is given, as follows:

"On the present record there are facts in evidence tending to show that this transaction was an executed contract of sale, having reference to designated and specific pieces of property, and, if these facts should be accepted by the jury, it is well understood that present physical delivery of the property is not necessary to the transfer of the title, but that the same passes according to the intent of the parties as expressed in the contract between them; and, further, that, in the absence of specific agreement on the question, the presumption is that the title passed at the time of the purchase and without such delivery." Citing Richardson v. Insurance Co., 136 N. C. 314, 48 S. E. 733; Jenkins v. Jarrett, 70 N. C. 255; Tiffany on Sales, pp. 82-83; Benjamin on Sales (7th Ed.) p. 728.

But while such a position is fully recognized in sale of specified articles, we concur in the view of his honor that, by the terms of the agreement, this contract continued executory till the goods were shipped on August the 2d, and beyond that, the same having been shipped to defendant's order, and the question of whether the goods were up to specifications was properly submitted to the jury in that aspect, leaving it to them to say what was the significance of the terms, "shrinkage to be stood by the purchaser," these terms being sufficiently ambiguous to permit of explanation by parol testimony. McMahan v. R. R., 170 N. C. 456, 87 S. E. 237, and authorities cited.

[4-6] Nor, on the record as now constituted, can the objection be sustained or properly considered that no attachment lies in this case for that defendant had no attachable interest in the potatoes. Defendant having appeared and answered and defended generally, this question is no longer jurisdictional in its nature, it is not raised in the pleadings, nor is it an issuable question as a matter of right. In such case, objections of law or fact to the sufficiency of the affidavit, or in general to the validity of the attachment, as ancillary to the principal demand, should be raised and presented by motion in the cause, or, in some instances, by special objection to the form or amount of the judgment. Manufacturing Co. v. Steinmetz, 133 N. C. 192, 45 S. E. 552. And if it were otherwise, the goods, as stated, having been shipped to defendants' own order, and rejected by plaintiffs because not in compliance with the contract specifications, title to the goods was in the defendants at the time of attachment levied. Bank v. So. Ry., 153 N. C. 346, 69 S. E. 261; Asheboro, etc. v. R. R., 149 N. C. 261, 62 S. E. 1091; Development Co. v. Ry., 147 N. C. 503, 61 S. E. 381. Even when goods are shipped under an open bill of lading, on a contract of this character, and when the shipment is to be made by common carrier, for delivery at a distant point, the consignee has the right of reasonable inspection in order to ascertain if the shipment is in accord with the contract. Speaking to the subject in 23 R. C. L. p. 1433, title "Sales," § 256, the author pertinently says:

"It is the general rule that where goods are ordered of a specific quality, which the seller undertakes to deliver to a carrier to be forwarded to the buyer at a distant place, the right of inspection, in the absence of any specific provision in the contract, continues until the goods are received and accepted at their ultimate destination; in such a case the carrier is not the agent of the buyer to accept the goods as corresponding with the contract, although he may be his agent to receive and transport them." Citing Pope v. Allis, 115 U. S. 363, 6 Sup. Ct. 69, 29 L. Ed. 393, Eaton v. Blackburn, 52 Or. 300, 96 Pac. 870, 97 Pac. 539, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 53, 132 Am. St. Rep. 705, 16 Ann. Cas. 1198, and other cases in support of the text.

In the Oregon case a very satisfactory statement of the position very generally prevailing is given, and appears in the first three headnotes of the case as reported in 16 Ann. Cas. 1198, as follows:

"Under an executory contract for the sale and delivery of goods of a specified quality, the quality is a part of the description, and the seller is bound to furnish goods actually complying with such description. If he tenders articles of inferior quality, the vendee is not bound to accept them, and unless he does so he is not liable therefor. This necessarily gives to the vendee the right of inspection, and he must be given an opportunity to make such inspection before becoming liable for the purchase price, unless the contract otherwise provides."

"A vendee of merchandise shipped from a distant point, under a contract specifying the quality of the merchandise and providing for its delivery f. o. b. at the point of shipment, but which contains no provisions as to the time or place of payment, inspection, or acceptance, is entitled to a reasonable time after the merchandise arrives at its destination in which to inspect it at that point, and to reject it if it does not comply with the contract."

"Assuming, without deciding, that where merchandise is sold under a contract providing for its delivery to a carrier f. o. b. at the point of shipment, title vests in the vendee, for some purposes, at the time when the merchandise is delivered to the carrier, such title is, nevertheless, conditional as between the vendor and vendee, the condition being that the merchandise shall be found to be of the quality called for by the contract; and such conditional vesting of title in the vendee does not prevent the latter from exercising his right of inspection when the merchandise arrives at its destination."

And C. Justice Bean, delivering the opinion, refers also with approval to Pierson v. Crooks, 115 N. Y. 539, 22 N. E. 349, 12 Am. St. Rep. 831, and Alden v. Hart, 161 Mass. 576, 37 N. E. 742, in further illustration of the correct principle. In any aspect of the matter, therefore, on the facts as established by the jury, the title to the potatoes was in the defendants at the time of attachment levied.

[7] Defendant objects, further, that W. W. Newbern, a witness for plaintiffs, who examined the potatoes on arrival at Elizabeth City, and testified as to their condition, was allowed to give his opinion, based upon such examination as to their condition on 2d day of August when taken out of cold storage. This witness had previously stated, after giving description of potatoes on arrival that he had had 16 years' experience handling potatoes, handling from 5,000 to 10,000 barrels of seed potatoes each year, some from cold storage and some not, and knew from experience the effect of cold storage upon them. On such statement, and, under numerous decisions of the court, the opinion of this witness was clearly competent. Hux v. Reflector Co., 173 N. C. 97, 91 S. E. 591; Morrisett v. Cotton Mills, 151 N. C. 31, 65 S. E. 514; Wilkinson v. Dunbar, 149 N. C. 20, 62 S. E. 748. Speaking to its reception in Wilkinson v. Dunbar, supra, the court said:

"Testimony of this kind, from such a source, is coming to be more and more allowed in investigations of this character, and the courts are disposed to admit 'opinion evidence' when the witnesses have had personal observation of the facts and conditions, and from their practical training and experience are in a condition to aid the jury to a correct conclusion. While not expert testimony in the strict sense of the word, it is coming to have a recognized place in the law of evidence."

After careful consideration, we find no error as to exceptions appearing in defendant's appeal, and on such questions we are of opinion that the judgment should be affirmed. No error.

Plaintiff's Appeal.

[8] Plaintiff excepted, and appealed from a ruling of the court restricting the amount of damages to the $500 advanced as a deposit. The plaintiff having, as established by the verdict, rightfully exercised his privilege of rejecting the potatoes because not in compliance with the specifications, the title to the goods remained in the defendants, plaintiffs are assuredly entitled to recover the $500 paid on deposit, and, as now advised, we see no reason why, in addition to this amount, they should not be allowed to recover the difference between the contract and market price at the time and place of delivery, as provided in the executory contract, f. o. b. New York, August 1, 1917, this being the rule ordinarily applicable in such cases, and illustrated and applied in numerous decisions of this court on the subject. Flour Mills v. Distributing Co., 171 N. C. 708, 88 S. E. 771; Tillinghast v. Cotton Mills, 143 N. C. 268, 55 S. E. 621; Hosliery Co. v. Cotton Mills, 140 N. C. 454, 53 S. E. 140; Coal Co. v. Ice Co., 134 N. C. 574, 47 S. E. 116.

For the error indicated, and on plaintiff's appeal, there will be a new trial on the issue as to damages, and it is so ordered.

Partial new trial.

WALTON v. WALTON. (No. 99.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 17, 1919.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE §292—ABANDONED WIFE CAN ATTACH LAND OF NONRESIDENT HUSBAND.

A wife, abandoned with her child by her husband and suing for allotment and payment of a reasonable subsistence out of his estate, pursuant to Laws 1919, c. 24, was entitled to have warrant of attachment issue against his land, under Revisal 1905, § 758; he being a nonresident of the state and a fugitive from justice.

2. ATTACHMENT §8—LIES FOR UNLIQUIDATED DAMAGES ON BREACH OF CONTRACT.

An attachment lies for unliquidated damages arising out of breach of contract.

3. MARRIAGE §62—WIFE CAN ATTACH HUSBAND'S LAND ON JUDGMENT FOR ALIMONY AND COUNSEL FEES.

A wife's judgment against her husband for alimony and counsel fees, allowed in the husband's action to annul the marriage, which the wife successfully defended, is an implied contract, entitling the wife to attach the husband's realty as for unliquidated damages arising out of the breach of such contract.

4. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT §69—ON SPECIAL APPEARANCE FOR FUGITIVE AND NONRESIDENT ATTORNEY MUST SHOW WRITTEN AUTHORITY.

In suit by a wife, pursuant to Laws 1919, c. 24, to have allotted and paid a reasonable subsistence from the estate of her husband, who is a nonresident and a fugitive from justice, the trial court should have required counsel for the husband to file written authority, as required by Revisal 1905, § 213, to appear specially for such husband to move to dismiss the wife's attachment of his land.

Appeal from Superior Court, Bertie County; Connor, Judge.

Action by Pauline Walton against Isham Walton, Jr. From an order dissolving an attachment, plaintiff appeals. Order reversed, and attachment reinstated.

E. R. Tyler, of Roxobel, and John W. Davenport, of Windsor, for appellant.

Winston & Matthews, of Windsor, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. This action was begun under chapter 24, Laws 1919, which was enacted as a substitute for Revisal, § 1567, by the plaintiff against her husband, "to have a reasonable subsistence allotted and paid or secured to her from the estate or earnings of her husband." The summons was issued April 29, 1919, returnable May 12, 1919. The verified complaint, used as an affidavit upon which the warrant of attachment issued, avers that the defendant in July, 1917, abandoned the plaintiff and the child of the marriage in New York, and, returning to Bertie county, brought a suit for the annulment of said marriage. The plaintiff herein defended the action and obtained judgment that the marriage was in all respects legal and binding. During the pendency of said action she obtained an order from the court that the defendant should pay her $10 monthly from December 1, 1917, to July 1, 1918, and the further sum of $50 as counsel fees, which he failed to do. A motion to attach him for contempt for failure to obey the order was continued, to be heard later. It is further averred in the complaint, used as an affidavit, that the defendant was indicted under Revisal, §§ 3355 and 3357, for abandonment, and gave bond, but left the state with the expressed purpose and intent of placing himself beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and since that time has been a fugitive from justice and a nonresident. The plaintiff further avers that the defendant is a strong and able-bodied man, earning $75 per month, and since his abandonment has inherited an interest in land in Bertie county described in the petition, and asks that she be allowed $50 per month for the support of herself and child, and an allowance for counsel fees, and that the interest of the defendant be condemned to the payment of said amounts, and for an attachment in this cause against said property. The warrant was duly issued and served upon the real estate of the defendant in said county, and the court ordered the summons to be served by publication. The defendant, appearing through counsel, specially moved to dismiss the warrant of attachment. This was allowed, and the plaintiff appealed.

[1] The question presented is the right of the plaintiff to a warrant of attachment as an ancillary remedy to her cause of action. Chapter 24, Laws 1919, prescribes that the wife, abandoned by her husband, is entitled "to have a reasonable subsistence allotted and paid or secured to her from the estate or earnings of her husband." This gives the wife, who has been abandoned, a remedy both in personam and in rem. The attachment is to secure the property, so that it may be held to satisfy the judgment when rendered, and also as a basis for publication of the summons. The wife has always had the remedy of garnisheeing the salary or wages of her husband in such cases, and she is entitled to an attachment of the property for the same reason. Otherwise the defendant, pending litigation, can sell or convey his property, or creditors may attach it for debt, or obtain prior liens by judgment.

The defendant contends that an attachment does not lie under Revisal, § 758, unless there is a breach of contract express or implied. We are of opinion that the husband is under an implied contract, for he is primarily liable for the support and maintenance of his wife. Levi v. Marsha, 122 N. C. 567, 29 S. E. 832. In Archbell v. Archbell, 158 N. C. 417, 74 S. E. 380, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 261, it was held that the "right of a married woman to support and maintenance is primarily a property right," and the Legislature has given the wife the right to sue for such support. Cram v. Cram, 116 N. C. 298, 21 S. E. 197. This obligation is declared and enforced by statute, and this action, therefore, by the wife, is on the implied contract. The defendant being a nonresident of this state and a fugitive from justice, the warrant of attachment properly issued, under Revisal, § 758, for such cause.

[2] An attachment lies for unliquidated damages arising out of breach of contract. Foushee v. Owen, 122 N. C. 360, 29 S. E. 770; Judd v. Mining Co., 120 N. C. 397, 27 S. E. 81. The only way the court could obtain jurisdiction of the defendant and his property in this case is by attachment. Everitt v. Austin, 169 N. C. 622, 86 S. E. 523. The property is within the jurisdiction of the court; the defendant is not. The court could not enforce the statutory provision (chapter 24, Laws 1919) "to secure her the reasonable subsistence allotted on the estate of her husband" otherwise, and the statute would be nugatory, for the defendant is beyond the jurisdiction of the court. The plaintiff is entitled to an attachment of the property and publication of notice to the nonresident defendant. Bernhardt v. Brown, 118 N. C. 701, 24 S. E. 627, 715, 36 L. R. A. 402; Armstrong v. Kinsell, 164 N. C. 127, 80 S. E. 235.

[3] Besides, the plaintiff is also seeking to enforce the judgment of $120 for alimony and counsel fees allowed in the former action, which judgment is an implied contract. In Pennington v. Bank, 243 U. S. 269, 37 Sup. Ct. 282, 61 L. Ed. 713, L. R. A. 1917F, 1159, a proceeding like this, the court sustained the right of the wife to attach the deposit in bank of the nonresident husband for payment of alimony. In that case the court says:

"In ordinary garnishment proceedings the obligation enforced is a debt existing at the commencement of the action; whereas the obligation to pay alimony arises only as a result of the suit. The distinction is, in this connection, without legal significance. The power of the state to proceed against the property of an absent defendant is the same, whether the obligation sought to be enforced is an admitted indebtedness or a contested claim. It is the same, whether the claim is liquidated or is unliquidated, like the claim for damages in contract or in tort. It is likewise immaterial that the claim is, at the commencement of the suit, inchoate, to be perfected only by time or the action of the court. The only essentials to the exercise of the state's power are presence of the res within its borders, its seizure at the commencement of the proceedings, and the opportunity of the owner to be heard. Where these essentials exist, a decree for alimony against an absent defendant will be valid, under the same circumstances and to the same extent as if the judgment were on a debt; that is, it will be valid, not in personam, but as a charge to be satisfied out of the property seized."

The following cases from other states also sustain the rule that alimony may be enforced by seizing the property of the absent defendant by attachment or similar process at the commencement of the suit: Hanscom v. Hanscom, 6 Colo. App. 97, 39 Pac. 885; Thurston v. Thurston, 58 Minn. 279, 59 N. W. 1017; Wood v. Price, 79 N. J. Eq. 1, 81 Atl. 1093. The following sustain the proposition that "the wife's inchoate right to alimony makes her a creditor of the husband": Livermore v. Boutelle, 11 Gray (Mass.) 217, 71 Am. Dec. 708; Thurston v. Thurston, supra; Murray v. Murray, 115 Cal. 266, 47 Pac. 37, 37 L. R. A. 626, 56 Am. St. Rep. 97; Hinds v. Hinds, 80 Ala. 225.

Another case on all fours with the present is Pendleton v. Pendleton (Ky.) 112 S. W. 674, which holds that where a husband, having an interest in real estate, left the state and remained away for about a year, and during that time failed to contribute to the support of his wife and children, the court properly sustained an attachment against his property to enforce such support.

The wife's remedy by attachment puts every one on notice of her claim, and she does not lose any priority as against the other creditors of the husband. If the attachment was denied her, the husband could sell the property, or permit it to be exhausted by other judgments, thus making the decree for alimony nugatory when obtained. The wife and children in the meantime would be left destitute. The order dissolving the attachment must be reversed, and the attachment reinstated.

[4] The plaintiff further contends that the court committed error in refusing to grant her motion to strike out the special appearance of counsel, upon the ground that the defendant, being a fugitive from justice and absent from the state, "stands in the attitude of defiance to its power," as was said in Cromer v. Self, 149 N. O. 164, 62 S. E. 885, 128 Am. St. Rep. 658. We need not pass upon this question, as the plaintiff is entitled to reinstatement of her attachment; but we think the court should at least have required counsel for defendant to file written authority from the defendant, as required by Revisal, § 213.

Reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Bertie County; Gulon, Judge.

Suit by C. F. Bryant against A. C. Bryant. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. New trial.

Plaintiff, C. F. Bryant, brought suit against his brother, A. C. Bryant, to establish a parol trust. He alleged that the administrator of the estate of his father filed a petition to sell the land in controversy to make assets; that a sale was ordered, and the land was advertised for sale during the year 1887; that the plaintiff, C. F. Bryant, and the defendant, A. C. Bryant, desiring to own said land together, agreed that A. C. Bryant should attend the public sale at the courthouse door in Windsor, N. C., and bid off and purchase said land for both C. F. Bryant and himself, pay for the same, and take title in his own name, and hold the same in trust for both C. F. Bryant and himself, and that, after payment by plaintiff to A. C. Bryant of his half of the purchase price, the latter would convey in fee simple to C. F. Bryant his share of the land; that A. C. Bryant attended the sale and purchased the land, in furtherance of this agreement, and took title therefor in trust for himself and C. F. Bryant by the deed to him, which is recorded, and now holds said title in trust as above set out.

Defendant denied that he purchased the land for the benefit of himself and his brother, or that his brother had any interest in the land, and pleaded further that, if the allegations of the complaint are true, the plaintiff had failed to diligently press his claim, and that it was barred by laches and lapse of time. Defendant also contended that plaintiff had abandoned such equity as he may have had by consenting to a sale of the land by the defendant to Dr. Jenkins, who occupied it for five years and then reconveyed it to the defendant. Defendant's motion for judgment of nonsuit was overruled at the close of plaintiff's evidence, and again at the conclusion of all the evidence.

Defendant contended that the evidence is not sufficient to establish a parol trust, and further that the uncontradicted evidence shows that the equity was abandoned, if any ever existed. Plaintiff testified that, after he moved on the land in 1896, he consented to a sale of the part which he now claims, and that the defendant thereupon sold it to Dr. Jenkins. He further testified that Dr. Jenkins went into possession of the land and remained there five years. The defendant testified that Dr. Jenkins bought the land claimed by plaintiff for $300, and that after remaining in possession five years Dr. Jenkins gave it up. Dr. Jenkins corroborated this testimony. Defendant further contended that upon plaintiff's own evidence this action is barred by lapse of time. The sale was made in 1897; suit was brought 30 years later, in 1917.

Plaintiff offered in evidence an unrecorded deed from Millie Futrell to plaintiff, dated April 2, 1888, purporting to convey to plaintiff her dower interest in the land in controversy. Millie Futrell was the widow of Samuel Bryant, original owner of the land. The case on appeal contains the statement that this deed was not recorded. Plaintiff testified on cross-examination, after the deed had been admitted in evidence: "I took this deed in 1888, and have never had it recorded." Defendant, in due time, objected to the introduction of this deed, and assigned the admission of it as error. Plaintiff testified that, after the purchase of the land at the courthouse door, defendant furnished the money to buy the dower interest of Millie Futrell, widow of Samuel Bryant. Defendant denied this. Plaintiff was permitted to introduce a letter from Mrs. Futrell (which was written since suit was brought), in which she states that A. C. Bryant paid her for the land. Mrs. Futrell was not present at the trial. The letter was directed to the son of plaintiff, and defendant contends that it is simply an unsworn statement by a third party, who was not then present, and that it was harmful. The facts about the letter are as follows: It purported to be a letter from Mrs. Millie Futrell, widow of Samuel Bryant, deceased, to M. L. Bryant, son of C. F. Bryant. This letter was a reply to a letter written to her by Bryant, in which he inquires the reason why she conveyed her dower interest in these lands to A. C. Bryant. She replied, in answer to this question, that some 25 years ago she thought she had conveyed her dower right to A. C. Bryant, the defendant, and that about 2 years ago A. C. Bryant saw her, and said that he had no deed for it, and wanted a deed, and that in consideration of A. C. Bryant paying her the sum of $10 she then made A. C. Bryant a deed for the dower right; further that somebody back in 1888 had paid her $150, and that she thought it was A. C. Bryant, and for this reason she made him a deed for the consideration of $10.

Another exception is to the admission of the final account of the administrator of Samuel Bryant. The defendant had testified that, according to his recollection, the heirs of Samuel Bryant received in all about $20. To contradict him plaintiff introduced the final account, showing that each heir received about $20.

The jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Did the defendant, A. C. Bryant, by agreement with C. F. Bryant, made before the sale, purchase the Samuel Bryant land at the administrator's sale for himself and C. F. Bryant, as alleged in the complaint?

"Answer: Yes.

"(2) Did the defendant, under such agreement and purchase, agree with plaintiff that the land described in the complaint should be allotted to the plaintiff, and a deed made therefor, when the balance of the debt on the whole tract was paid by the plaintiff?

"Answer: No, according to first issue; plaintiff getting equal share with defendant.

"(3) How much of said debt now remains unpaid?

"Answer: $225, and interest now due."

Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant appealed.

Winston & Matthews, of Windsor, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] We need consider only one question, and that is the competency of the letter addressed by Mrs. Futrell to the plaintiff's son. This, in our opinion, was hearsay, and therefore should not have been admitted. It was also prejudicial. The letter was not competent, because Mrs. Futrell was not sworn as a witness, and was not even present at the trial. It was written to the plaintiff's son, a third party, and was therefore a transaction between persons who were not parties to the cause or interested therein, and who were not witnesses. Plaintiff says it was corroborative of him, as he had stated that he had received letters from her, or that this letter had been so received. But this fact that a letter, or letters, had been received from her proved nothing, and therefore needed no corroboration.

[2] It is further contended that, because it was at least corroborative, the defendant should have placed his objection on that ground alone. But that rule applies when the objection is to the effect of the evidence, or when it may tend to prove two or more things, and is competent only as to one of them, but not where the evidence is wholly incompetent, as here; it being hearsay. The objection is that in that form it is competent for no purpose. It is saturated with hearsay, and was res inter alios acta. It should have been excluded.

[3] But plaintiff contends that it was not prejudicial, as it proved nothing that could affect the defendant injuriously in the trial of the case. We can well see how, in one phase of the testimony, it may have been used with fatal effect against the defendant. The controversy was a close one, and it required little to turn the scales in favor of either side. This letter may have been the deciding factor. The plaintiff contended that it was competent, when it was introduced, because it tended to corroborate his version of the facts. If this be so, it was surely hurtful to the defendant. But we do not think that we could better demonstrate its harmfulness than by quoting from the plaintiff's own brief what it so forcefully said about the matter, which we now do:

"The deed [referred to in the letter] is not offered as a link in a chain of title. It is offered to prove the contention of the plaintiff, and in corroboration of it. The defendant denied the parol agreement, and denied that there was such a deed in furtherance of it. The introduction of the paper writing, not as title, but in corroboration, follows as a matter of course. It is a very strong circumstance in support of plaintiff. Defendant had denied the parol agreement in toto. He also denied that there was such a deed. The presentation of the deed put that matter at rest. The plaintiff does not claim that he owns the land under that deed; he might safely do so, but that was not his agreement. The deed is a strong circumstance tending to show that his contention is the true contention."

If this deed was a strong piece of evidence for the plaintiff, he tried to strengthen it by showing that, while the deed recites that he paid the purchase money, it was really paid by the defendant, and, as plaintiff had an equitable interest in the land, and the parties were dealing with each other on that basis, the deed was made to him, and that there was no other reason why it should have been so made, if defendant owned the entire interest, and had paid the purchase money. It is evident from the record that the letter explaining the transaction in regard to the deed had great weight in deciding the issue against the defendant. Besides, the plaintiff's contention was, and he so testified, that the dower of Mrs. Futrell was to be bought at the price of $150, and a deed therefor taken to him; that defendant had negotiated the trade and advanced the purchase money, which was to be a part of the price to be paid by them jointly for the land. In this view of the plaintiff's claim, and testimony, it was incompetent to show any facts, by hearsay, which tended to support the plaintiff's theory. The court admitted the testimony for this purpose, and we must assume, under the circumstances, that it was permitted to be used in that way. It was, at least, given such a trend in the court below as to be calculated to affect the result unfavorably to the defendant, and therefore may have seriously prejudiced him. Patton v. Porter, 48 N. C. 539.

The deed, without the letter to help give it point and relevancy, would have been of little or no value. The two were so allied to each other that the object of introducing the deed, and its bearing upon the case, would not appear until the letter was considered. They could not well be severed or disassociated as pieces of evidence, because the one explained the other. We do not see how such evidence could have been otherwise than prejudicial. It may be that it was slight, and that the jury should attach little importance to it; but we cannot safely say, as contended by the plaintiff, that it was harmless. As said by Pearson, C. J., in McLenan v. Chisholm, 64 N. C. 323, at page 324:

"There is no telling how far the defendant's case was affected by this error. Where there is error, its immateriality must clearly appear on the face of the record, in order to warrant this court in treating it as surplusage."

See Johnson v. Railroad Co., 140 N. C. 581, at page 587, 53 S. E. 362.

[4] The other exceptions need not be considered. If defendant wished to set up laches, or the statute of limitations, or any other matter in defense, he should so plead, and tender the proper issues. We do not mean to say that laches or the statute will avail him, for that will depend upon the evidence.

We feel constrained by the ruling of the court in respect to the incompetent evidence to grant another trial to the defendant.

New trial.

ROGERS et ux. v. PILAND. (No. 98.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 17, 1919.)

1. MORTGAGES ⇨338—MORTGAGOR CAN SUE TO RESTRAIN FORECLOSURE AFTER SALE TO THIRD PERSON.

Mortgagors who have conveyed the mortgaged premises to a third person by deed containing full covenants of all usual kinds, seisin, right to convey, general warranty, and against incumbrances, can maintain suit, joining their grantee, against the mortgagee to restrain foreclosure.

2. MORTGAGES ⇨301 — FORMAL TENDER OF INTEREST DUE WAIVED.

Where a mortgagee refused in advance the mortgagors' offer to pay interest due, and demanded payment of the whole indebtedness, which was not then due, he waived any formal tender of the amount of interest due, particularly where he had misrepresented the amount of interest at what the mortgagors later offered to pay.

3. TENDER ⇨24—AFTER TENDER REFUSED DEBTOR MUST DEPOSIT IN COURT.

A debtor must be able, ready, and willing to pay when the money is due, and, having tendered payment, must deposit the money in court to keep his tender good.

4. MORTGAGES ⇨301—MORTGAGOR ON REFUSAL OF TENDER LIMITED TO OBJECTIONS THEN MADE.

Where a mortgagee, when the mortgagors offered to pay more than was actually due as accrued interest, declined to receive it, not on the ground the amount was not sufficient, he himself having represented it was, nor on the ground check was tendered, but because he had changed his mind, and then demanded payment of the full debt not yet due, he cannot subsequently contend that the tender of interest at the time was insufficient.

Appeal from Superior Court, Hertford County; Connor, Judge.

Action for injunction by W. W. Rogers and wife against J. J. Piland. From an order granting injunction, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs to enjoin the sale of land, under a power contained in a mortgage to secure the sum of $2,000, with interest, which was payable in installments of $500 on January 1, 1919, and of each succeeding year thereafter until January 1, 1922, with interest due annually; and it was provided that in default of the payment of principal or interest when due, or any part thereof, the defendant (mortgagee) should have the power to sell for foreclosure.

Defendant, before the maturity thereof, assigned the first note to one Shaw, and this was paid by the plaintiffs, who notified the defendant thereof, and offered to pay the interest accrued on the other notes. Defendant notified plaintiffs that the amount of interest due was $111, and agreed to wait a few days for its payment. Plaintiffs offered to pay the accrued interest, or $111, but a dispute arose as to the correct amount of the interest due on the notes not yet due. On the day of this transaction (January 13, 1919) there was due on the notes secured by the mortgage only $90 and interest thereon from October 19, 1918. At the time plaintiffs were ready, able, and willing to pay the $111, but the defendant refused to receive it, although he had represented this to be the correct amount and had agreed to accept payment of it. Plaintiffs tendered a check for $120, but this was declined. He demanded instead that plaintiffs pay the full amount of the principal and interest on all the notes. This was refused, and he thereupon advertised the land for sale, and the restraining order was issued. Plaintiffs tendered the full amount due as interest, and have brought $135 into court, where it is now deposited to await the result of this action.

Judge Connor found the facts substantially as above set forth, and granted an injunction to the hearing. Defendant appealed.

Roswell C. Bridger, of Winton, for appellant.

W. R. Johnson, of Ashoskie, for appellees.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). There are only two questions raised and necessary to be considered:

[1] First. Defendant contends that plaintiffs have sold and conveyed their equity of redemption to O. L. Joyner, and therefore cannot maintain this action. This position cannot be sustained. The deed to Joyner contains full covenants of all the usual kinds—seisin, right to convey, warranty, and against incumbrances. Joyner is a party to this suit. It is stated in the record that "Joyner has not paid the full purchase price in cash, the terms for the payment of the balance on same having been made by plaintiffs upon the basis of their notes to defendant."

The plaintiffs have a vital interest in this case, although they may have conveyed their equity of redemption to Joyner. They are still mortgagors, and liable on the mortgage debt, and have the right to see that the land brings a fair and full price, and, if it is sold under the mortgage, Joyner will lose his land, and the plaintiffs will become liable on the covenant against incumbrances in his deed. It seems hardly to need authority for the position that plaintiffs, under those facts, can maintain this action. This question was presented in Dedrick v. Den Bleyker, 85 Mich. 475, 482, 48 N. W. 633, where the contention was that the mortgagor who had sold and conveyed his equity, with full covenants, to a third party (Dedrick), was not an interested party, and could not maintain an action to restrain a foreclosure by the mortgagee; but it was held that not only could this be done, but that the mortgagor and his grantee had a common interest to get rid of the mortgage, and could join as plaintiffs in the suit, if desired, as the grantee of the mortgagor would have a remedy upon the covenants in his deed, if he was compelled to pay the mortgage debt, or if he lost the land by the foreclosure, "they being all full covenant deeds of warranty," as in this case. It is said in 27 Cyc. 1532, that "a suit to restrain the foreclosure of a mortgage may be maintained not only by the mortgagor, but also by any owner of the equity of redemption deriving title from or under him." Hubbard v. Jasinski, 46 Ill. 160, also is directly in point.

[2, 3] Second. As to the tender of the interest due at the time it was made. The defendant is in no position, under the facts found, to question its sufficiency. He had deceived the plaintiffs as to its amount, and when the latter offered to pay what was due, even the $111, he declined to accept the money, and peremptorily demanded the full payment of principal and interest of the mortgage debt. He was in the wrong throughout the transaction, and it would be grossly inequitable if he were permitted to take advantage of it. The mortgage was given strictly as a security for the debt due to him, and not as means of enabling him to acquire title to the land by a foreclosure, which will be unnecessary and in violation of the plaintiffs' right, under the mortgage. The time for the maturity of the whole debt had not arrived by the terms of the mortgage, and the entire debt will not mature until 1922, if the mortgagor keeps his contract by paying the interest promptly, and the installments of the principal as they are due. The defendant's refusal, in advance, to accept the plaintiffs' offer to pay, and his demand of the whole indebtedness, which was not then due, was a waiver of any formal tender of the amount, and his conduct in the matter was clearly one. Mobley v. Fossett, 20 N. C. 93; Abrams v. Suttles, 44 N. C. 99; Blacklock v. Clark, 133 N. C. 306, 45 S. E. 642; Bateman v. Hopkins, 157 N. C. 470, 73 S. E. 133, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 642; Gallimore v. Grubb, 156 N. C. 575, 72 S. E. 628; Gaylord v. McCoy, 161 N. C. 685, 77 S. E. 959. The debtor must be able, ready, and willing to pay at the time the money is due, and this was the case here, and he has deposited the money in court to keep his tender good. Tuthill v. Morris, 81 N. Y. 94.

[4] It also appears that the defendant, when the offer to pay the accrued interest was made, declined to receive it, not upon the ground that the amount was not sufficient, for he had represented that it was, or that a check was tendered, but for the reason that he had changed his mind, and then demanded payment of the whole debt. This being so, he cannot now base his contention upon the ground that the tender was insufficient. He is confined to the reason he gave at the time of the tender. It is said in 38 Cyc. 141:

"An objection to the amount of a tender must be made at the time the tender is made, otherwise it is waived; and where the sum tendered is less than the sum due, and the tender is refused by the creditor on some ground other than that the amount is too small, as where it is claimed that the contract is forfeited, the tenderer waives the objection to the insufficiency of the amount."

See, also, Ford v. Stroud, 150 N. C. 362, 64 S. E. 1, where more was demanded of the debtor than the creditor had a right to exact, and it was held to be a waiver of the validity of the tender. But here the plaintiffs tendered more than was due.

We adopt the judge's findings of fact, and upon them there is no basis for defendant's contentions.

Affirmed.

WALDO et al. v. WILSON. (No. 587.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 27, 1919.)

1. COSTS  $\S$  256(1)—APPELLANTS CAN RECOVER AS COSTS ONLY PRICE OF NECESSARY PRINTING.

The Supreme Court having adjudged that unnecessary matter in the transcript was sent up at the instance of plaintiff appellants, who were not allowed to recover the cost of printing such matter, an order taxing defendant with the entire cost of copying the transcript was improper under rule 22 of the Supreme Court (174 N. C. 833, 81 S. E. x); plaintiffs being entitled to recover for cost of copying only so much of the transcript as they were permitted to recover for the printing of.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR  $\S$  119—ORDER TAXING COSTS OF COPYING OF TRANSCRIPT APPEALABLE.

An order taxing defendant with the entire cost of copying the transcript on plaintiffs' appeal, it having been adjudged that unnecessary matter was sent up at the instance of plaintiffs, who were not allowed to recover the cost of printing it, was appealable.

3. COSTS  $\S$  264—PREPARATION AND TRANSMISSION OF RECORD ARE COSTS OF TRIAL COURT.

The cost of preparing and transmitting the record on appeal to the Supreme Court are not costs of such court, but of the court below, and orders and judgments for payment should be made in the lower court.

4. COSTS ⇐3—NO COSTS RECOVERABLE AT COMMON LAW.

At common law neither party recovered costs; right to such recovery depending on statute.

5. COSTS ⇐267—PAYABLE AS ACTION PROCEEDS SUBJECT TO RECOVERY AT FINAL JUDGMENT.

It is in the contemplation of law that each party should pay its own costs as the action proceeds, subject to the right of recovery of costs in the final judgment.

6. COSTS ⇐146—COURTS WILL PREVENT IMPOSITION OF UNNECESSARY COSTS.

It is the duty of the court to prevent the imposition by either party of unnecessary costs on the other.

Appeal from Superior Court, Graham County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by Frank Waldo and others against W. L. Wilson. From judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appealed. On rehearing new trial was ordered, and from an order taxing defendant with the entire cost of copying the transcript on plaintiffs' appeal to Supreme Court (173 N. C. 690, 92 S. E. 692; 174 N. C. 767, 94 S. E. 442, 715), defendant appeals. Order reversed.

Martin, Rollins & Wright, of Asheville, for appellant.

James H. Merrimon, of Asheville, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. There was a motion in this cause (Waldo v. Wilson, 174 N. C. 767, 94 S. E. 715) to retax the costs by allowing the plaintiffs to recover the entire costs of printing the record (238 pages), notwithstanding the general rule confined the allowance of costs for printing to 60 pages of printed matter. Rule 31 (174 N. C. 836, 95 S. E. vii). This was denied upon the ground, as therein stated, that—"A large part of the record as printed related to a matter upon which the appellant failed to establish his contentions, although he secured a new trial."

In the superior court, when the case went back, the plaintiffs filed a motion and obtained an order to tax against the defendant the entire cost of copying the transcript on appeal to the Supreme Court which consisted of 238 printed pages, although this court had adjudged that much of this matter was immaterial, and adjudged that the defendant was not liable for the cost of printing the transcript in excess of 60 pages. Rule 22 of this court (174 N. C. 833, 81 S. E. x) prescribes:

"The cost of copying and printing unnecessary and irrelevant testimony, or other matter not needed to explain the exceptions or errors assigned, and not constituting a part of the record proper shall in all cases be charged to the appellant, unless it appears that they were sent up at the instance of the appellee in which case the costs shall be taxed against him."

This rule applies to "copying" as well as "printing" the unnecessary matter, and that "in all cases it shall be charged to the appellant unless it appears that the unnecessary matter was sent up at the instance of the appellee."

[1] This court having adjudged in this case that the unnecessary matter was sent up at the instance of the appellant, in the former appeal the plaintiffs, they were not allowed to recover the costs of printing the unnecessary matter. If it was unnecessary to print, it was unnecessary to have it copied in the record. The plaintiffs are entitled to recover the costs for copying so much of the transcript of the record as they were permitted to recover for the printing thereof and no more.

[2] The order was appealable. It is said in Van Dyke v. Ins. Co., 174 N. C. 81, 93 S. E. 446, quoting from State v. Horne, 119 N. C. 853, 26 S. E. 36:

"While this court will not entertain an appeal to determine who shall pay the costs of an action in which the subject-matter has been disposed of, yet where the question is whether a particular item is properly chargeable as costs, or, taking the case below as rightly decided, whether the costs are properly adjudged, the case is reviewable on appeal."

[3] It is true that the costs of preparing and transmitting the record on appeal to the Supreme Court are not costs of this court, but of the court below, and that orders and judgments for the payment thereof should be made in the lower court. Roberts v. Lewald, 108 N. C. 405, 12 S. E. 1028; Dobson v. Railroad, 133 N. C. 624, 45 S. E. 958. Still the order in the superior court is appealable. Van Dyke v. Ins. Co., supra.

[4] At common law neither party to a civil action recovered costs, and each side paid its own witnesses (Costin v. Baxter, 29 N. C. 111), and in criminal actions the sovereign neither paid nor recovered costs. Costs are entirely creatures of legislation, and an appeal lies from a judgment involving merely the taxation of a bill of costs. Blount v. Simmons, 120 N. C. 23, 26 S. E. 649; Guliford v. Board of Commissioners, 120 N. C. 23, 27 S. E. 94; Luther v. Railroad, 154 N. C. 104, 69 S. E. 762.

[5] It is in contemplation of law that each party should pay its own costs, as the action proceeds subject to the right of recovery of costs in the final judgment. Smith v. Railroad, 148 N. C. 335, 62 S. E. 416.

[6] The object of the prosecution bond is not to secure the officers against the plaintiff for their costs, but to secure the defendant in the recovery of costs wrongfully paid out by him. It is the duty of the courts to prevent the imposition by either party of unnecessary costs upon the other. It is for this reason that rule 22 prohibits the costs of copying and printing unnecessary and irrelevant testimony to be taxed against the appellee in any case, unless the appellee was responsible for inserting the unnecessary matter in the record. It is for this reason also that rule 19 (81 S. E. ix) designates what matter is unnecessary to be sent up, and that rule 21 (81 S. E. x) prescribes that the evidence on appeal shall be set out in narrative form.

The order below is reversed.

(178 N. C. 84)

JERNIGAN v. JERNIGAN. (No. 118.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 17, 1919.)

1. JUDGMENT  $\S$ 153(1)—IRREGULAR DEFAULT JUDGMENT MAY BE SET ASIDE AT ANY TIME.

Where judgment by default final is irregular, court may set it aside at any time.

2. JUDGMENT  $\S$ 153(2)—STATUTE AS TO DOCKETING NOT APPLICABLE TO MOTIONS TO SET ASIDE FOR NEGLIGENCE.

Revisal 1905, § 573, providing that judgments docketed during term at which they were rendered, and within 10 days of rendition, shall be deemed to have been rendered and docketed on the first day of the term, does not apply to motions to set aside judgments for excusable neglect.

3. JUDGMENT  $\S$ 441—INDEPENDENT ACTION NECESSARY TO SET ASIDE FOR FRAUD.

Where judgment was procured by fraud, the remedy is by independent action.

4. JUDGMENT  $\S$ 153(3)—NOTICE OF RENDITION DOES NOT RELATE BACK TO FIRST DAY OF TERM.

Parties to an action are fixed with notice of all judgments and orders taken in a cause during the term of the court, but they cannot have notice until judgment is rendered, and, when rendered, notice does not relate back to first day of term.

5. JUDGMENT  $\S$ 153(3) — MOTION TO SET ASIDE NECESSARY WITHIN ONE YEAR FROM RENDITION.

Under Revisal 1905, § 513, requiring that motion to set aside judgment be made within one year "after notice thereof," defendant, who has been served with summons, must make motion within year after rendition of judgment, he being charged with notice from such date, and not from first day of term, notwithstanding section 573, providing that judgment shall be deemed rendered on first day of term.

6. JUDGMENT  $\S$ 153(3)—PARTY TO PENDING ACTION WITHOUT NOTICE CAN MOVE TO VACATE IN ONE YEAR FROM NOTICE.

Under Revisal 1905, § 513, requiring that motion to set aside judgment be made within one year "after notice thereof," defendant who has been made a party to a pending action without notice can make motion within one year from actual notice.

C. L. Guy and Clifford & Townsend, all of Dunn, for appellant.

CLARK, C. J. [1] This was a proceeding to set aside a judgment by default final on the ground of irregularity and excusable neglect. The action was to declare certain deeds void, and the plaintiff the owner of the lands in fee simple. The complaint was duly verified and filed July 3, 1916, and judgment by default final entered at September term; no answer having been filed. The summons was issued returnable to the May term, and was served on May 11, 1916. The judgment by default final was regular. Revisal, § 556 (4); Junge v. MacKnight, 137 N. C. 285, 49 S. E. 474; Steiges v. Simmons, 170 N. C. 44, 86 S. E. 801; Lee v. McCracken, 170 N. C. 576, 87 S. E. 497. Had it been irregular, the court could have set it aside at any time. Becton v. Dunn, 137 N. C. 559, 50 S. E. 289. The court declined also to set it aside on the ground of excusable neglect, because it held that the motion was not made within one year, as provided by Revisal, § 513.

Section 513 provides:

"The judge shall, upon such terms as may be just, at any time within one year after notice thereof, relieve a party from a judgment, order, verdict or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise or excusable neglect, and may supply an omission in any proceeding."

The judgment here sought to be set aside was rendered on September 17, 1916, at the term of Harnett court, which began on September 3d. The motion to set aside for excusable neglect was entered on September 4, 1917, at the term which began September 2d. The court was of opinion that as judgments related back to the first day of the term that the motion entered September 4, 1917, at September term, which began September 2d, was not within the one year after the entry of a judgment rendered at September term, 1916, which term began September 3d.

The defendant's counsel with some pertinency suggests that if the judgment entered September 16, 1916, related back to September 3d, the first day of that term, then the motion which was entered on September 4, 1917, should relate back also to September 2d, the first day of that term, and that the fiction that all proceedings should date back to the first day of the term should apply to the motion to set aside the judgment equally as to the judgment itself.

[2] But we do not think that Revisal, § 573, which provides that "all judgments rendered in any county by the superior court thereof, during a term of the court, and docketed during the same term, or within ten days thereafter, shall be held and deemed to have been rendered and docketed on the first day of said term" applies to motions to set aside judgments for excusable neglect.

Revisal, § 573, originated in rule 18 of the Supreme Court (63 N. C. 667) in 1869, to prevent an unseemly contest as to priority of judgments and of docketing where the judgments were all obtained at the same term. McKinney v. Street, 165 N. C. 515, 81 S. E. 757; Fowle v. McLean, 168 N. C. 540, 84 S. E. 852; Hardware Co. v. Holt, 173 N. C. 311, 92 S. E. 8. To prevent such scramble where the defendants might be in falling circumstances and the priority of judgment by one day, or even by hours or minutes, though taken at the same term, might give priority of lien, this rule was adopted and was afterwards made statutory. That section is entitled: "Judgment" "Docketed and Indexed—All of Same Term as of First Day."

[3] Originally, when a judgment was taken it could not be set aside on motion after the adjournment of the term for excusable neglect or mistake when the judgment was taken in regular course. Moore v. Hinnant, 90 N. C. 164; 23 Cyc. 902. The remedy on allegation of fraud in taking the judgment is still by independent action. Carter v. Rountree, 109 N. C. 29, 13 S. E. 716, and citations thereto in Anno. Ed. To prevent such defect of justice Rev. § 513, was enacted. This provides that such motion to "relieve a party from judgment, order, verdict, or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise or excusable neglect" may be made "at any time within one year after notice thereof." This statute does not deal with the priority of lien, as contemplated by Revisal, § 573, acquired by the docketing of a judgment.

[4] Parties to an action are fixed with notice of all judgments and orders taken in a cause during the term of the court (University v. Lassiter, 83 N. C. 38, often cited), but they cannot have notice of the judgment until it is rendered, and there is no provision of the law, nor any legal fiction, which provides that notice of the judgment taken shall relate back to the first day of the term.

[5, 6] Revisal, § 513, provides that the motion to set aside this judgment can be made at any time within one year "after notice thereof." The defendant was fixed with notice of this judgment, having been served with summons, from the day it was taken, i. e., on September 16th. In all other cases (as for instance when he has been made a party to a pending action without notice) he has one year from actual notice. McLean v. McLean, 84 N. C. 370. The motion to set aside was entered on September 4, 1917, and being within one year of the entry of judgment was within the time allowed by the statute.

The merits of the motion have not been passed upon, and are not before us. The order refusing the motion must be set aside that the merits of the motion may be passed upon.

Reversed.

HEARNE v. PERRY et al. (No. 117.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 24, 1919.)

LOGS AND LOGGING §3(11) — PLAINTIFF CANNOT RECOVER ON CONTRACT ON FAILURE TO PERFORM HIMSELF.

Where a contract giving plaintiff the right to log defendant's land provided that plaintiff should begin operations within a reasonable time, and move his mill to the land as soon as he finished his existing location, but plaintiff failed to do so, moving his mill to another's land, and did not offer to cut defendant's timber for 13 months, he cannot maintain action against defendant to recover damages for refusal to allow cutting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Chatham County; Kerr, Judge.

Action by W. H. Hearne against M. E. Perry and another. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This is an action to recover damages for breach of contract in refusing to allow the plaintiff to cut and remove certain timber. The contract was executed on the 18th of April, 1914. It conveyed certain timber for $850, of which $50 was to be paid in cash, which was done, and the balance at a certain sum per 1,000 feet as manufactured—

"with full right and privilege for and during the period of 2 years and 6 months from the date of commencing sawing the timber on the above-described land, provided the party of the second part begins the same within a reasonable time and moves his mill to said land as soon as he finishes his present location, and it is further agreed by the parties of the first part that the party of the second part will have a right to place his mill on said lands for the manufacture of said timber at one suitable place."

It was further provided in the contract:

"It is the intention of this deed to convey the timber as above described on the condition that the party of the second part will comply with all the agreements and make the payments as above set forth, and in the event of said faithful performance this conveyance is to be in full force; otherwise, to be null and void."

The plaintiff admitted that at the time the contract was made his mill was on his own land cutting timber, and that he finished the work on this land within 3 or 4 weeks after the contract was made; that he then moved the mill to what is known as the Womble land, which according to his evidence was three-fourths of a mile from the land of the defendant, and according to the evidence of the defendant a mile and a half distant; that he has never moved or attempted to move his mill to the land of the defendant, and that he did not go to the land of the defendant, or offer to cut the timber under the contract, until October, 1915, 18 months after the execution of the contract.

At the conclusion of the evidence his honor entered judgment of nonsuit, holding that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, because of his failure to perform the conditions of the contract, and the plaintiff excepted and appealed.

A. C. Ray, of Pittsboro, and Siler & Barber, of Siler City, for appellant.

Long & Bell, of Pittsboro, for appellees.

ALLEN, J. The contract gives to the plaintiff 2 years and 6 months within which to cut and remove the timber, the time to commence "from the date of commencing sawing the timber," and it therefore became very material to have some stipulation which would prevent the plaintiff from postponing indefinitely the time when he would remove his mill to the land of the defendant and begin his work, and it was for this reason that it was made a provision of the contract that the plaintiff should begin "the same within a reasonable time and move his mill to said land as soon as he finished his present location."

This is the contract of the parties, and the court cannot do otherwise than enforce it, and, the plaintiff having admitted that he has not performed his part of the contract, that he has never attempted to move his mill to the land of the defendant, that he did not attempt to go from the place where he was then working to begin work under the contract, and that he made no move to cut the timber of the defendant until 18 months after the contract was executed, he cannot maintain his action. The controlling principle is stated in Supply Co. v. Roofing Co., 160 N. C. 445, 76 S. E. 499, as follows:

"In Ducker v. Cochran, 92 N. C. 597-600, Chief Justice Smith, delivering the opinion, said: 'The proposition is too plain to need any reference to authority in its support that a party to a contract cannot maintain an action against another for its breach, without averring and proving performance of his own antecedent obligations, or some legal excuse for nonperformance, or, if the stipulations are concurrent, his readiness and ability to perform.' This statement has been quoted with approval in Corinthian Lodge v. Smith, 147 N. C. 246 [61 S. E. 49], and Tussey v. Owen, 139 N. C. 457-461 [52 S. E. 128], and the principle is one very generally recognized in our decisions. Wildes v. Nelson, 154 N. C. 580 [70 S. E. 940]; Hughes v. Knott, 140 N. C. 550 [53 S. E. 361]."

There is no error in the judgment of nonsuit.

Affirmed.

BARHAM et al. v. HOLLAND et al.
(No. 119.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 24, 1919.)

1. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION ¶19 — ON PARTITION OF ESTATE HEIRS NEED NOT PROVE INTESTACY.

In proceedings by heirs for partition of ancestor's land, heirs are not required to prove that ancestor died intestate; the presumption being that ancestor did not leave a will.

2. WILLS ¶449 — IT IS PRESUMED TESTATOR INTENDED DISPOSITION OF ENTIRE ESTATE.

It is presumed in the first instance that testator intended to make disposition of all of his property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Harnett County; Kerr, Judge.

Proceeding by Hettie Barham and others against Matt Holland and others. Judgment for defendants and plaintiffs except and appeal. New trial.

J. R. Baggett, of Lillington, and Clifford & Townsend, of Dunn, for appellants.

E. F. Young, of Dunn, and F. T. Dupree, of Angier, for appellees.

HOKE, J. There were facts in evidence tending to show that the property in controversy belonged to one Lem Holland; that in 1882 he left the state, going to South Carolina, and that no message had been received from him by any of his family or others "since about a year or two after he left the state, and the reputation in the family was that he was dead," and plaintiffs and defendants are his heirs at law, brothers and sisters of the deceased or their children; that just before leaving Lem Holland, the owner, placed the property in possession of his brother, Jim Holland, to hold the same for the owner, and not long after Jim died, leaving his widow, Lucy, and several of their children in possession, and they or some of them had continued to live on the place till institution of the suit.

There was testimony for defendant tending to show that Lem Holland placed his brother, Jim, and his wife on the place as owners, and that, since Jim's death, his widow, Lucy, who sets up the plea of sole seisin, had continued to occupy and possess the property, and that such possession was adverse and in the assertion of ownership; that she was the sole owner, as alleged in her plea. On the issues thus raised, his honor, among other things, charged the jury:

"The burden, then, is upon the plaintiffs to satisfy you by the evidence, and by its greater weight, that Lem Holland is dead, and that he died seized and possessed of this piece of land; second, that he died intestate, that is to say, that he did not leave a will and give this land to anybody else; third, that the parties to this action are his heirs at law; that is, that they are the ones who are entitled to his property in the event that he did die owning this property, and that he did die without any will conveying it to somebody else."

And further:

"In order that you should answer the issue 'Yes,' it is essential, as I said, that you should find all of these facts to exist from the evidence, by its greater weight, as I have defined greater weight to you; and, if you fail so to find, you will answer the issue, 'No.'"

[1] There is no presumption which requires that before an heir at law can recover as for lands descended he should show that his ancestor died intestate. On the contrary, the presumption is the other way. Speaking to the subject in 9 R. C. L., p. 9, sec. 3, the author states the prevailing position as follows:

"The heir is favored in law. He never takes by the act or intention of the testator. His right is paramount to and independent of the will, and no intention of the testator is necessary to its enjoyment. He needs no argument or construction showing intention in his favor to support his claim. They belong to the party claiming under the will and in opposition to him. To cut off either the heir or next of kin therefore, the estate must be devised or bequeathed, expressly or by necessary implication, to some other person, and whoever claims against the laws of descent must show a sufficient written title, for an estate in fee is presumed to descend, on the death of the ancestor, in pursuance of the laws of inheritance, unless the descent is shown to have been interrupted by a devise."

The cases referred to are in support of the text: among others, Lipman's Appeal, 30 Pa. 180, 72 Am. Dec. 692, Graham v. Graham, 23 W. Va. 36, 48 Am. Rep. 364, and our own decisions on the subject are in full recognition of the principle. In re Hedgepeth, 150 N. C. 245, 63 S. E. 1025; Cox v. Lumber Co., 124 N. C. p. 78, 32 S. E. 381; Floyd v. Herring, 64 N. C. 409.

[2] As shown in some of the cases cited, for defendant (Blue v. Ritter, 118 N. C. 580, 24 S. E. 356), there is, at times, a presumption against partial intestacy; that is, when it is established that an ancestor has made a will, it is presumed, in the first instance, that he intended to make disposition of all of his property, but on the facts of this record the presumption is in favor of lands descended, and there is no burden on the heir at law to show that there was no will.

For the error indicated, there must be a new trial of the cause; and it is so ordered.
New trial.

STATE v. SOUTHERLAND. (No. 90.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 24, 1919.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW §1148—GRANTING SEVERANCE WITHIN DISCRETION OF COURT.

The granting of a severance when two or more are indicted in the same bill rests in the sound discretion of trial court, and from his determination there is no appeal.

2. CRIMINAL LAW §1144(14)—IN ABSENCE OF EXCEPTIONS INSTRUCTIONS PRESUMED CORRECT.

In the absence of exceptions to the charge, the Supreme Court, hearing an appeal from a conviction of murder of one of defendants tried jointly, must conclude the trial court charged correctly in relation to the consideration of testimony against the two defendants or any one of them against whom it was pertinent.

3. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION §82 — CHARGE OF CONSPIRACY UNNECESSARY TO JOINT INDICTMENT.

There is no constitutional or statutory requirement that in order to try two persons on the same indictment there must be a charge added of conspiracy.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wayne County; Kerr, Judge.

Ashley Southerland was convicted of murder in the second degree, and appeals. No error.

The prisoner was indicted jointly with Mabel Howard for the murder of Millard L. Parker, the indictment being in the usual form. He was convicted of murder in the second degree, and sentenced to ten years in the state's prison. From this sentence he appealed to this court, assigning only one error. Upon his arraignment he moved for severance on the grounds there would be no evidence offered tending to show the joint commission of the offense; that the defense of Mabel Howard would be that the defendant, Ashley Southerland, committed the offense, and that necessarily evidence would be admitted which, though competent against Mabel Howard, would not be competent against the defendant, Ashley Southerland. The court overruled this motion, and the defendant, Ashley Southerland excepted.

Kenneth C. Royal and J. L. Barham, both of Goldsboro, for appellant.

J. S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

CLARK, C. J. [1] There is no exception to evidence or the charge. The sole assignment of error is the refusal of the motion to sever. From State v. Smith, 24 N. C. 402 (1842), down to the present day, this court has uniformly held that the granting of a severance when two or more are jointly indicted in the same bill rests in the sound discretion of the trial judge, and from his determination there is no appeal. State v. Smith, 24 N. C. 402; State v. Collins, 70 N. C. 241, 18 Am. Rep. 771; State v. Underwood, 77 N. C. 502; State v. Gooch, 94 N. C. 987; State v. Oxendine, 107 N. C. 783, 12 S. E. 573; State v. Finley, 118 N. C. 1161, 24 S. E. 495; State v. Moore, 120 N. C. 570, 26 S. E. 697; State v. Barrett, 142 N. C. 565, 54 S. E. 856; State v. Carrawan, 142 N. C. 575, 54 S. E. 1002; State v. Holder, 153 N. C. 606, 69 S. E. 66; State v. Millican, 158 N. C. 617, 74 S. E. 107.

There are other cases, among them the very recent case of State v. Kirkland & Wilson, 175 N. C. 771, 94 S. E. 725, which was a conviction of a secret assault with a deadly weapon with intent to kill. The defendants contended that much of the evidence in that case was competent against one defendant and not competent against the other, and that, "although the court charged the jury that much of this was not evidence against Kirkland, or not evidence against Wilson, yet it had its weight with the jury, and the defendants seriously insist that the court should have ordered a severance so that the cases might be tried upon the proper testimony as against each defendant. It has been frequently held that a motion for a separate trial of defendants charged in the same bill of indictment is a matter that must necessarily be left to the sound discretion of the trial judge. To undertake to review such rulings is impracticable, and would result in great delay in the disposition of criminal actions. It is only when there appears to have been an abuse of such discretion that this court will entertain such exceptions and review the rulings of the trial judge. Nothing of that nature appears in this record. State v. Dixon, 78 N. C. 558; State v. Parish, 104 N. C. 689 [10 S. E. 457]; State v. Hastings, 86 N. C. 597; State v. Haney, 19 N. C. 390; State v. Murphy, 84 N. C. 742."

In State v. Finley, 118 N. C. 1161, 24 S. E. 495, the facts as presented to the court on the motion for a severance are very similar to those in this case. The court in that case (118 N. C. 1163, 24 S. E. 496) says:

"The defendant alleged that the defenses of each of the accused were in antagonism as the foundation of the motion. An exception was filed, on the ground that the denial of the motion was a gross breach of discretion on the part of the court. Unless the accused suffered some apparent and palpable injustice in the trial below, this court will not interfere with the decision of the court on the motion for a severance. Although the defenses were in conflict and involved the admission of testimony which was competent as against one of the defendants and not against the other, yet his honor, with entire certainty and clearness, carefully instructed the jury in the application of the evidence, explaining to them, by a proper analysis of the same, what part of it was competent against both and what part competent against one and not against the other, and guarding them against being influenced against either of the defendants by such evidence as he had instructed them was only competent against the other one. We therefore refuse to interfere with the ruling of the court below. The matter was in the sound discretion of his honor, and from what appears it is certain that there was no abuse of that discretion." State v. Oxendine, 107 N. C. 783, 12 S. E. 573; State v. Gooch, 94 N. C. 987.

[2, 3] In this case there are no exceptions to the charge, and therefore we must conclude that the court charged correctly according to the ruling laid down in State v. Oxendine, supra. Indeed the prisoner's counsel states his exception that—

"The trial judge has no power to permit the defendant to be jointly tried for the commission of a single act where there is neither allegation nor evidence tending in any way to show concerted action."

There is neither precedent nor ground to sustain this proposition, which would make every trial a separate one unless there is a charge of conspiracy. This indictment is in the statutory form, and charges that—

"Ashley Southerland and Mabel Howard, on December 20, 1919, with force and arms, at and in the county aforesaid, willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and with malice aforethought did kill and murder Millard L. Parker." Revisal, § 3245.

This was held constitutional. State v. Moore, 104 N. C. 743, 10 S. E. 183; State v. Brown, 106 N. C. 645, 10 S. E. 870; State v. Arnold, 107 N. C. 861, 11 S. E. 990. There is no requirement that in order to try two persons in the same indictment there must be a charge added of conspiracy, and the court cannot make such statute.

trary rules as to matters which have always been committed to his sound discretion, such as the granting or refusal of continuances and of motions for severance and the like of which a learned and impartial trial judge on the spot is the best judge. He is selected for his fitness, and if there should be patent abuse he can be reviewed which is full protection. There is no indication of such abuse in this case.

This murder occurred in a house of ill fame where there were several persons present, but the evidence is that shots were fired by both these two persons, and, nothing else appearing, it was decidedly to the public interest to investigate the whole transaction in one trial. Two trials would have taken double the expense and time. Cases have occurred where, there being a severance, the party acquitted on the first trial has come into court on the trial of the other party and sworn that he himself was the guilty party. No error.

CLEMENTS v. ELIZABETH CITY ELECTRIC LIGHT & POWER CO.
(No. 26.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 17, 1919.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨103(1)—EMPLOYER CANNOT DELEGATE DUTY TO FURNISH SAFE PLACE TO WORK AND SAFE APPLIANCES.

The employer's duty to provide the employé with a reasonably safe place to work and reasonably safe tools and appliances, is nondelegable.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨103(2)—MASTER CANNOT DELEGATE DUTY TO FURNISH SAFE TOOLS TO EMPLOYÉ.

Employer cannot delegate his duty to furnish employé with a reasonably safe place to work and reasonably safe tools and appliances by a contract with employé, requiring latter to furnish his own tools and appliances.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨234(4)—LINEMAN USING HIS OWN LEATHER GLOVES GUILTY OF CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where an experienced lineman, who used his own tools, including gloves, having told his employer when hired that he preferred to so do, undertook to make repairs on high power wires in his own way and with his own tools, using leather instead of rubber gloves, and placing the wires near each other instead of keeping them apart, so that he was killed when he touched them, he was guilty of contributory negligence barring recovery.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨273, 274(4)—ON DEATH FROM LIVE WIRE EVIDENCE OF WARNING TO EMPLOYÉ ADMISSIBLE.

In an action for the death of a lineman from touching a highly charged wire, testimony that he had been warned that the current would kill him, and that he furnished his own gloves and used leather instead of rubber gloves held admissible on the issues of contributory negligence and assumption of risk.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pasquotank County; Devin, Judge.

Action by John R. Clements, as administrator, against the Elizabeth City Electric Light & Power Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff excepts and appeals. No error.

See, also, 96 S. E. 652.

This is an action to recover damages for the wrongful death of the plaintiff's intestate, caused, as the plaintiff alleges, by the negligence of the defendant, in that it failed to furnish the intestate with reasonably safe tools and appliances with which to do his work, to wit, rubber gloves; (2) that it failed to furnish sufficient help for the work that was being done.

The evidence tended to prove that the plaintiff's intestate was an experienced lineman, and had been engaged in that work for several years; that at the time he was employed by the defendant, some two or three weeks before his death, it was the understanding between him and the superintendent of the defendant that he was to furnish all his equipment, including gloves; that at the time of his death he was engaged in removing from one of the company's poles "a dead arm," by which is meant a rotten arm, and replacing it with a new one; that he had been sent to do this work by the general manager of the defendant; that after taking the rotten arm from the pole and either lowering it or throwing it down he unloosed his safety belt, and started down the pole, and as he passed through the wires his hand, on which were leather gloves, came in contact with one of the wires charged with 2,300 volts; that he was then seen to throw back his head, hang for an instant while fire flashed from his hands, and then fall; and that he was killed; that the insulation on the wires where the intestate was working was badly worn; that they had been permitted to remain in this condition for a long time; that an arm cannot be removed and replaced by one man.

It was also in evidence for the defendant that the intestate was employed to do extra work and not regularly; that at the time of his employment he stated that he had all the necessary appliances for his work, tools, climbers, gloves, etc., and that he preferred to work with his own tools; that at the place where he was killed there was a high power wire of opposite polarity on each side of the pole; that at this point the wires crossed the street on an angle which caused one of the wires when removed from the arm to rest against the pole, and caused the other to swing off unless tied to the pole before removing from the arm; that the intestate removed both wires and allowed one to rest against the pole and instead of tying the other lifted it over the top of the pole, and allowed it to rest close to the other wires; that in doing this he came in contact with both wires, and, not having his safety belt fastened, and having on leather gloves, he was shocked by the voltage of the wires, and was thrown to the ground, crushing his skull and causing his death.

Upon the trial one Bains, a witness for the defendant, was permitted to testify over the objection of the plaintiff, and he told the intestate not long before his death that he had better be careful, that the current he was then working on would kill him, and that the intestate replied that this current would not hurt him; that he was not afraid of it; that he could bite it in two; that he had been working on wires in Norfolk carrying 11,000 volts. Also that the intestate used leather gloves nearly all the time, and that they were worthless as a protection from shock. The plaintiff excepted to the admission of this evidence.

One Lewis, a witness for the defendant, who was an expert, was permitted to testify, over the objection of the plaintiff, that there was no occasion for another man to help the plaintiff, and the plaintiff excepted.

At the conclusion of the evidence the plaintiff asked the court to charge the jury that, even if the intestate contracted to furnish his own gloves, this would not release the defendant of its duty to furnish reasonably safe appliances, which was refused, and the plaintiff excepted.

His honor charged the jury fully as to the duty to furnish the plaintiff reasonably safe place in which to do his work and reasonably safe tools and appliances, and, among other things, as follows:

"But if you find from the evidence that the plaintiff's intestate undertook to provide his own gloves and that he was injured by reason of their being defective gloves there would be no liability resting upon the defendant; he was injured by reason of these being defective gloves. If the defendant did not furnish them and intestate used his own gloves defendant could not be held responsible for their condition."

And again:

"Now upon the other hand the defendant contends you ought to answer the first issue, 'No;' that there was no negligence on the part of the defendant; or if you answer the first issue, 'Yes,' you should answer the second and the third issue, 'Yes,' or one or more of them; that as a matter of fact that the man's death was not attributed to the fault of this defendant, but entirely to his own act and deed; that he furnished his own tools, not only his own gloves, but spurs and belt and pliers and other instruments which are used by a lineman; that they never furnished him any gloves; he furnished his own gloves; that they had an agreement between them, whether that would be binding in some respects or not; that they were not responsible for the condition of the gloves, and they invoke that principle of law, and contend that you should observe that they are not liable on account of defective gloves."

The jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Was plaintiff's intestate killed by the negligence of the defendant, as alleged in the complaint? A. No.

"(2) Did plaintiff's intestate, by his own negligence, contribute to his own injury and death as alleged in the answer? A. Yes.

"(3) Did plaintiff's intestate assume the risk of injury and death, as alleged in the answer? A. Yes.

"(4) What damage, if any, is plaintiff entitled to recover? A. —."

Judgment was entered upon the verdict in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff excepted and appealed.

Ehringhaus & Small, of Elizabeth City, for appellant.

Hughes, Little & Seawell, of Norfolk, Va., and W. A. Worth, of Elizabeth City, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. [1, 2] The rule is well established that the duty imposed upon the employer to provide a reasonably safe place to work and reasonably safe tools and appliances is nondelegable (Mincey v. R. R., 161 N. C. 470, 77 S. E. 673), and so important and necessary do we regard this principle that we would not permit it to be modified or weakened by contract between the employer and employé, requiring the employé to furnish his own tools and appliances.

Indeed if this should be allowed the rule could be easily abrogated, and the employer would be afforded the opportunity to contract against his own negligence.

We would therefore be inclined to grant a new trial if the verdict stopped with the first issue, but the jury has gone further, and has answered the issues of contributory negligence, and assumption of risk against the plaintiff, and in the consideration of these last issues it was proper to have before the jury all the facts and circumstances, including the use of leather gloves, and upon the second and third issues the use by the plaintiff of the leather gloves, belonging to him, was given no effect except as a circumstance tending to establish the defendant's contention on the issues of contributory negligence and assumption of risk.

In Hicks v. Cotton Mills, 138 N. C. 320, 50 S. E. 703, and Pressly v. Yarn Mills, 138 N. C. 415, 51 S. E. 71, two leading authorities on the respective duties of employer and employé, after holding that the duty of the employer to furnish a reasonably safe place to work and reasonably safe tools and appliances is absolute, the court says in the latter case:

"On the second issue, that addressed to the question of contributory negligence, the judge charged the jury in substance that if they should find from the evidence that the injury would not have happened if the defendant had supplied the machine with a shifter, and this was the proximate cause of the injury, this would be continuing negligence, and they should answer the second issue, 'No,' though the plaintiff may have been negligent in the use of the machine. As we have held in Hicks v. Cotton Mills, supra, this is not a correct proposition as to every negligent failure on the part of the employer to furnish a safe appliance by reason of which the injury occurs, and is not the law in cases of the character we are now considering. The employé is not in such instances absolved from all obligation to act with reasonable care and prudence, and if there is negligence on his part, concurring as the proximate cause of the injury, the plaintiff cannot recover."

It has also been held that:

"When the danger is obvious and is of such a nature that it can be appreciated and understood by the servant as well as by the master or by any one else, and when the servant has as good an opportunity as the master or any one else of seeing what the danger is, and is permitted to do his work in his own way and can avoid the danger by the exercise of reasonable care, the servant cannot recover against the master for the injuries received in consequence of the condition of things which constituted the danger. If the servant is injured, it is from his own want of care." Covington v. Furniture Co., 138 N. C. 374, 50 S. E. 761; Mace v. Mineral Co., 169 N. C. 146, 85 S. E. 152.

[3] Applying these principles we find the evidence on the issue of contributory negligence full and almost uncontradicted; and, as it has been submitted to the jury under instructions free from error, the finding thereon is sufficient to sustain the judgment.

The intestate of the plaintiff was a line-man of 10 or 12 years' experience. He knew the dangers of his employment and the tools and appliances he ought to use. He represented to the manager of the defendant at the time of his employment he had the tools and appliances necessary for his work, and that he preferred to use his own. He discovered the need of repairs at the place where he was injured, and undertook to do the work in his own way and with tools selected by himself. He used leather, instead of rubber, gloves, and after he had detached the high power wires on each side of the pole from the arm, instead of keeping them apart, which he could have done, thereby rendering them harmless so far as he was concerned, he placed them near each other, which was very dangerous, and thus brought about his death by his own want of care.

The statement in the former opinion as to the use of gloves furnished by himself, thus considered in connection with the other circumstances, which are now fully developed, is free from criticism when restricted to the second issue.

[4] The evidence of Bains was competent to show special notice to the intestate of the danger of the work he was doing, and that he used a defective appliance of his own selection.

The evidence of Lewis is immaterial in the view we take of the appeal, as it has no bearing on the second issue.

No error.

DILLON v. BROEKER. (No. 28.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 17, 1919.)

1. RECORDS ⇨9(3)—TORRENS LAW—PURPOSE.

The Torrens Law was enacted, in view of §§ 1-28, to secure, by a decree of court, a title impregnable against attack, to make a permanent and complete record of the exact status of the title, with all liens, incumbrances, and claims against it, and to protect registered owner against all claims or demands not noted on the book for the registration of titles.

2. RECORDS ⇨9(2) — TORRENS LAW—CONSTRUCTION.

Torrens Law, being remedial and not in derogation of common right, will be liberally construed according to its intent so as to advance the remedy and repress the evil.

3. RECORDS ⇨9(1)—TORRENS LAW —"VOLUNTARY TRANSACTION."

A contract to convey is a voluntary transaction within Torrens Law, § 10, requiring voluntary transactions affecting title to be noted in book for registration of titles.

4. RECORDS ⇨9(1)—TORRENS LAW—"CLAIM ADVERSE TO THE TITLE OF THE REGISTERED OWNER."

A contract to convey registered land is a claim adverse to title of registered owner within Torrens Law, § 25, providing for filing of affidavit by person having a "claim . . . adverse to the title of the registered owner."

5. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE ⇨12 — GROUND FOR REFUSAL—TORRENS TITLE—NONCOMPLIANCE WITH STATUTE.

Where land is registered under the Torrens Law, purchaser, who has not caused contract to convey to be noted in book for registration of titles, as required by section 10, and who has not made and filed an affidavit of his claim under section 25, is not entitled to specific performance of the contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Washington County; Devin, Judge.

Action by H. T. Dillon against Carl Broeker. Judgment of dismissal, and plaintiff excepts and appeals. Affirmed.

This is an action to compel specific performance of a contract to convey land, the defendant herein being the registered owner of the land under the Torrens Law. Pub. Laws 1913, c. 90.

The plaintiff admitted upon the trial that his contract had not been registered under the Torrens Law, and that the affidavit required by section 25 of said law had not been filed.

The jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Did the defendant contract in writing to convey to plaintiff the land described in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

"(2) Did plaintiff, within the time provided in said contract, notify the defendant that he would take said land, and on his part do all things required of him to entitle him to a conveyance of said land by defendant? Answer: Yes.

"(3) Has plaintiff at all times been ready, able, and willing to perform said contract on his part, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

"(4) Did defendant refuse to perform said contract and to convey said land, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

"(5) Was summons duly issued and attachment duly issued and levied on the land described in the complaint, and docketed and indexed in the office of the clerk of the superior court within three days, and were notices of summons and attachment duly published as required by law, and complaint filed, all prior to any transfer of title to or conveyance of said land by defendant? Answer: Yes."

The defendant moved to dismiss the action before the verdict. The court did not then rule upon the motion to dismiss, but reserved the same, and upon the coming in of the verdict allowed the motion and dismissed the action for noncompliance with the Torrens Law, and the plaintiff excepted and appealed.

Small, MacLean, Bragaw & Rodman, of Washington, N. C., for appellant.

Ward & Grimes, of Washington, N. C., for appellee.

ALLEN, J. The Torrens Law is comparatively new in this state, having been enacted in 1913 (chapter 90, Laws 1913), and it marks so wide a departure from the principles before existent, regulating the acquisition of titles to land or any interest therein, that but little, if any, assistance can be had in determining its proper construction by recurrence to former statutes and decisions.

It was first adopted in Australia in 1857 at the instance of Sir Robert Torrens, which accounts for its name, and is now a part of the statute law of many of the states of this country.

As stated in Devlin on Deeds, vol. 3, §§ 1439, 1440:

"The object of the system is, first, to secure by a decree of court, or other similar proceedings, a title which shall be impregnable against any attack, and, when this title is once determined, to provide that all subsequent transfers, incumbrances, or proceedings affecting the title shall be placed on a page of the register and marked on the memorial of title. The object is to secure the evidence of title exclusively by a certificate issuing from public authority.

"When title has been registered, the owner who desires to sell produces his original certificate, as he would the certificate of stock in a corporation, and the buyer may safely purchase on the faith of what the certificate shows. If a sale has been effected, the old certificate is surrendered and a new one received in its place. Under this system title to land is not conveyed by a deed, as such, but only by the registration of the transfer, as in the case of the sale of the shares of stock in a corporation, and the deed if made, is considered as nothing more than a contract between the parties by which the officer intrusted with the duty is authorized to make the transfer. As many times as a sale is made the old certificate is surrendered and a new one given in return. If a mortgage is executed, the transaction is noted on the certificate [and on record] and when it is paid its release is likewise noted. If a trust is created, proper indorsements are made; in a word, the object of the system is to make the certificate the complete repository of all that may affect the title, as there is only one certificate of title on file at any time which shows the state of the title, and to what extent, if any, it is affected by incumbrances."

[1, 2] It was with this object in view—to secure by a decree of court a title impregnable against any attack, and to make a permanent record of the exact status of the title with all liens, incumbrances, and claims against it—that the statute was enacted, which is not in derogation of common right, but is a remedial statute and to be liberally construed, according to its intent "so as to advance the remedy and repress the evil." Lookout Co. v. Gold, 167 N. C. 68, 83 S. E. 3.

When we turn to the statute we find the first nine sections devoted to procedure, and to declaring the effect of the decree at the time of its entry. In the tenth section the county commissioners are required to furnish a book to the register of deeds, "to be called registration of titles, in which said register shall enroll, register and index, as hereinafter provided, the decree of title hereinbefore mentioned and the copy of the plot contained in said petition, and all subsequent transfers of title, and note all voluntary or involuntary transactions in any wise affecting the title to said land, authorized to be entered thereon." It also directs the register to issue "an owner's certificate of title" and prescribes the form.

Section 11 requires that all certificates be numbered, "and a separate page or more, with appropriate space for subsequent entries, shall be devoted to each title in the registration of titles book for said county."

Sections 12 to 25 regulate the transfers of title in whole or in part, and the creation of liens, trusts, equitable interests, tax sales, etc., with provision for noting on the book for registration of titles instruments elsewhere registered.

Section 25 provides that every registered owner under the act with certain exceptions not material to this appeal, shall "hold the land, free from any and all adverse claims, rights or incumbrances not noted on the certificate of title," and, further:

"Any person making any claim to or asserting any lien or charge upon registered land existing at the initial registry of the same and not shown upon the register, or adverse to the title of the registered owner, and for which no other provision is herein made for asserting the same in the registry of titles may make an affidavit thereof setting forth his interest, right, title, lien or demand and how and under whom derived, and the character and nature thereof. The affidavit shall state his place of residence and designate a place at which all notices relating thereto may be served. Upon the filing of such affidavit in the office of the clerk of the superior court the latter shall order a note thereof as in the case of charges or incumbrances, and the same shall be entered by the register of deeds. Action shall be brought upon such claim within six months after the entry of such note, unless for cause shown the clerk shall extend the time. Upon failure to commence such action within the time prescribed therefor the clerk shall order a cancellation of such note."

Section 27 renders adverse possession of no effect against the registered owner, and section 28:

"The registration shall be the only operative act to transfer or affect the title to registered land, and shall date from the time the writing, instrument or record to be registered is duly filed in the office of the register of deeds, subject to the provisions of this act; no voluntary or involuntary transaction shall affect the title to registered lands until registered in accordance with the provisions of this act: Provided, that all mortgages, deeds, surrendered and canceled certificates, when new certificates are issued for the land so deeded, the other paper writings, if any, pertaining to and affecting the registered estate or estates herein referred to, shall be filed by the register of deeds for reference and information, but the registration of titles book shall be and constitute sole and conclusive legal evidence of title."

The other sections of the act have no bearing on the question now before us. This summary of the act not only manifests a purpose on the part of the General Assembly to establish a title in the registered owner, impregnable against attack at the time of the decree, but also to protect him against all claims or demands not noted on the book for the registration of titles, and to make that book a complete record and the only conclusive evidence of the title.

In section 10 all voluntary and involuntary transactions affecting the title must be noted on the book. In section 14:

"All registered incumbrances, rights or adverse claims affecting the estate represented thereby shall continue to be noted, not only upon the certificate of title in the registration book, but also upon the owner's certificate, until same shall have been released or discharged. And in the event of second or other subsequent voluntary incumbrances the holder of the certificate may be required to produce such certificate for the entry thereon or attachment thereto of the note of such subsequent charge or incumbrance as provided by section twenty of this act."

In section 25 any person making any claim "adverse to the title of the registered owner" is required to file an affidavit before the clerk, who must notify the register that he may note the claim on the book for the registration of titles, and he must then bring action on his claim within six months, unless the clerk extends the time for good cause shown, such as the claim not being due or other good reason made to appear, and if he fails to bring action the note of his claim is canceled. This is as to a claim against the registered owner, and not one against a purchaser from him.

In section 28:

"No voluntary or involuntary transaction shall affect the title to registered lands until registered in accordance with the provisions of this act," and "the registration of titles book shall be and constitute sole and conclusive legal evidence of title."

[3-5] The contract to convey on which the plaintiff declares is a "voluntary transaction" affecting the title, which section 10 says shall be noted, which has not been done. It is a claim adverse to the registered title, and under section 25, in order to maintain an action, he must make an affidavit, and have notation made, which he has failed to do.

And under section 28 registration under the act is the only "operative act" to "affect the title to registered lands"; no voluntary act "shall affect the title to registered lands until registered in accordance with the provisions of this act," and "the registration of titles book shall be and constitute sole and conclusive legal evidence of title."

These provisions clearly indicate the purpose to require all claims against the title to be registered under the act, and to recognize no other, and the fact that the statute was enacted by the General Assembly with full knowledge that for near 100 years as to mortgages, and for 30 years as to deeds, these instruments were valid between the parties without registration, and invalid as to creditors and purchasers only from registration, and that no distinction is made in the statute in favor of creditors and purchasers, is strong evidence of the intent to place the owner of the registered title, creditors, and purchasers on the same footing as to registration under the act, and that no claim against either can be maintained until the act is complied with.

It follows necessarily that the judgment must be affirmed, as the plaintiff admits his failure in this respect.

Affirmed.

WINBOURNE v. INTERSTATE COOPERAGE CO. (No. 21.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 24, 1919.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇐123—LIABILITY OF MASTER FOR INJURIES TO SERVANT BY DEFECTIVE SIMPLE TOOL.

In order for liability to attach to a master for injuries to a servant through the use of simple, everyday tools, it must appear that injury resulted from a lack of such tools or defects therein which the master was required to remedy in the reasonable and proper discharge of his duties, and that the lack or defect was of a kind from which some appreciable substantial injury might reasonably have been expected to occur.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇐123 — MASTER NOT LIABLE FOR INJURY FROM AX HEAD SLIPPING FROM HANDLE.

The employer of a carpenter to demolish cars on a logging road, injured when the head from the ax his assistant was using to cut off bolts with a cold chisel slipped off and hit his foot, was not liable for such injury, due to the ax head not having been tight on the handle, nor for failure to furnish a hammer for striking.

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; Devin, Judge.

Action by E. W. Winbourne against the Interstate Cooperage Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

The action is to recover damages for physical injury, caused by alleged negligence of defendant in not supplying plaintiff, an employé, with sufficient and proper tools with which to do his work. On denial of liability and plea of contributory negligence, there was verdict for plaintiff and assessing damages at $550. Judgment on the verdict for plaintiff, and defendant appealed, assigning for error, chiefly, the refusal of the motion for nonsuit.

Small, MacLean, Bragaw & Rodman, of Washington, N. C., for appellant.

Ward & Grimes, of Washington, N. C., for appellee.

HOKE, J. [1] There were facts in evidence tending to show that, in August, 1917, plaintiff, employed by defendant for the purpose, was engaged in taking down some cars, situate on a logging road, a few miles out from Belhaven, N. C.; that they were old cars, and, it being desirable to save as much of the iron as possible in shape for further use, it was not infrequently required to cut the iron bolts from the rods used in bracing the woodwork of the cars and serving to hold the frames together; that plaintiff, a carpenter of skill and experience, 63 or 64 years of age, having the ordinary tools for his work, which he was to use as required on the present job, had taken down one or two of the cars, when, finding that he was not making satisfactory progress for lack of a helper and adequate tools for the undertaking, he applied for an assistant and proper tools, and was authorized to procure the help needed, and was given further tools, which he claimed were fit and proper, to wit, a cold chisel and a hack saw frame and blades for cutting iron and a Stillson wrench, according to defendants, this last being the only tool plaintiff had specifically mentioned, and that the hardware store was directed to let him have the tools he selected, and the cold chisel, hack saw, frame and blades were both new and fitted for the work; that, after he, with his assistant, one Wallace, had been engaged on the work for two or three days, while plaintiff was holding the cold chisel in place to cut off an iron bolt, plaintiff directed Wallace to strike the same with an ax of the company which plaintiff says he had found out at the cars, and, as Wallace struck with the ax, it came off the handle, the eye of the ax striking plaintiff's foot and making a bruise thereon which resulted in painful and protracted injury, from which he still suffers. A perusal of our decisions on the subject will show that, in order for liability to attach, in case of simple, everyday tools, it must appear, among other things, that the injury has resulted from a lack of such tools or defects therein, which the employer is required to remedy, in the proper and reasonable discharge of his duties, and that the lack or defect complained of and made the basis of the charge is of a kind from which some appreciable and substantial injury may be reasonably expected to occur. Thus, in the recent case of Rogerson v. Hontz, 174 N. C. 27, 93 S. E. 376, where plaintiff was seriously injured by reason of a defective cant hook which he was using to load and place heavy sawlogs, and of which defect the employer was fully aware, the court, in setting aside an order of nonsuit in the case, and in reference to the rule of liability, said:

"On the facts as now presented, the evidence tends to show that this cant hook was an implement suitable to the work and which the employer should supply; that, while simple in itself, it was designed, by leverage, to give the workman more power; that he was engaged in loading and unloading heavy logs from cars, rough work, and where he was frequently liable to be in position that, if the hook slipped its hold or the handle broke, severe injuries were not improbable; and, applying the principles of the case referred to and others of like import, the issue must be referred to the jury on the question whether the tool was defective, was such defect known to the employer, and was it of a kind which threatened substantial injury in its use."

Again, in another very similar case in the same volume (King v. Railroad, 174 N. C. 39, 93 S. E. 378), stating the principle as it generally prevails in such cases, it was again said:

"In Rogerson v. Hontz, at the present term, the court has held, in approving the decision of Wright v. Thompson, 171 N. C. 88 [87 S. E. 963], and other cases, that where an employ  was injured by reason of defective tools supplied him, the employer was not necessarily relieved of all responsibility merely because the tools were of simple structure, but in case there was negligent default in the respect suggested on the part of the employer, and the defect was of a kind importing menace of substantial injury, having due regard to the nature of the work and the manner of doing it, and it was further shown that the employer knew of such defect, or should have found it out under the duty of inspection ordinarily incumbent upon him in such cases, that under certain conditions liability might attach."

And, in the cases of Wright v. Thompson, 171 N. C. 88, 87 S. E. 963, Young v. Fiber Co., 159 N. C. 375, 74 N. C. 1051, Mincey v. Railroad, 161 N. C. 467-471, 77 S. E. 673, Reld v. Rees, 155 N. C. 230, 71 S. E. 315, Mercer v. Railroad, 154 N. C. 399, 70 S. E. 742, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 1002, and Cotton v. Railroad, 149 N. C. 227, 62 S. E. 1093, all of them, so far as examined, where recovery was sustained for lack of simple, ordinary tools or for defects therein, it was shown that the injury resulted from the breach of duty reasonably incumbent on the employer under all the facts of the case, and that the defect was one from which some substantial injury was not unlikely to occur. Accordingly, a further examination of our authorities will disclose that where these elements or either of them are lacking, though there may have been some technical breach of duty, no actionable wrong will be imputed. Thus, in Dunn v. Railroad, 151 N. C. 313, 66 S. E. 134, a case almost exactly similar to that before us, an employ  was injured by a hammer flying off the helve, which he had been using several hours, giving him every opportunity to observe its condition, relief was denied. And, in the more recent case of Morris v. Railroad, 171 N. C. 533, 88 S. E. 818, a plaintiff, an employ  of defendant company, was using a heavy hammer, driving spikes into cross-ties to hold the rails secure, he was standing in an uneven position, with one foot on a soft or shelving pile of dirt; the hammer, from continuous use, had become very slick on the head, and the employ  had been promised a new one. In driving a spike in the position indicated, the hammer slipped off, jerking the employ  down and causing a severe and painful injury to his back, for which he sued. In sustaining an order for nonsuit in the case, the Chief Justice thus clearly states the distinction to which we are adverting:

"The whole subject has been very recently reviewed * * * in Wright v. Thompson, ante, 88, with full citation of authorities. In that case, in repairing a dredge whose crane and dipper had become loosened, the plaintiff, in driving in the driftpin to fasten them, struck it with a hammer, when a piece of steel from the defective and broken driftpin flew off and struck the plaintiff in his eye and put it out. We set aside the nonsuit because it was shown that the driftpin furnished the plaintiff had been broken off and had remained so at least 30 days, and the plaintiff had notified the foreman of its defective condition. Injury might reasonably have been expected from such cause. That was certainly a very different case from the present. Here the tool was a hammer, and it could not be anticipated that on striking the spike to drive it into the cross-tie the hammer would slip, nor that by its going 2 inches further the plaintiff's back would be sprained. His standing upon a loose mound of earth also certainly was a mere incident, and could not have been expected to cause injury."

[2] On a proper application of the principles applied in these cases and the facts appearing in the record, we are of opinion that no recovery can be had by plaintiff, and defendant's motion for nonsuit should have been allowed. True, defendant, when called back to the stand, says, in general terms, "that he couldn't get no tools, and went over there two or three times and begged for tools," but in his principal examination he states very clearly that he had and was using a cold chisel, a hack saw, both frame and blades, all new, and that these were the tools desirable and suitable for the work in which he was engaged. As to the "bolt clipper," while this seems to be a tool recognized and sold in the trade, we do not find that such a tool was in use in this kind of work, nor do we recall that any witness had ever seen one large enough to cut three-fourths bolts, the size that plaintiff was dealing with in this instance, and, in reference to the ax that Wallace was using at the time to drive the cold chisel, that plaintiff had never made any complaint that he needed a different tool for the purpose, and if he had, the injury was not on account of any difference that might have existed between a hammer and an ax, but because the ax had not been made tight and secure on the handle, a defect that might just as likely have developed had he been using a hammer. He had found the ax there, and had been using it for several days, and had every opportunity to put the ax in better shape and failed to do it.

On consideration of his entire statement and the other uncontradicted testimony, you are forced to the conclusion that plaintiff's injuries are attributable to his own default or that of his collaborer in not keeping his ax in safer condition. As he says himself: "I hadn't looked at the ax; I suppose I didn't take time."

This will be certified, that the verdict and judgment be set aside and defendant's motion for nonsuit be allowed.

Reversed.

RAGAN v. STEPHENS. (No. 112.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 24, 1919.)

USURY  $\Leftrightarrow$  184—DOUBLE INTEREST RECOVERABLE WHEN INTEREST PAID; NOT PAID, INTEREST FORFEITED.

Under Revisal 1905, § 1951, double amount of usury is recoverable as a penalty only where usurious interest has been actually paid; the penalty, where usury has been charged but not paid, being merely the elimination of the usury and the forfeiture of the interest.

Appeal from Superior Court, Chatham County; Kerr, Judge.

Action by H. R. Ragan against A. J. Stephens. From judgment for plaintiff, giving him insufficient relief, he excepts and appeals. Modified.

This is an action on three notes; one for $903 being the only one as to which any question is raised by the appeal. The defendant pleaded usury, and the jury found that $100 of the $903 note is usurious. The defendant has paid nothing to the plaintiff. His honor rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $903, without interest, subject to a credit of $200, being double the amount of the usury charged in the note, and the plaintiff excepted and appealed.

W. D. Siler, of Siler City, and J. S. Manning, of Raleigh, for appellant.

A. C. Ray, of Pittsboro, and H. E. Norris, of Raleigh, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. The statute relating to usury (Revisal, § 1951) makes a clear distinction between money charged and money paid on a usurious transaction. As to the first, the penalty is the elimination of the usury and the forfeiture of the interest; and as to the second, when usurious interest is actually paid, the additional penalty of recovery of double the amount of the usury. This is not only the plain language of the statute, but it is the construction placed upon it in several of our decisions. In Rushing v. Bivens, 132 N. C. 273, 43 S. E. 798, the court says:

"We think that, before the plaintiff can maintain the action, he must pay the usury in money or money's worth. He has done neither. He has paid nothing. It is well settled that the penalty is not incurred by the charging of usurious interest; it is by taking the usury that the party incurs the penalty, and no action lies therefor until it is paid. Godfrey v. Leigh, 28 N. C. 390; Stedman v. Bland, 26 N. C. 296. The renewal of the note to Griffin falls very far short of the payment of the original debt. If the plaintiff had given in payment and discharge of the note of a third person, it would have been a good payment. Pritchard v. Meekins, 98 N. C. 244 [3 S. E. 484]. The plaintiff may never pay the renewal notes."

And again, in Riley v. Sears, 154 N. C. 521, 70 S. E. 1002:

"While we hold that the notes sued on are void, because based entirely on a usurious consideration, we think that on the pleadings the demand by the receiver for double the amount of the usurious interest should be disallowed. Both our statutes and authoritative interpretations of it are to the effect that 'usury must be paid in money or money's worth before an action can be maintained therefor, and the renewal of a note, given for usury, does not amount to such payment.' Rushing v. Bivens, 132 N. C. 273 [43 S. E. 798]."

It follows, therefore, as no money has been paid, that the $100 of usury must be taken from the note, and that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the balance, $803, without interest. The judgment will be modified in accordance with this opinion.

Modified. Costs to be divided.

NIX v. STATE. (No. 1133.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 2, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW §522(1), 736(2) — WHEN CONFESSION ADMISSIBLE.

The court did not err in admitting evidence of confessions made by the defendant.

2. CRIMINAL LAW §717 — WHEN MISTRIAL PROPERLY DENIED BECAUSE COUNSEL READ FROM LAW REPORTS.

The extracts read from a volume of law reports to the court in the presence and hearing of the jury were not of such character as to require the court, upon motion of counsel for the accused, to grant a mistrial, as they were not so inflammatory in character as to arouse prejudice against the accused, nor did they seek to introduce material facts connected with the case which had not been properly introduced in evidence.

3. CRIMINAL LAW §1044 — REMARKS OF SOLICITOR GENERAL NOT GROUND FOR REVERSAL, NO MOTION FOR MISTRIAL BEING MADE.

Other remarks made by the solicitor general in the course of his argument to the jury did not require a reversal of the judgment refusing a new trial; no motion for a mistrial having been made at the time in the trial court.

4. CRIMINAL LAW §719(1) — WHEN INTRODUCTION OF MATERIAL FACT NOT IN RECORD IS ERROR.

The facts not in the record, which it is improper for counsel to introduce in his argument, are material facts which might be considered by the jury as entering into the determination of the main question of facts before them as to defendant's guilt.

Atkinson and Hill, JJ., dissenting in part.

Error from Superior Court, Muscogee County; G. H. Howard, Judge.

Bartow Nix was convicted of murder, his motion for a new trial was denied, and he brings error. Affirmed.

See, also, 22 Ga. App. 136, 95 S. E. 534.

Geo. C. Palmer and Gilbert W. Fincher, both of Columbus, for plaintiff in error.

C. F. McLaughlin, Sol. Gen., of Columbus, Clifford Walker, Atty. Gen., and M. C. Bennett, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BECK, P. J. Bartow Nix was tried under an indictment charging him with the murder of C. L. Alexander and Jesse Everidge, and the jury trying the case returned a verdict of guilty; there being no recommendation made by them. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, which upon the hearing thereof the court overruled, and the defendant excepted.

[1] 1. The original motion contained the general grounds. In the first ground of the amendment to the motion complaint is made of the admission in evidence of a confession made by the defendant. This evidence, which is set forth in the motion in the form of questions and answers, shows that the prisoner was taken from Muscogee county to Macon, Ga., where he was confined in jail. After he was in jail, according to the testimony of James Palmer, the witness whose testimony was admitted over objection, the accused made a complete confession, sustaining the charge as made in the indictment. In response to questions propounded to him in the course of making the confession, the prisoner fully and in detail stated the circumstances of the killing. This confession was made first in a very short time after the arrival at the Bibb county jail, about 9 o'clock in the evening, and the witness Palmer then testified to a confession substantially the same as made by the accused the next morning. The witness, after having testified to the confession, was interrogated by counsel for the accused as to the circumstances under which it was made, and this questioning of the witness elicited the testimony following:

"Q. What did you say to him on your way to Macon? A. We talked all the way along. He never talked. I told him, before he ever went to talking, that there was one thing sure—that he never would no more in this world do his wife and children any more good. Q. You told him that, and that very naturally frightened him? A. I don't know whether it did or not. Q. You don't suppose that frightened him at all? A. It didn't seem to. Q. Up to that time he never had made any confession, had he? A. No, sir. Q. How come him to open up in the jail and tell you about it? What was said to him there? A. He just opened it himself. Q. Nobody never said anything to him at all? A. Of course he went to talking. Q. Who brought up the conversation? Tell exactly just what you said to him. A. I told him just exactly what I said. Q. No; you haven't. What caused him to talk over there? A. He just went—we all set down there, and he just opened up and went to talking, the same thing over. Q. What same thing over? A. About how he killed him. Q. Thought you said he never had told it before that? A. Oh, I told you before we went over there—before we got to Buena Vista. Q. I understood you to say, when you got to the jail you tried to make him sit down, and he stood up, and that was when he first told you how it happened. A. That was one time. Q. Where did he first tell you? A. Between here and Buena Vista, when I first went through there, he connected Will Howard; and Culver and Clements wanted me to phone back here and get them locked up, and I wouldn't do it, because I didn't believe it. Q. He didn't tell you then he killed them? A. Yes, sir. Q. What caused him to tell it? A. When I told him about his folks."

Defendant's counsel moved to exclude this evidence of a confession, on the ground that, in view of the testimony of the witness on cross-examination, the confession was not freely and voluntarily made, but was induced by fear upon the part of the defendant, generated in his mind by the statement of Palmer to the defendant, before the alleged confession was made, "that one thing was certain, he would never in this world do his wife and children any more good." The court overruled the motion to exclude the testimony, and admitted it. We are of the opinion that the court properly overruled the motion. This confession was made on the next day, when the prisoner was safely lodged in the jail of Bibb county, and apparently safe from any danger whatever. Whether the confession made immediately after the statement to the prisoner, which we have quoted above, would have been admissible, had not substantially the same confession been made the next day in the jail, we do not now rule.

Another witness, Clements, testified to a confession made by the accused on the way from Columbus to Macon, Ga., and also testified in connection that he made the same confession to himself, to Palmer, and Culver after he was in jail at Macon. The statement and confession made by the prisoner was made in response to questions propounded to him. On cross-examination this witness testified as follows:

"Q. You say, going to Buena Vista in the automobile, you commenced talking to him about it? A. Yes, sir. Q. You told him that Albert had told it all, and he had just as well tell it? A. Told him Albert had owned up to it; yes, sir. Q. And he had just as well own up to it? A. Yes, sir."

This testimony of the witness Clements as to the confession made by the prisoner was also objected to, and counsel for the defendant moved to exclude the same on the ground that it appeared that the confession was not freely and voluntarily made, but that the accused was induced to make it by the statement that "Albert had owned up to it, and he might as well own up to it." The person referred to as Albert was Albert Nix, who was jointly indicted with the accused. The motion to exclude the testimony was overruled. In this the court did not err. In view of all the facts and circumstances, we think it was a question for the jury to decide as to whether the confession was freely and voluntarily made. The motion to exclude the testimony of Clements included the confession made in the jail on the next morning after the arrival, as well as the confession made on the way to Macon the day before, and was not directed solely to the admissibility of the alleged confession immediately following the statement made to the prisoner that Albert had confessed and he might as well "own up." Nor can we say that the statement made by Clements tended to induce the confession. There was no promise that it would be better for him, or that it would inure in any way to his benefit for him, to make a confession. The statement that one jointly indicted had confessed might have caused the prisoner to despair of making a successful defense, but we do not see anything in the circumstances to induce him to confess to anything that was not true, in order to derive a benefit from the confession. In the case of Dixon v. State, 116 Ga. 186, 42 S. E. 357, it was said:

"Though evidence of an incriminating statement made by a prisoner to another shortly after the latter had offered an inducement extending a hope of benefit is not admissible, another and entirely different incriminating statement, made hours afterwards to the same person under circumstances tending to show that it was purely voluntary and not elicited by such inducement, may be proved; the question whether or not the statement was in fact free and voluntary being one for determination by the jury."

And in the case of Waycaster v. State, 136 Ga. 95, 70 S. E. 883, where the circumstances under which the confession was made tended more strongly than in the present case to show inducement to the confession, the court held that, in view of the time that had elapsed between the time of the statement made by an officer, alleged to be an inducement, and the confession offered in evidence, it was a question for the jury to decide whether or not the testimony of the witness offered to prove the confession should be considered by them. See, also, Wilson v. State, 19 Ga. App. 759, 82 S. E. 309. The evidence of confession was prima facie admissible, and there was no complaint that the jury was not properly instructed and cautioned in regard to receiving the confession of guilt, and that it was their duty to reject the confession entirely, if it appeared that it was not freely and voluntarily made.

[2] 2. During his argument the solicitor general read in the presence and hearing of the jury the following extract from the opinion in the case of Eberhart v. State, 47 Ga. 598:

"It may be a sign of a tender heart, but it is also a sign of one not under proper regulation. Society demands that crime shall be punished and criminals warned, and the false humanity that starts and shudders when the ax of justice is ready to strike is a dangerous element for the peace of society. We have had too much of this mercy. It is not true mercy. It only looks to the criminal; but we must insist upon mercy to society, upon justice to the poor woman whose blood cries out against her murderers. That criminals go unpunished is a disgrace to our civilization, and we have reaped the fruits of it in the frequency with which bloody deeds occur. A stern, unbending, unflinching administration of the penal laws, without regard to position or sex, as it is the highest mark of civilization, is also the surest mode to prevent the commission of offenses."

He also read the following extract from another decision of the same court, in Hawkins v. State, 25 Ga. 207, 71 Am. Dec. 166:

"Human life is sacrificed at this day, throughout the land, with more indifference than the life of a dog, especially if it be a good dog. Scott may not have been a good citizen; still he was a human creature, under the protection of the laws of the state; and even in his person the punitive power of the government must be vindicated."

The defendant thereupon made a motion for a mistrial, on the ground that the reading of the foregoing extracts in the presence and hearing of the jury was prejudicial to the interests of the defendant and tended to deprive him of a fair and impartial trial. The court overruled this motion, but made the following statement to the jury:

"An objection was made to the reading from some volume of the court report by the solicitor general—some report. The solicitor general was reading from these volumes to the court. The court instructs you that you take no law from the counsel in this case. The court will charge you fully as to the law of the case, and that you should not take the law either from the solicitor general or from counsel for the defendant."

The court did not err in overruling this motion for a mistrial. The reading from a Supreme Court decision of remarks like these may not be helpful to the jury in their effort to arrive at the truth from the evidence in the case; but we do not think that the jury's hearing of these extracts could tend to inflame their minds or arouse in their minds prejudice against the defendant. This differs from cases where it has been held that a mistrial should have been granted where inflammatory remarks were made, and where material facts or circumstances tending to prejudice the cause of the defendant, not contained in the evidence, were stated and brought to the attention of the jury in the argument of counsel for the state. Counsel for plaintiff in error does not undertake to specify the particular passages in the extracts quoted which he criticizes as being inflammatory and incendiary. Certain sentences in the extract quoted, it seems to us, could have been used with perfect propriety by the solicitor general in his argument to the jury. He could certainly say with propriety:

"A stern, unbending, unflinching administration of the penal laws, without regard to position or sex, as it is the highest mark of civilization, is also the surest mode to prevent the commission of offenses."

He could appeal to the jury to show no mercy to crime, but to unflinchingly administer the criminal laws. If the passages were objectionable at all, they were objectionable upon the ground that some of the statements apparently introduced facts; as, for instance, the sentence beginning with the statement that—

"Human life is sacrificed at this day, throughout the land, with more indifference than the life of a dog," etc.

Or again the statement:

"That criminals go unpunished is a disgrace to our civilization, and we have reaped the fruits of it in the frequency with which bloody deeds occur."

But we desire to call attention to the fact that these extracts were read from decisions that were delivered something like a half century ago, and referred to the state of society then; and if counsel for defendant had really thought that these remarks were at all inflammatory or incendiary in their character or prejudiced their client, he surely could have called attention to the fact that the judges who rendered these opinions were speaking of a state of society that existed a half century ago, and, in one case, considerably over a half century ago, and the judges who uttered them have long been moldering in the ground and their bodies have returned to dust. When the later of these two decisions was rendered, we had 47 volumes of Georgia Reports; it was the decision in the case of Eberhart v. State. Today we have 148 volumes. And the older of the two decisions, Hawkins v. State, was rendered before the Civil War. If counsel thought that the reading of these extracts from our decisions tended to incite the jury, he could easily have asked from what decisions they were read (if he did not know at that time), and could have called the attention of the jury to the date at which the judge was speaking, and the jury could very easily have seen that the state of society that the judge was speaking about was the state of society that existed a half century or more ago. Suppose that counsel had read from some decision in a criminal case, reported in one of the English reports, and the judge used similar remarks about the state of society and the frequency of crime, and it appeared that he was speaking of the state of society that existed two centuries or more ago; could it be claimed that the minds of the jury would be inflamed by reading such statements in their presence? Or suppose that counsel for the state, as a part of his address to the jury, had read or recited passages from some chapter in the Book of Isaiah, wherein the prophet had bewailed the prevalence of sin and misery and crime and bloodshed, and had read the scathing denunciations of these offenses against

God and against righteousness; surely this could not be ground for granting a mistrial. It would not be said that facts were introduced by the reading of these statements which were calculated to injure the defendant. Attempts to arouse indignation against crime are permissible. In the case of W. & A. Railroad Co. v. York, 128 Ga. 687, 58 S. E. 183, which was an action for damages, counsel for the plaintiff, in the course of his argument before the jury, used the following language:

"Man is the noblest creation of God. God made no greater creation than man. He is the grandest product of divine handicraft; and He hedged about him the law, 'Thou shalt not kill.' God told Cain that the blood of his brother Abel cried to him from the ground. The most eloquent sermon I ever heard in my life was from the text, 'The statutes of the Lord are right.' 'Thou shalt not kill' is the statute of the Lord God Almighty. It was made for the protection of the lord of creation—for man; and it applies to a railroad corporation just as much as it does to an individual. If a man is dead by the reckless negligence of the servants and agents of the railroad corporation, the full consequences to him are the same; he is just as dead as if he had died by the uplifted and directed and murderous hand of his brother man. The shedding of innocent blood is just the same—just the same. Our land is defiled when innocent blood is shed therein, whether it be by the hand of a railroad corporation or whether it be by the murderer's hand or some one contending in a death grapple with his brother man; and the curse of God, which is charged against that, is upon it just the same. Gentlemen of the jury, when George W. York died on that public crossing in the city of Acworth, last October was a year ago, his innocent blood stained the right of way of this defendant."

Whereupon counsel for the defendant moved the court to declare a mistrial upon the ground that the remarks by counsel for the plaintiff were improper. He refused to declare a mistrial, and exception was taken to this ruling. In discussing the ground of the motion for a new trial in which this exception is dealt with, this court said:

"We do not think the remarks of counsel were of such character as to require the court to declare a mistrial. A mere flight of oratory of counsel, when addressing the jury, is not ground for mistrial. Counsel may bring to his use in the discussion of the case well-established historical facts, and may allude to such principles of divine law relating to transactions of men as may be appropriate to the case. It is not impassioned oratory which the law condemns and discredits in the advocate, but it is the introduction of facts not disclosed by the evidence, which requires the judge to use his power of declaring a mistrial. In this connection, see W. & A. R. Co. v. Cox, 115 Ga. 719 [42 S. E. 74]; Patterson v. State, 124 Ga. 409 [52 S. E. 534]; Taylor v. State, 121 Ga. 354 (7) [49 S. E. 303]; McNabb v. Lockhart, 18 Ga. 507, and cit. An examination of the remarks of counsel which are complained of will show that there was no effort to introduce any fact not disclosed by the evidence."

[4] Here, as will be observed, the court states the rule to be that "it is the introduction of facts not disclosed by the evidence which requires the judge to use his power of declaring a mistrial." And the facts not in the record, which the court is ruling that it is improper for counsel to introduce in his argument, are material facts which might be considered by the jury as entering into a determination of the main question of fact before them; that is, whether in a criminal case the defendant on trial is guilty or not guilty. Now, who will suppose for a moment that what a judge said about the frequency of crime in the state of society which existed here before and immediately after the Civil War will be considered by the jury in making up their minds upon the evidence in the case before them? And counsel for the defendant could, in a word or two, have called attention to the date of these utterances; it cannot be imagined that the court would have refused him permission to do this, if he had asked it. At any rate, the statements in the opinions referred to were not of any facts which could have been connected with the facts of the case on trial, so as to influence the jury in their deliberations; and the denunciation of crime and the appeal for a righteous verdict and an unflinching administration of the law was not improper from any standpoint.

[3] 3. Complaint is made, in another ground of the motion for a new trial, that during the course of his argument to the jury the solicitor general turned to the defendant and in the presence and hearing of the jury said:

"Are you defending this case out of the money you got from the pockets of your victim?"

Counsel for the defendant immediately objected to this conduct upon the part of the state's counsel, and the court thereupon said:

"I don't think, Mr. Solicitor, it is a good idea to address your remarks to the man on trial. I think that is improper. Address your remarks to the jury. I think, when counsel asks defendant a question, that defendant's counsel has a right to reply to it."

While the remark of counsel for the state to the defendant in the presence of the jury was improper, we think that the court's saying to him that it was improper was of the character of a rebuke. To say to counsel in the presence of the jury, "Your conduct is improper," cannot be regarded otherwise than as a rebuke to counsel. And in view of this rebuke administered by the court, thereby showing to the jury that the remark of counsel was improper and that the court disapproved of it, we do not think that the improper remark of counsel requires the, grant of a new trial. Whether it would have been error to refuse the grant of a mistrial on motion by counsel is a different question not made in this record, as there was no motion made for a mistrial upon this ground.

The evidence authorized the verdict, and the court did not err in refusing a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

All the Justices concur; except

ATKINSON and HILL, JJ. (dissenting as to the ruling in the second division of the opinion of the court). The case of Styles v. State, 129 Ga. 425, 59 S. E. 249, 12 Ann. Cas. 176, was one complaining of the judgment of the trial court in refusing a new trial to the defendant after he had been convicted of murder. Shortly before the trial, Lyle had been tried in the same court, and, commenting upon the trial of that case, the Savannah Morning News published an editorial as follows:

"The Opinion of a Solicitor General.

"Commenting upon the outcome of the Lyle murder trial at Waycross, Solicitor General Bennett was quoted as saying: 'I have given the matter a great deal of thought, and I have come to the conclusion that human life is too cheap in this country, due to the fact that juries are too lax in enforcing the law.' Further along in his talk he said: 'There are entirely too many homicides in this and other counties. Take the Dominion of Canada, divided from this great country only by an imaginary line, and you will find that there are nearly 100 homicides in the United States to one in Canada. There is but one explanation. In Canada the law is enforced, and in the United States it is not. The law says that the punishment of a person convicted of murder shall be death, and it does seem to me that if this law were enforced, and the punishment meted out to persons where there is no doubt of their guilt, it would prove a great benefit, and deter others who are inclined to commit like crimes.' The foregoing is safe and sound doctrine. If it had the approval of juries generally, there wouldn't be an account of a homicide in the newspapers of this state every day or two. Only last Saturday we commented upon the need of a stricter enforcement of the law against carrying concealed weapons, the occasion being reports of two homicides in the state on the previous day. Yesterday there was another homicide at Macon, the victim having just been indicted for the alleged cause of the crime. As to the truth or falsity of the charge that led to the shooting, we do not undertake to express an opinion, but we do know that the law should have been permitted to take its course. We cannot have safety for life and property, if men are permitted to take the law into their own hands when they feel they have a grievance. As a rule there are two sides to every case, and the safety and well-being of society requires that a jury shall decide which is the right side, and measure out punishment to the guilty. It is impossible to predict where this thing is going to stop, if men are permitted to go about their daily duties carrying concealed weapons, which they use promptly on various degrees of provocation, because they believe that the danger of being punished is very remote. We do not comment on the Lyle trial, because it is probable that the accused will have to face a jury again within a very few days; but we are free to say that there are scores of persons in this state, guilty of shedding human blood, who would now be in the penitentiary, or would have paid the penalty of their crimes on the scaffold, if absolute justice had been meted out to them. And what is true as to this state is true as to about every other state. It is true, as Solicitor General Bennett says, life is so cheap in this country that it is a difficult matter to get a jury to find a verdict of guilty, even when the evidence of guilt is overwhelming. In Canada the law against murder is enforced vigorously and swiftly. The consequence is, the number of homicides is small in comparison with the number in this country. What is needed is a stirring of the consciences of the people. They must have impressed upon them the sacredness of human life. When they have a proper regard for it, juries will not be swayed by sentiment or seek excuses to avoid their duty."

The paper containing the above editorial was read by members of the jury after they had been impaneled to try Styles; and that fact, having come to the knowledge of the defendant and his counsel for the first time after rendition of the verdict, was made the basis of one of his grounds for motion for new trial. It was held, in effect, that the matter contained in the editorial got before the jury improperly, and, being calculated to prejudice the jurors against Styles, that it was error requiring a reversal for the judge to refuse a new trial based on that ground. In the course of the opinion it was said, among other things:

"An examination of the editorial will show clearly that it is argumentative in favor of convictions in capital cases such as the one on trial. Either a casual or a most scrupulous reading of the article will lead to that conclusion, and to none other. It was not only argumentative, but almost of coercive character, in that it criticized juries for failure to convict. The charge inferentially made was that the conditions in this country were such that jurors would not convict in murder cases, 'even where the evidence of guilt was overwhelming.' It was stated that the remedy needed was a 'stirring of the consciences of the people.' What effect this appeal actually had upon the minds of the jurors it is impossible to say. That it was an irregularity follows from the fact that the article was read by the jurors after they had qualified, without the knowledge or consent of the court, or of the defendant or his counsel. It was read after the jurors had been put upon their voir dire. Whether, after reading the article, the jurors would again have said that their minds were perfectly impartial between the state and the accused, or that there was no bias or prejudice resting upon their minds, either for or against the accused, we have no means of knowing. Those questions were not again put to the jurors. It is possible that the minds of the jurors may have been so influenced by the article as to render them unable to answer the statutory questions in such way as to leave them competent to try the accused. Again, treating the article as an address to the jurors, it would be improper for at least two reasons: First, because it was made by one not authorized to participate in the trial in an advisory or any other way; second, because it was made without the knowledge or consent of the defendant or his counsel, and there was no opportunity to reply. The possible harm to the defendant that could result from an editorial is incalculable. It was well said by Wood, J., in Cartwright v. State, 71 Miss. 82, 14 So. 526, that 'this method of communicating to and impressing upon the jury, or any member of it, the opinion of others, is open to the same condemnation which would be visited upon oral expressions of opinion touching a defendant, injected into the body of the jury by some designing intermeddler. The widely read and influential daily journal, speaking for, as well as to, the public, reflecting popular sentiment, as well as making it, must be held to be much more powerful in influencing the average man than any expression of opinion by a single, private individual.'

"It is insisted that the defendant could not have been injured, because the article did not make reference to the particular case on trial. The fact that the case is not specially named does not necessarily deprive the argument for convictions, as contained in the editorial, of its injurious effect. The argument made no exceptions, and was addressed to all prosecutions in murder cases, which in general terms embraced the case under consideration. The subject of the editorial was of the same class as the subject of the case on trial. The editorial was apparently from a disinterested source, and for that reason may have produced an effect even more harmful to the defendant than if the case had been specially named; for in the latter case the jury might at least have attributed to the writer the interest of a partisan. The whole tendency of the editorial was to play upon the passions and emotions of those who read it, and to encourage juries to convict in capital cases. An appeal of that character, whether made by a writer, an orator from the pulpit, or an actor upon the stage, may be made with such effect as to influence the mind while acting upon any particular matter, without direct reference thereto. When a juror enters upon the trial of a criminal case, the law contemplates his withdrawal from the public, and makes no provision for addresses to him from outside sources, for his entertainment or otherwise, which are calculated, directly or indirectly, to excite any passions or emotions with respect to the matter upon which he is to sit in judgment. Perfect impartiality in the juror is the object of the law. Anything not legitimately arising out of the trial of the case, which tends to destroy the impartiality of the juror, should be discountenanced. Whether beneficial to the state or to the accused, such things, upon the ground of irrelevancy, should be suppressed, and not given the opportunity of influencing the minds or exciting the passions of the jurors. Verdicts should be the result of calm deliberation, founded upon the law and evidence. The accomplishment of that object can never be assured where irrelevant things, which tend to destroy the impartiality of the jurors, are allowed to creep into the trial.

"We know of only three cases which have been before this court where it was argued that a new trial should have been granted upon the ground that the jurors, after having been impaneled, had been permitted to read newspapers. Fogarty v. State, 80 Ga. 450 [5 S. E. 782]; Flanagan v. State, 64 Ga. 52; Hunter v. State, 43 Ga. 483 (6). In the two cases first mentioned this court declined to interfere with the discretion of the trial court in refusing to grant a new trial, because it was not shown that any harm had resulted to the defendant by the reading of the newspaper. In the Fogarty Case the opinion recites that 'the record discloses that the copies of the paper which the jurors were reading contained nothing about the case, except the fact that the case was on trial.' It was not made to appear in either of those cases, other than as just stated with reference to the Fogarty's Case, what the paper contained, and therefore it was not affirmatively shown by the movant, upon whom the burden rested to show error, that anything appeared in the paper which it was improper for the jury to see. Those cases were different from the case under consideration in that respect, because in the present case it was affirmatively shown what the paper contained, and that the article in question was of such character as tended to render the jurors incompetent to serve in the case. In this way it is made affirmatively to appear that harm has been done to the defendant. In the last of the three cases cited (Hunter v. State, 43 Ga. 483), the article contained in the paper was one referring to the case by name as an important case, and severely criticizing counsel for the accused because of certain language employed by counsel in his argument for a change of venue. The paper was read by the jurors in the presence of the court and of counsel for the accused, who, although seeing them reading the paper, made no objection until after the verdict. In dealing with that ground of the motion for new trial, the court, speaking through Chief Justice Lochrane, said: 'In relation to a portion of the jury, before the completion of the panel, reading the Quitman Banner, it appears that this newspaper contained no portion of the testimony either for or against the prisoner, but contained a diatribe against one of the counsel of the accused for a speech made on a motion to change the venue. It is difficult to draw any line sufficiently well marked to constitute a rule upon this subject, and we can readily appreciate the propriety of keeping the jury, from the moment they are sworn in chief, away from all influences and communications which might, in the most remote degree, influence their verdict; but we are not prepared to say that the reading of a mere newspaper under the circumstances, being known to the counsel of the accused, not excepted to by him then and there, and transpiring in open court, would constitute a ground of error sufficient to set aside a verdict. On the contrary, we hold that it would not.' It will be observed that the court in that case 'appreciated the propriety of keeping the jury * * * away from all influences and communications which might in the most remote degree influence their verdict,' but placed the ruling refusing to order a new trial mainly upon the proposition that counsel did not move at the proper time. This was in accordance with the rule, which is now better recognized, that when a party moves for a new trial on the ground of misconduct of a juror, he must aver and show affirmatively that both he and his counsel were ignorant of the misconduct charged, until after the verdict. Wynn v. City & Suburban Ry., 91 Ga. 344 [17 S. E. 649]; Cogswell v. State, 49 Ga. 103; 12 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 553, 558. While Hunter's Case, supra, did not comply with this rule, Styles, the defendant in the present case, did comply by making the affirmative showing.

"There are other cases in which new trials have been ordered upon the ground of misconduct upon the part of the jurors. These cases do not involve the question of the propriety of the jurors reading newspapers, but the rulings made in them go to the preservation of the purity of jury trials, and the principles announced in them are applicable to the facts in this case. We will deal with some of them. The case of Shaw v. State, 83 Ga. 92 [9 S. E. 768], was where the misconduct complained of consisted in the jury attending a prayer meeting conducted by the prosecutor in the case. Upon arrival the jurors were shown their seats by the prosecutor, separate and apart from the remainder of the congregation. The prosecutor led the services and addressed the congregation. Prayers were offered for the court and its officers, but no reference was made to the particular case on trial. There was shouting at the meeting. In passing upon this case, the following was announced in the headnote: 'Where misconduct of a juror or of the jury is shown, the presumption is that the defendant has been injured, and the onus is upon the state to remove such presumption by proper proof. While reviewing courts are loth to interfere with the decision of the trial judge that the presumption has been removed, such decision is in this state subject to review. The misconduct of the jury and of the officer in charge of them in this case was of such character as to require a new trial.' In the course of the opinion it was said by Mr. Justice Simmons: 'There are many things which can be done by individual members of the jury, or by the whole jury, which are susceptible of such clear explanation that the trial judge would be authorized in refusing to set the verdict aside. There are other things, however, which, if done by an individual member of the jury, or by the whole jury, are so contrary to the public policy of the state in the procurement of fair and impartial trials for the citizens of the state, as to require that a verdict rendered by such jury be set aside, whether the defendant has been injured thereby or not; and in our opinion the case under consideration belongs to this class. The state is jealous of the rights and liberties of its people. When one of its citizens is accused of crime, it throws around him all the safeguards that are possible, in order to procure him a fair and impartial trial. It requires the officer who has charge of the particular jury to swear, in substance, in open court, to take them to the jury room and there keep them safely, and not to communicate with them himself or suffer any one else to communicate with them, unless by leave of the court. The law contemplates that, when a jury are selected and sworn to try a citizen for felony, they shall be entirely separated from the world, and that no communication whatever shall be had with them from the beginning of the trial until the verdict is reached, unless by leave of the court. It contemplates that no outside influence shall be brought to bear on the minds of the jury, and that nothing shall occur outside of the trial which shall disturb their minds in any way; that the minds of the jury shall be entirely occupied with the consideration of the case which they are sworn to try.' The case of Smith v. State, 122 Ga. 154 [50 S. E. 62], presents another instance where the judgment of the lower court was reversed because it refused to grant a new trial upon the ground of misconduct upon the part of the jurors. It is unnecessary here to make further reference to the misconduct complained of. In this case it was said: 'This court, from the time of its organization to the present time, has striven to protect the purity and impartiality of jury trials; and wherever there have been irregularities, unless fully explained and the court satisfied that the accused has not been injured, new trials have been granted. Where the misconduct of the officers and jury has been gross, this court and others have held that a new trial should be granted on account of public policy, whether the accused was injured or not.' The case of Obear v. Gray, 68 Ga. 182, presents another instance where a new trial was granted because the court refused to set aside a verdict because of improper conduct of the jurors. In this case Mr. Justice Crawford, speaking for the court, said: 'But other and quite as serious complaints are made in reference to allowing the jury to be carried to the public park, a place of great resort, especially on Sundays, and allowing them whilst there to pass about and to separate for some considerable time. Every jury is to be carried to the jury room, or some other private and convenient place, where they are not to be spoken to by the officer having them in charge or others, unless by leave of the court. To take them, therefore, to a park, which is said to be a place of great public resort, especially on the Sabbath day, where they are almost sure to hear something said about the case, whether they would or not, is most clearly a violation of the spirit and purpose of the law in withdrawing them from the body of their fellow citizens until they have agreed upon their verdict. We think that this was a good ground upon which to set aside the verdict, unless it was clearly shown that no such things occurred while they were in the presence and hearing of other visitors. It is true that the affidavits offered show everything necessary to purge them, except that it does not appear but that they heard bystanders make remarks about the case. To make the purgation complete, this should affirmatively appear. [Stix v. Pump] 37 Ga. 332; [Blaock et al. v. Phillips] 38 Ga. 216; [Daniel v. State] 56 Ga. 653.' We do not deem it necessary to make further reference to any of the cases cited in the several cases to which we have alluded.

"Under the view we take of the case the editorial complained of dealt with a subject so related to the case on trial as to make its reference applicable to that case; and, because of its argumentative character and its tendency, through appeals to the emotions and passions of jurors, to displace the element of impartiality in the minds of the jurors, it was harmful to the accused, in that it tended to deprive him of a fair and impartial trial. He brought himself under the rule by making complaint in the manner and at the time authorized by law, and the judge should have granted a new trial."

In this connection see Alabama Great Southern Railroad Co. v. Brown, 140 Ga. 792, 79 S. E. 1113, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 1159. In Smoot v. State, 146 Ga. 76, 90 S. E. 715, it was held:

"It was error requiring a new trial to refuse to grant a mistrial on account of remarks of counsel for the state in regard to bad character of the accused, when he had not put his character in issue."

The basis of the ruling was that the argument of counsel for the state put before the jury irrelevant matter prejudicial to the accused, which was not in evidence and could not have been introduced by the state. In the course of the opinion it was said:

"In this case * * * the objectionable remarks of the prosecuting attorney injected before the jury substantive matter which could not have been introduced by the state, and which was prejudicial to the accused and was calculated to have the same effect as if evidence thereof had been improperly admitted and the attorney had argued it for consideration by the jury. The introduction of such facts by the speech of an attorney is outside of the latitude of speech to which he is entitled. Morris v. Maddox, 97 Ga. 575 (2), 581, 25 S. E. 487; W. & A. R. Co. v. York, 128 Ga. 688, 58 S. E. 183; W. & A. R. Co. v. Cox, 115 Ga. 715, 42 S. E. 74; Augusta, etc., R. Co. v. Randall, 85 Ga. 297, 11 S. E. 706. Like other irrelevant evidence calculated to prejudice the jury against the accused, it has a tendency to injure him before the jury. In some cases the injurious effect may be averted by appropriate action and instructions from the court (Civil Code, § 4957); but what would be sufficient in any case would depend on the character of the remarks, the nature of the case, and the action or instructions from the court relied on to counteract the effect of the improper remarks. O'Dell v. State, 120 Ga. 152 (6), 154, 47 S. E. 577. These may differ in each case. It is not erroneous to refuse to grant a mistrial on account of improper remarks by counsel, if it is certain that no injury could have resulted therefrom to the accused. Lee v. State, 116 Ga. 563, 42 S. E. 759. But, if it can be reasonably inferred that the jury were thereby in any way unfavorably affected against the accused, a mistrial should be ordered or a new trial granted. Hudson v.

State, 101 Ga. 520 (3), 524, 28 S. E. 1010; Ivey v. State, 113 Ga. 1062, 39 S. E. 423, 54 L. R. A. 959. In the interest of fair trials, it should clearly appear that there was no probability of injury to accused likely to result from the misconduct. The character of the remarks in this case was such as to put before the jury facts of a substantive nature, irrelevant, but tending to unduly prejudice the jury against the accused, as already pointed out; but how firmly they may have found lodgment in the minds of the jury and influenced the verdict can only be left to conjecture. The judge was unsuccessful in his attempt to stop the attorney before completing the objectionable remarks. While he attempted, by reprimanding the attorney and giving instructions, to prevent the minds of the jury from being affected by the statements, the instructions did not clearly inform the jury that the character of the accused, which the attorney had stated was bad, was not in issue; but from the statement 'that, in the absence of proof of bad character by the defendant, it must be presumed that there was nothing derogatory to his character,' the jury might have inferred that the character of the accused had some bearing upon the case. Considering the character of the remarks, the circumstances of their delivery, and the instructions of the court in regard thereto, it cannot be said that the accused had a fair trial."

We have quoted at length from the decisions in the cases above cited, because the discussions in them are helpful in the consideration of the present case. While the cases are not alike in all respects, they are sufficiently so to render the principles applied in the cases cited applicable to the case under consideration. The excerpts from the decisions of this court read by the solicitor general had no relevancy to the case on trial, and could not have been introduced as evidence; yet they were put before the jury and embodied statements of facts irrelevant to the case on trial, tending to prejudice the jury against the accused, and arguments tending to influence the jury against the accused. By that method the solicitor general put before the jury remarks of this court not relevant to the case on trial, and which should no more have been permitted than similar remarks by any outside individual. They were all, all the more harmful to the accused because they were the expressions of this court. Under the circumstances it cannot be said that the defendant had the fair and impartial trial to which he was entitled under the law, and the judgment of the trial court should be reversed upon that ground.

WILSON et al. v. WARD. (No. 1151.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 2, 1919.)

The petition in this case was subject to the grounds of demurrer complaining that the petition was multifarious, and did not allege grounds for ancillary equitable relief, and that the court was without jurisdiction as to certain of the defendants.

*(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)2. CONTRACTS  $\S$ 97(2) — TRANSFEEE OF NOTES, IN ACTION THEREON, RATIFIED ORIGINAL CONTRACT.

Plaintiff, as transferee of notes of an insolvent bank, by suing on such notes, ratified the contracts out of which they arose.

3. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES  $\S$ 241(1) — PLAINTIFF MUST BE JUDGMENT CREDITOR TO OBTAIN EQUITABLE RELIEF.

In order to obtain ancillary equitable relief against transfers as in fraud of creditors, plaintiff must be a judgment creditor, or be entitled to obtain a judgment giving a lien upon the property in the same action.

Error from Superior Court, Crisp County; D. A. R. Crum, Judge.

Suit by J. A. Ward against J. A. Wilson and others. Separate orders were taken overruling demurrers to the petition and defendants bring error. Reversed.

In an equitable suit instituted in Crisp county the petition as amended, considered in connection with certain exhibits, alleged the following in substance:

The Farmers' State Bank, a corporation of Crisp county, being insolvent, was placed in the hands of a receiver on March 15, 1915. By order of the court the receiver was directed, upon payment of 50 per cent. of the outstanding deposits of the bank and obtainment of the consent of all the depositors, to sell and convey unto the plaintiff all the personal property of every description belonging to the bank. The conditions named in the order having been complied with, the receiver duly executed a transfer of the property, in pursuance of the order, on January 3, 1917; and the plaintiff thereby became transferee of the choses in action hereinafter mentioned, and as such transferee complains. On separate designated dates shortly before the appointment of the receiver, J. A. Wilson, of Crisp county, executed two several promissory notes for stated amounts, payable respectively to W. D. Wilson & Bro. Company (a firm composed of W. D. Wilson, J. A. Wilson, and Clyde Wilson) and the Farmers' State Bank, upon which J. A. Wilson is now indebted to plaintiff as transferee. On separate designated dates shortly before the appointment of the receiver, the firm of W. D. Wilson & Bro. Company, above mentioned, executed several promissory notes for stated amounts, payable respectively to the Farmers' State Bank, to W. D. Wilson, and to their own order, duly indorsed by them, upon which notes they are now indebted to plaintiff. On May 1, 1914, Wilson-Roberts Company, a firm composed of W. D. Wilson, J. A. Wilson, Clyde Wilson, and J. A. Roberts, executed a promissory note for a stated amount payable to the Farmers' State Bank, upon which note the makers are now indebted to plaintiff as transferee. On December 31, 1913, and March 4, 1914, respectively, R. L. Wilson, of Bibb county, executed two promissory notes for stated amounts, payable respectively to the Farmers' State Bank and to J. F. Calhoun, upon which notes the maker is now indebted to petitioner as transferee. At the dates of the execution of the several promissory notes J. A. Wilson was the president of the Farmers' State Bank. In July next after the appointment of the receiver, and on a subsequent stated date, J. A. Wilson, being insolvent, executed two deeds, purporting to convey separate parcels of land to R. L. Wilson. On May 15, 1914, July 1, 1915, February 15, 1916, and April 11, 1916, R. L. Wilson, being at the time insolvent, executed separate deeds purporting to convey described real estate to George Miller, to Crisp Hardware Company (of which J. A. Wilson was manager), to Mrs. Sallie B. Wilson (wife of R. L. Wilson), of Bibb county, and to Macon Trust Company, of Bibb county, of which R. L. Wilson was president. On April 23, 1916, Sallie B. Wilson executed a deed purporting to convey to the Crisp Hardware Company some of the lots included in the above-mentioned deed from R. L. Wilson to herself. W. D. Wilson & Bro. Company, the Wilson-Roberts Company, and the several members of each firm are insolvent. The several conveyances above mentioned were void on account of having been made without consideration and as part of a conspiracy to enable R. L. Wilson and J. A. Wilson to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors of each of them. On the subject of conspiracy it is specially alleged:

"Said conspiracy consisted in negotiating said evidences of indebtedness with the said Farmers' State Bank by common consent of all parties interested in each of said obligations, and at the instance and through manipulation of the said R. L. Wilson, and with knowledge of each other, procuring thereon money and other thing of value from said Farmers' State Bank, without giving therefor any security, and done with the fraudulent intent to resist and defeat the payment of the same by hiding, conveying, and concealing the live and available assets of the makers of said obligations, in the manner herein described, and in the conveyances hereinbefore described; and said conspiracy consisted further in so shifting the titles to the properties herein described as to clear all of said property out of the said J. A. Wilson and the said R. L. Wilson, and with fraudulent intent to defeat the collection of their several obligations hereinbefore described, and to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of the said Farmers' State Bank and this petitioner. The transfers of property alleged to have been made were made subsequent to the creation and during the existence of the indebtedness set forth, the notes and obligations set out, and which do not themselves antedate the transfers complained of, being, as petitioner is informed and believes, in renewal of indebtedness previously existing and obligations previously given to the said Farmers' State Bank. The fraudulent character of said acts and transfers was well known to each and all of said defendants concerned therein, and the illegal purpose to defraud coexistent in the mind of all of said defendants. The defendants J. A. Wilson, R. L. Wilson, W. D. Wilson & Bro. Company, W. D. Wilson, Clyde Wilson, J. A. Wilson, Crisp Hardware Company (of which J. A. Wilson, Mrs. J. A. Wilson, and R. L. Wilson are practically the only stockholders), Macon Trust Company (of which R. L. Wilson is the controlling and owning stockholder), and Mrs. R. L. Wilson, wife of R. L. Wilson, otherwise known in said transfers [as] Sallie B. Wilson, are all related, not only in blood, but also by the closest affinity in all personal and business relations, and each and all were cognizant of and participating in the plans and actings of the other, and of one another, as complained of in said petition, and all of said acts were done in furtherance of the general scheme and conspiracy to defraud the said Farmers' State Bank, its creditors and assigns, and the assigns of its creditors, and to save themselves harmless from the default and failure of the said Farmers' State Bank. The said R. L. Wilson, defendant, was the real controlling and managing head of the said Farmers' State Bank, de facto, if not de jure, and was not only cognizant of the affairs of said bank and the relations of the other defendants thereto, but was approving and directing all its actings and doings, the other officers of said bank being mere instruments of the said R. L. Wilson, pliant to do his bidding; and the making of the obligations herein set out, and the making of the transfers named, were done by said named defendants, respectively, in furtherance of the grand scheme and conspiracy of all of said defendants, under the leadership of the said R. L. Wilson, fraudulently to appropriate the live and available assets of said bank to their own use and benefit, in fraud against the creditors of said bank, and their assigns, and to so conceal their own individual and available assets as to prevent the creditors of said Farmers' State Bank, their assigns, and this petitioner from realizing value or any part thereof on said obligations."

The prayers of the petition were: (a) That process issue against the defendants, J. A. Wilson, George Miller, Crisp Hardware Company, R. L. Wilson, Sallie B. Wilson, W. D. Wilson & Bro. Company, W. D. Wilson, J. A. Wilson, Clyde Wilson, Wilson-Roberts Company, W. D. Wilson, J. A. Wilson, Clyde Wilson, J. H. Roberts, J. F. Calhoun, and the Macon Trust Company; (b) that petitioner "have judgment against each of the several obligors on account of the debts and obligations set out" in the petition; (c) that each of the conveyances described in the petition be canceled; (d) that the several grantees named in the conveyances be restrained from conveying or encumbering the property described in the conveyances; (e) that the plaintiff have general relief.

A separate demurrer was filed by J. A. Wilson, on the ground that there was a misjoinder of causes of action. R. L. Wilson and his wife, Sallie B. Wilson, filed a joint demurrer on the grounds (a) that the petition failed to set out any cause of action; (b) that the petitioner is attempting to subject property alleged to have been fraudulently conveyed by some of his alleged debtors, without first obtaining judgment on his demands against such debtors; (c) from the petition it appears that the court has no jurisdiction of these defendants, it affirmatively appearing from the petition that they reside in a different county from that in which the suit was brought; (e) there is a misjoinder of causes of action and parties defendant, and the petition is multifarious. The Macon Trust Company filed a separate demurrer, based on similar grounds to those made by the demurrer of R. L. Wilson and his wife. J. A. Wilson, George Miller, W. D. Wilson & Bro. Co., W. D. Wilson, Clyde Wilson, Wilson-Roberts Company, J. H. Roberts, and J. F. Calhoun filed a general demurrer on the grounds (a) that the petition set forth no cause of action; that the petition attempts to subject the property of J. A. Wilson and R. L. Wilson, alleged to have been fraudulently transferred, without having first obtained a judgment or lien of any sort upon the property; (b) that the petition is multifarious; and (c) that R. L. Wilson and his wife, the Crisp County Hardware Company, and the Macon Trust Company are improperly joined as parties defendant. A separate demurrer was filed by the Crisp Hardware Company, on the same grounds as set forth in the demurrer last mentioned. Separate orders were taken overruling each demurrer, and the defendants excepted.

Dorris & Brown, of Cordele, and Harde-man, Jones, Park & Johnston and Harry S. Strozler, all of Macon, for plaintiffs in error.

M. M. Eakes and E. F. Strozler, both of Cordele, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. [2, 3] The petition alleges separate causes of action against several of the defendants for money judgments, and seeks ancillary equitable relief (the cancellation of deeds and injunction to prevent transfer or incumbrance of property) against two of the debtor defendants and others. A conspiracy is alleged, in the course of which the debtor defendants are alleged to have fraudulently obtained money from the bank. The suit does not proceed against such defendants as joint wrongdoers, but the plaintiff, as transferee of the bank, sues on separate notes of such defendants, which they executed separately to the bank for money obtained by them. By suing on the notes the plaintiff ratified the contracts out of which they arose, and the action was resolved into one upon contract, rather than in tort, based upon the conspiracy. In this respect the case differs from Greer v. Andrew, 133 Ga. 199, 65 S. E. 410, and citations, and similar cases unnecessary to mention. The contracts are separate and distinct from each other, and the defendants could not be joined in one action to recover the amount due on all of them. Civil Code, § 5515; White v. North Georgia Electric Co., 128 Ga. 539, 58 S. E. 33; Ansley v. Davis, 140 Ga. 615, 79 S. E. 454. In order to obtain the ancillary equitable relief the plaintiff must be a judgment creditor, as in Conley v. Buck, 100 Ga. 187, 28 S. E. 97, and similar cases, or be entitled to obtain a judgment giving a lien upon the property in the same action. De Lacy v. Hurst, 83 Ga. 223, 9 S. E. 1052; Booth v. Mohr, 122 Ga. 333, 50 S. E. 173.

[1] Under the circumstances of this case there is no common right or interest in any question between all the parties to be settled, which would be ground for uniting the several claims in one action. Among other things, the petition seeks a money judgment against J. A. Wilson, a resident of the county, and ancillary equitable relief against persons claiming property under an alleged fraudulent transfer by him; also a money judgment against R. L. Wilson, a nonresident of the county, and ancillary equitable relief against persons claiming under an alleged fraudulent transfer executed by him. As R. L. Wilson could not be joined with J. A. Wilson or the other resident defendants against whom money judgments were sought, the court would be without jurisdiction to render a money judgment against him, or to grant the ancillary equitable relief of cancellation and injunction against him and those claiming by transfer under him. Upon such cause of action it would be necessary to sue them in Bibb county, where R. L. Wilson resides. Fourth National Bank v. Mooty, 143 Ga. 137, 84 S. E. 546; Parker v. Parker, 148 Ga. 196, 96 S. E. 211. From what has been said, it follows that the petition was multifarious on account of misjoinder of causes of action for money judgments, and, being so, it did not allege a cause of action for any of the ancillary equitable relief, and the court was without jurisdiction of the nonresident defendants.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

HOLMAN v. ATHENS EMPIRE LAUNDRY CO. (No. 1058.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 4, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PUBLIC NUISANCE—PRIVATE ACTION.

If a public nuisance causes special damage to a private citizen, he has a right of action therefor.

If a private nuisance causes injury to the person or property, or both, of another, a cause of action accrues.

2. STATUTORY DEFINITION OF "NUISANCE."

"A nuisance is anything that worketh hurt, inconvenience, or damage to another; and the fact that the act done may otherwise be lawful does not keep it from being a nuisance."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Nuisance.]

3. NUISANCE ⇐ 1, 3(3)—USE OF PROPERTY SO AS NOT TO INJURE ANOTHER BY POLLUTION OF AIR.

Every person has the right to have the air diffused over his premises, whether located in the city or country, in its natural state and free from artificial impurities.

(a) By air in its natural state and free from artificial impurities is meant pure air consistent with the locality and character of the community.

(b) The pollution of the air, so far as reasonably necessary to the enjoyment of life and indispensable to the progress of society, is not actionable.

(c) The privilege of use incident to the right of property must not be exercised in an unreasonable manner, so as to inflict injury upon another unnecessarily.

(d) The maxim "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas," considered and applied.

4. NUISANCE ⇐ 3(3)—TO CONSTITUTE SMOKE A NUISANCE SUBSTANTIAL INJURY OR INTERFERENCE WITH USE MUST BE SHOWN.

Smoke is not per se a nuisance.

To constitute smoke a nuisance, it must be such as to produce either actual, tangible, and substantial injury to neighboring property itself, or such as to interfere sensibly with its use and enjoyment by persons of ordinary sensibilities.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Nuisance Per Se.]

5. NUISANCE ⇐ 19, 23(1, 2), 25(1, 2) — INJUNCTION GRANTED AGAINST SMOKE WHEN RELIEF AT LAW INADEQUATE.

The jurisdiction of equity to restrain nuisances is in aid of the legal right, when the legal right is inadequate, and to prevent a multiplicity of suits.

In cases of nuisances, the foundation for the interference of equity rests in the necessity of preventing irreparable injury and multiplicity of suits.

(a) There is in principle no distinction between any of the cases, whether it be smoke, smell, noise, or gas.

(b) The doctrines of "de minimis," "balance of injury," or "public interest," and "discretion" considered.

(c) In a suit to enjoin the continuance of a nuisance created by smoke alone, the plaintiff cannot be denied injunctive relief, his case being otherwise made out, because it would injure the defendant or the public to grant it. In such a case the chancellor has no discretion at the final trial.

(d) The injuries may be balanced, and the discretion of the chancellor exercised in the grant or refusal of an interlocutory injunction.

6. NUISANCE $\Leftrightarrow$ 34—WHETHER USE OF SOFT COAL IS A NUISANCE IS FOR THE JURY.

Under the pleadings and evidence, the court erred in directing the jury to return a verdict for the defendant.

Error from Superior Court, Clarke County; A. J. Cobb, Judge.

Suit for damages, injunction, etc., by W. S. Holman against the Athens Empire Laundry Company. Directed verdict for defendant, motion for new trial denied, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

W. S. Holman is the owner of a nine-story brick building located on the corner of Clayton and Lumpkin streets in the city of Athens, known as the Holman Building. The building was completed in January, 1914. The exterior construction of the building is of tapestry brick. The ground floor of the building is occupied by a café and lunch room, ice cream and candy factory, cigar factory, and a gas company. The other floors are designed for office purposes. Immediately across Lumpkin street from the Holman Building, and on the corner of Clayton and Lumpkin streets, is the two-story brick building of the Athens Empire Laundry Company. This building has been occupied by a steam laundry for about 18 years. In the building is a 35 horse power steam boiler, used in the operation of the laundry. The smokestack on the west side of the laundry is about 140 feet away from the Holman building. The top of the stack, which is about 60 feet in height, is on a level with the sixth floor of the Holman building.

In July, 1917, W. S. Holman filed an equitable petition in the superior court of Clarke county, in which he alleged that until recently the laundry company had used coke for the purpose of firing its boiler; that coke did not give off any considerable quantity of smoke, and could be used for fuel without financial loss or inconvenience to the laundry company, and is obtainable in the necessary quantities in the local market. He also alleged that the laundry company, at the time of the filing of the suit, was using soft coal for fuel and emitting "a very black, dense smoke, which smoke is a nuisance to the portion of the city affected (the business section), but is especially injurious to petitioner." He charged that the smoke entered the windows of the building and blackened the walls and casing of the building itself, to the special injury of the building, as well as to the inconvenience and discomfort of the occupants thereof. His tenants were compelled to keep the windows down on the west and north fronts of his building, during the hot weather of the summer, in order "to exclude the immense volumes of smoke blowing therein" from the stack of the laundry building. A number of the plaintiff's tenants and especially the tenant operating a millinery and hairdressing establishment, have complained and threatened to leave his building unless the smoke nuisance was abated. The defendant would continue to use soft coal, and the damage from the nuisance created thereby would be irreparable, a multiplicity of suits would result, and the intervention of a court of equity was necessary to the adequate protection of the plaintiff's rights. The prayers of the petition were for judgment for the damage sustained by the plaintiff up to the filing of the suit, for injunction restraining the defendant from operating its plant "with such coal as throws out a black, dense smoke," for general relief, and for process.

The laundry company answered, and admitted the location of the respective buildings and of its smokestack, substantially as set out in the petition. It also admitted that at the time of the filing of the suit it was using soft coal, and that it had in the past, and for some years, used coke as a fuel; but it averred that coke could be obtained in the Athens market only from a tenant (a gas company) of the plaintiff, that recently it had been unable to obtain coke except at prohibitive prices, that no more smoke was emitted from its boiler than was absolutely necessary in the proper operation of its plant, that its plant was operated by a skilled fireman and engineer and in a proper manner, and that its use of soft coal did not work appreciable hurt or damage to the plaintiff. It denied substantial injury and damage to the plaintiff's building, denied substantial injury to the plaintiff's tenants, denied that the injury, if any, to the plaintiff's building, the plaintiff's tenants, and the property of the latter was irreparable in damages, but, on the contrary, averred that the plaintiff had an adequate and complete remedy at law.

On the trial the plaintiff, by amendment, waived "his right to damages up to the time his suit was filed." The evidence on behalf of the plaintiff tended to show injury to the building as alleged in the petition, extreme inconvenience and discomfort to the plaintiff's tenants, and complaints and threats by the tenants to vacate the building. Whenever the wind was blowing from the laundry in the direction of the plaintiff's building, dense volumes of black smoke from the laundry's stack were blown directly into the building. Prior to the summer of 1917, at which time the defendant abandoned the use of coke as a fuel and commenced to use soft coal, some smoke came from the laundry's stack into the plaintiff's building. This smoke was, however, of a "yellowish color," was not particularly offensive to the plaintiff's tenants, and did not substantially damage the walls of the building. Since the defendant commenced to use soft coal as a fuel, the dense smoke from the defendant's stack was blown directly against the plaintiff's building whenever the wind was from the direction of the laundry, in such quantity as to necessitate the closing of the windows on both the west and north sides of the plaintiff's building. During the hot weather of the summer it was necessary to keep the windows of the building open. The tenants complained, not only on the ground of inconvenience and discomfort, but on the ground that the soot carried into the building and deposited upon the books, papers, furniture, and merchandise discolored and permanently injured the same. Even in winter the dense volume of smoke from the defendant's stack was blown in around the windows and openings of the building. Some of the plaintiff's tenants demanded offices on the opposite side of the building and away from the laundry. The plaintiff was compelled to make these changes in order to hold his tenants, to his financial loss. Coke, of suitable quality and in sufficient quantities, and at reasonable prices, could be had and used by the defendant. There was also some evidence to the effect that the volume of smoke thrown off by soft coal could be gradually reduced and controlled by the use of modern appliances.

The defendant's evidence was to the effect that its laundry and the plaintiff's building were located in the business section of the city; that its laundry had been in operation several years before the plaintiff erected his building in close proximity thereto; that it had used coke as a fuel as long as it could reasonably obtain it in necessary quantities and quality; that in the summer of 1917 coke could only be obtained in Athens from a tenant of the plaintiff, and then at prohibitive prices. Its evidence also tended to show that the plaintiff's building, by reason of its height, caused downward eddies in the air currents; that smoke, sand, trash, and other particles were blown against the building and carried down in the air currents and thrown into the Holman Building and into the neighboring buildings, including the laundry building, to the inconvenience and injury of the defendant; that several other smokestacks in the immediate locality emitted large volumes of black smoke, and that the smoke from these stacks was also blown against and into the plaintiff's building, and carried down into the defendant's building. The witnesses for the defendant gave evidence that the boiler was fired by competent and careful persons, and that every reasonable and practicable effort had been made and every practicable appliance had been used to reduce and control the smoke. It also appeared that soft coal was used as a fuel in the furnace of the Holman Building, and that dense black smoke was emitted from the plaintiff's stack, and that whenever the atmosphere was damp and humid the smoke was inclined to settle into the defendant's laundry. It further appeared that there was no state statute or city ordinance regulating the emission of smoke in the city of Athens.

At the conclusion of the evidence, briefly outlined above, and after argument of counsel, the court instructed the jury at some length, finally directing a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff filed a motion for a new trial, and to the judgment overruling the motion he excepted.

GEORGE, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. As a general rule a public nuisance gives no right of action to any individual, but must be abated by process instituted in the name of the state. Civil Code, § 4454. If a public nuisance causes special damage to a private citizen, he has a right of action therefor. Civil Code, § 4455; Trust Co. of Georgia v. Ray, 125 Ga. 485, 487, 54 S. E. 145; Savannah, Florida & Western Railway Co. v. Gill, 118 Ga. 737, 45 S. E. 623; Richmond Cotton Oil Co. v. Castellaw, 134 Ga. 472, 67 S. E. 1126(3). The fact that the plaintiff waived his claim to damages alleged to have been suffered prior to the filing of the suit is of no special consequence. Tate v. Mull, 147 Ga. 195, 197, 93 S. E. 212. If the alleged nuisance be regarded as a public one, the evidence in the case is sufficient to authorize the jury to find special injury and damage to the plaintiff, and, therefore he may maintain the action. If the alleged nuisance be considered a private one, there can be no question of the plaintiff's right to sue under section 4456 of the Code, which declares:

"A private nuisance may injure either the person or property, or both, and in either case a right of action accrues."

[2] 2. In Bonner v. Welborn, 7 Ga. 296, 311 (before the Code), Jude Nisbet, speaking for the court, said:

"A private nuisance is anything done to the hurt or annoyance of the lands, tenements, or hereditaments of another. 3 Blackstone, 170. . . . If one does any other act, in itself lawful, which yet being done in that place, necessarily tends to the damage of another's property, it is also a nuisance."

In Coker v. Birge, 9 Ga. 425, 427 (54 Am. Dec. 347) (before the Code), Judge Warner said:

"Blackstone defines a nuisance to be anything that worketh hurt, inconvenience, or damage. 3 Bl. Com. 215."

Section 4457 of the Civil Code declares:

"A nuisance is anything that worketh hurt, inconvenience, or damage to another; and the fact that the act done may otherwise be lawful does not keep it from being a nuisance. The inconvenience complained of must not be fanciful, or such as would affect only one of fastidious taste, but it must be such as would affect an ordinary reasonable man."

[3, 4] 3, 4. Theoretically, every person has the natural right to have the air diffused over his premises in its natural state, free from all artificial impurities. Wood on Law of Nuisances (3d Ed.) § 495. If this rule were literally applied, its application would seriously disturb business, commerce, and society itself. Hence, by air in its natural state and free from artificial impurities is meant pure air consistent with the locality and nature of the community. Wood on Law of Nuisances (3d Ed.) § 496, and cases cited; Joyce on Law of Nuisances, § 136, and cases cited. The use of fuel in the home, the place of business, and the manufacturing establishment is necessary. In proportion as the population thickens, the impurities thrown into the air are increased. The pollution of the air, so far as necessary to the reasonable enjoyment of life and indispensable to the progress of society, is not actionable; but the right and so it must be exercised must not be exercised in an unreasonable manner so as to inflict injury upon another unnecessarily. Embrey v. Owen, 4 Eng. Law & Eq. 476, 477. Every one has the right to use his property as he sees fit, provided that in so doing he does not invade the rights of others unreasonably, judged by the ordinary standards of life and according to the notions of reasonable men. The right to use one's property as he pleases implies a like right in every other person, and is qualified by the doctrine that the use is the first instance must be a reasonable one. The maxim is "sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas." See the elaborate judgment of Blackburn J. in Fletcher v. Rylands, 35 L. J. Rep. 284 L. R. 1 Exch. 285 3 H. L. 329. Whether the property be a dwelling-house or manufacturing enterprise is immaterial. Smoke is not per se a nuisance. Paul v. Gault, 36 Minn. 285 22 N. W. 22.

In Crump v. Lambert, L. R. 3 Eq. 408, 412, Lord Romilly, M. R., said:

"With respect to the question of law, I consider it to be established by numerous decisions that smoke, unaccompanied with noise or noxious vapor, that noise alone, that offensive vapors alone, although not injurious to health, may severally constitute a nuisance to the owner of adjoining or neighboring property."

To constitute smoke a nuisance, according to the authorities, it must be such as to produce a visible, tangible, and appreciable injury to property, or such as to render it specially uncomfortable or inconvenient, or to materially interfere with the ordinary comfort of human existence. Joyce on Law of Nuisances, § 137; Campbell v. Seaman, 63 N. Y. 568, 20 Am. Rep. 567. With respect to dwelling houses, the rule is stated in Wood on Nuisances (3d Ed.) § 505, as follows:

"The rule is that the comfortable enjoyment of the premises must be sensibly diminished, either by actual, tangible injury to the property itself, or by the promotion of such physical discomfort as detracts sensibly from the ordinary enjoyment of life."

See, also, Ross v. Butler, 19 N. J. Eq. 24 97 Am. Dec. 654; Duncan v. Hayes, 22 N. J. Eq. 26.

That the business itself is offensive to others, or that property in the neighborhood of such business is necessarily adversely affected thereby, or that persons of fastidious taste would prefer its removal, is insufficient. Applying the foregoing principle to the case in hand, the defendant may use of its property, and carry on any business not per se a nuisance, that produces unnecessary, unreasonable, unusual or extraordinary impregnation of the air with smoke or soot, to the sensible annoyance and discomfort of plaintiff's premises, or the actual, tangible, and substantial injury to plaintiff's realty.

[5] 5. Whether a nuisance is to be determined in the circumstances of this case is at least a question of fact for the jury. Hill v. McBurney, 101 Cal. 212 34 P. S. E. 42 32 L. R. A. 2867. When a verdict was granted on account of the same. We do not understand this to be a judge acted upon a contrary view, but a verdict for the defendant, in the course of his remarks to the jury.

"If smoke creates a nuisance, and the party that creates the nuisance is liable in money any one that is injured by the creation or maintenance of the nuisance."

While the trial judge doubtless intended the extent of the plaintiff's injury, nevertheless finally concluded that a verdict should not be entered for smoke in the business districts of communities or cities. The judge followed the rule announced in Paul v. Gault, 36 Minn. 285 22 N. W. 22.

Union Planters' Bank & Trust Co. v. Memphis Hotel Co., 124 Tenn. 649, 139 S. W. 715, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 580. The Tennessee Supreme Court in that case held that injunction will not lie to prevent a property owner in a densely populated portion of the city, from causing smoke to issue from the chimneys of his building at an elevation lower than the roofs of neighboring buildings, although permitting it to issue at a lower level constitutes a nuisance to the occupants of such buildings. In the course of the opinion, by Green, J., it was said:

"There can be no doubt, upon the proof before us, that complainant has sustained injury by reason of the operation of the plant of the defendants."

He then dealt with the feasibility of requiring the defendants to extend their smokestack, and concluded that this could not be practically accomplished; that the further extension of the stack "would be a greater menace to a greater number of people." He then added:

"We prefer, however, to put our decision on a broader ground than the particular facts of this case, which we have stated. The annoyance and damage which complainant sustains from this smokestack is no doubt serious, but in undertaking to find a remedy we must consider the effects and results of that remedy. The situation existing between complainant's property and the defendants' property is by no means uncommon in any city. Such conditions are the rule rather than the exception. The buildings in none of our cities are of uniform height. All buildings in this day, which house any establishments of any considerable importance, are equipped with boilers, use coal, and make smoke. This smoke has to escape, and there must be smokestacks, and wherever one building is higher than another it will suffer from the smoke issuing from the stacks of the lower, unless some means could be devised whereby all stacks could be made a uniform height, and even this would not obviate the trouble, because of the tendency of smoke to descend in damp weather, and because of downward eddies in the air currents, which exist in the neighborhood of all high buildings. . . .

"If the chancellor's decree were followed, it would commit the courts of this state to a policy that would prove embarrassing in the extreme. Any owner of a higher building could compel the adjacent owner of a lower building to run a smokestack up to a point on a level with the first owner's roof. The height of the extension demanded in this case is 50 feet, and no doubt if that could be safely accomplished. It is true that, instead of being a 15-story building, the Tennessee Trust Building was 30 stories high. Upon the same principle, it could demand the extension of this Peabody stack to the level of a 30-story roof. Furthermore, both of these buildings are located in the heart of the city of Memphis, as has been the case with a 15-story building is hardly the limit of architectural development of this section of the city. There will in time doubtless be many more buildings erected in this immediate neighborhood much higher than the Tennessee Trust Building or the Peabody Hotel. Upon the principle of the chancellor's decree, if it were adopted, when these new buildings were erected, they could compel the defendants to again extend their smokestack into the air, and could compel the Tennessee Trust Building to extend its smokestack, and so this process might be repeated indefinitely."

In the course of the opinion the court observed (and we think the observation an important one) that—

"It is not even urged that they [the defendants] should be required to use any fuel different from the kind which they now use. Complainant could make no such insistence as this, for the proof shows that in its own plant it uses the same character of fuel that defendants use, namely, bituminous or soft coal."

In the instant case the burden of the complaint is the use of soft coal, instead of coke. It is true that the plaintiff himself uses soft coal. He denied that he used soft coal exclusively. But, conceding that he used soft coal exclusively, the plaintiff's stack protrudes from the roof of his 9-story building, and the smoke only occasionally settles, under certain atmospheric conditions, into the defendant's laundry. If it be further conceded that such occasional infringement of the defendant's rights worked hurt and injury to it, the plaintiff is not for that reason alone, under the circumstances of this case, to be denied appropriate relief. In Robinson v. Baugh, 31 Mich. 290, it was held that—

"It is no defense to a bill to enjoin a nuisance caused by the manner in which a business is conducted in a neighborhood that some of the complainants have establishments in the same vicinity to which similar objections lie as are made to the one in question."

In the opinion by Graves, C. J., the case of Gilbert v. Showerman, 23 Mich. 448 (cited approvingly by the Tennessee Supreme Court in Union Planters' Bank & Trust Co. v. Memphis Hotel Co., supra), is distinguished. Robinson v. Baugh involved both smoke from the use of soft coal and noise, and also jars from steam hammers, resulting in sensible inconvenience to the plaintiffs and appreciable injury to the plaintiffs' dwellings. There the right to injunctive relief was fully sustained. See, also, Georgia R., etc., Co. v. Berry, 78 Ga. 744, 4 S. E. 10(3); Brimberry v. Savannah, Florida & Western Ry. Co., 78 Ga. 641, 3 S. E. 274.

Is there in case of nuisance produced by smoke alone any satisfactory reason upon which the court of equity can withhold injunctive relief and remit the injured party to his action at law? The importance of the question justifies a further examination of the decided cases. In Crump v. Lambert, supra, Romilly, M. R., said:

(b) The doctrines of "de minimis," "balance of injury," or "public interest," and "discretion" considered.

(c) In a suit to enjoin the continuance of a nuisance created by smoke alone, the plaintiff cannot be denied injunctive relief, his case being otherwise made out, because it would injure the defendant or the public to grant it. In such a case the chancellor has no discretion at the final trial.

(d) The injuries may be balanced, and the discretion of the chancellor exercised in the grant or refusal of an interlocutory injunction.

6. NUISANCE ¶34—WHETHER USE OF SOFT COAL IS A NUISANCE IS FOR THE JURY.

Under the pleadings and evidence, the court erred in directing the jury to return a verdict for the defendant.

Error from Superior Court, Clarke County; A. J. Cobb, Judge.

Suit for damages, injunction, etc., by W. S. Holman against the Athens Empire Laundry Company. Directed verdict for defendant, motion for new trial denied, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

W. S. Holman is the owner of a nine-story brick building located on the corner of Clayton and Lumpkin streets in the city of Athens, known as the Holman Building. The building was completed in January, 1914. The exterior construction of the building is of tapestry brick. The ground floor of the building is occupied by a café and lunch room, ice cream and candy factory, cigar factory, and a gas company. The other floors are designed for office purposes. Immediately across Lumpkin street from the Holman Building, and on the corner of Clayton and Lumpkin streets, is the two-story brick building of the Athens Empire Laundry Company. This building has been occupied by a steam laundry for about 18 years. In the building is a 35 horse power steam boiler, used in the operation of the laundry. The smokestack on the west side of the laundry is about 140 feet away from the Holman building. The top of the stack, which is about 60 feet in height, is on a level with the sixth floor of the Holman building.

In July, 1917, W. S. Holman filed an equitable petition in the superior court of Clarke county, in which he alleged that until recently the laundry company had used coke for the purpose of firing its boiler; that coke did not give off any considerable quantity of smoke, and could be used for fuel without financial loss or inconvenience to the laundry company, and is obtainable in the necessary quantities in the local market. He also alleged that the laundry company, at the time of the filing of the suit, was using soft coal for fuel and emitting "a very black, dense smoke, which smoke is a nuisance to the portion of the city affected (the business section), but is especially injurious to petitioner." He charged that the smoke entered the windows of the building and blackened the walls and casing of the building itself, to the special injury of the building, as well as to the inconvenience and discomfort of the occupants thereof. His tenants were compelled to keep the windows down on the west and north fronts of his building, during the hot weather of the summer, in order "to exclude the immense volumes of smoke blowing therein" from the stack of the laundry building. A number of the plaintiff's tenants and especially the tenant operating a millinery and hairdressing establishment, have complained and threatened to leave his building unless the smoke nuisance was abated. The defendant would continue to use soft coal, and the damage from the nuisance created thereby would be irreparable, a multiplicity of suits would result, and the intervention of a court of equity was necessary to the adequate protection of the plaintiff's rights. The prayers of the petition were for judgment for the damage sustained by the plaintiff up to the filing of the suit, for injunction restraining the defendant from operating its plant "with such coal as throws out a black, dense smoke," for general relief, and for process.

The laundry company answered, and admitted the location of the respective buildings and of its smokestack, substantially as set out in the petition. It also admitted that at the time of the filing of the suit it was using soft coal, and that it had in the past, and for some years, used coke as a fuel; but it averred that coke could be obtained in the Athens market only from a tenant (a gas company) of the plaintiff, that recently it had been unable to obtain coke except at prohibitive prices, that no more smoke was emitted from its boiler than was absolutely necessary in the proper operation of its plant, that its plant was operated by a skilled fireman and engineer and in a proper manner, and that its use of soft coal did not work appreciable hurt or damage to the plaintiff. It denied substantial injury and damage to the plaintiff's building, denied substantial injury to the plaintiff's tenants, denied that the injury, if any, to the plaintiff's building, the plaintiff's tenants, and the property of the latter was irreparable in damages, but, on the contrary, averred that the plaintiff had an adequate and complete remedy at law.

On the trial the plaintiff, by amendment, waived "his right to damages up to the time his suit was filed." The evidence on behalf of the plaintiff tended to show injury to the building as alleged in the petition, extreme inconvenience and discomfort to the plaintiff's tenants, and complaints and threats by the tenants to vacate the building. Whenever the wind was blowing from the laundry in the direction of the plaintiff's building, dense volumes of black smoke from the laundry's stack were blown directly into the building. Prior to the summer of 1917, at which time the defendant abandoned the use of coke as a fuel and commenced to use soft coal, some smoke came from the laundry's stack into the plaintiff's building. Coke, of suitable quality and in sufficient quantities, and at reasonable prices, could be had and used by the defendant. Whether the property be a dwelling-house or manufacturing enterprise is immaterial. Smoke is not per se a nuisance. St. Paul v. Gillilan, 36 Minn. 298, 31 N. W. 49.

In Crump v. Lambert, L. R. 3 Eq. 409, 412, Lord Romilly, M. R., said:

"With respect to the question of law, I consider it to be established by numerous decisions that smoke, unaccompanied with noise or noxious vapor, that noise alone, that offensive vapors alone, although not injurious to health, may severally constitute a nuisance to the owner of adjoining or neighboring property."

To constitute smoke a nuisance, according to the authorities, it must be such as to produce a visible, tangible, and appreciable injury to property, or such as to render it specially uncomfortable or inconvenient, or to materially interfere with the ordinary comfort of human existence. Joyce on Law of Nuisances, § 137; Campbell v. Seaman, 63 N. Y. 568, 20 Am. Rep. 567. With respect to dwelling houses, the rule is stated in Wood on Nuisances (3d Ed.) § 505, as follows:

"The rule is that the comfortable enjoyment of the premises must be sensibly diminished, either by actual, tangible injury to the property itself, or by the promotion of such physical discomfort as detracts sensibly from the ordinary enjoyment of life."

See, also, Ross v. Butler, 19 N. J. Eq. 294, 97 Am. Dec. 654; Duncan v. Hayes, 22 N. J. Eq. 28.

That the business itself is offensive to others, or that property in the neighborhood of such business is necessarily adversely affected thereby, or that persons of fastidious taste would prefer its removal, is not sufficient. Applying the foregoing principles to the case in hand, the defendant may make use of its property, and carry on any business not per se a nuisance, that produces no unnecessary, unreasonable, unusual or extraordinary impregnation of the air with smoke or soot, to the sensible inconvenience and discomfort of plaintiff's tenants, or to the actual, tangible, and substantial injury of plaintiff's realty.

[5] 5. Whether a nuisance in fact existed, in the circumstances of this case, was at least a question of fact for the jury. See Hill v. McBurney Oil, etc., Co., 112 Ga. 788, 38 S. E. 42, 52 L. R. A. 398(3), where an injunction was granted on account of noise alone. We do not understand that the trial judge acted upon a contrary view in directing a verdict for the defendant. In the course of his remarks to the jury he said:

"If smoke creates a nuisance, and it can, then the party that creates the nuisance must compensate in money any one that is damaged by the creation or maintenance of the nuisance."

While the trial judge doubtless had in mind the extent of the plaintiff's injury, he nevertheless finally concluded that a court of equity should not undertake to regulate smoke in the business districts of populous communities or cities. The judge expressly followed the rule announced in the case of

Union Planters' Bank & Trust Co. v. Memphis Hotel Co., 124 Tenn. 649, 139 S. W. 715, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 580. The Tennessee Supreme Court in that case held that injunction will not lie to prevent a property owner in a densely populated portion of the city, from causing smoke to issue from the chimneys of his building at an elevation lower than the roofs of neighboring buildings, although permitting it to issue at a lower level constitutes a nuisance to the occupants of such buildings. In the course of the opinion, by Green, J., it was said:

"There can be no doubt, upon the proof before us, that complainant has sustained injury by reason of the operation of the plant of the defendants."

He then dealt with the feasibility of requiring the defendants to extend their smokestack, and concluded that this could not be practically accomplished; that the further extension of the stack "would be a greater menace to a greater number of people." He then added:

"We prefer, however, to put our decision on a broader ground than the particular facts of this case, which we have stated. The annoyance and damage which complainant sustains from this smokestack is no doubt serious, but in undertaking to find a remedy we must consider the effects and results of that remedy. The situation existing between complainant's property and the defendants' property is by no means uncommon in any city. Such conditions are the rule rather than the exception. The buildings in none of our cities are of uniform height. All buildings in this day, which house any establishments of any considerable importance, are equipped with boilers, use coal, and make smoke. This smoke has to escape, and there must be smokestacks, and wherever one building is higher than another it will suffer from the smoke issuing from the stacks of the lower, unless some means could be devised whereby all stacks could be made a uniform height, and even this would not obviate the trouble, because of the tendency of smoke to descend in damp weather, and because of downward eddies in the air currents, which exist in the neighborhood of all high buildings. * * *

"If the chancellor's decree were followed, it would commit the courts of this state to a policy that would prove embarrassing in the extreme. Any owner of a higher building could compel the adjacent owner of a lower building to run a smokestack up to a point on a level with the first owner's roof. The height of the extension demanded in this case is 50 feet, and we doubt if that could be safely accomplished. Suppose that, instead of being a 15-story building, the Tennessee Trust Building was 30 stories high. Upon the same principle, it could compel the extension of this Peabody stack up to the level of a 30-story roof. Furthermore, both of these buildings are located in the heart of the city of Memphis, as has been stated. A 15-story building is hardly the limit of the architectural development of this section of the city. There will in time doubtless be buildings erected in this immediate neighborhood much higher than the Tennessee Trust Building or the Peabody Hotel. Upon the principle of the chancellor's decree, if it were adopted, when these new buildings were erected, they could compel the defendants to again extend their smokestack into the air, and could compel the Tennessee Trust Building to extend its smokestack, and so this process might be repeated indefinitely."

In the course of the opinion the court observed (and we think the observation an important one) that—

In the instant case the burden of the complaint is the use of soft coal, instead of coke. It is true that the plaintiff himself uses soft coal. He denied that he used soft coal exclusively. But, conceding that he used soft coal exclusively, the plaintiff's stack protrudes from the roof of his 9-story building, and the smoke only occasionally settles, under certain atmospheric conditions, into the defendant's laundry. If it be further conceded that such occasional infringement of the defendant's rights worked hurt and injury to it, the plaintiff is not for that reason alone, under the circumstances of this case, to be denied appropriate relief. In Robinson v. Baugh, 31 Mich. 290, it was held that—

"It is no defense to a bill to enjoin a nuisance caused by the manner in which a business is conducted in a neighborhood that some of the complainants have establishments in the same vicinity to which similar objections lie as are made to the one in question."

In the opinion by Graves, C. J., the case of Gilbert v. Showerman, 23 Mich. 448 (cited approvingly by the Tennessee Supreme Court in Union Planters' Bank & Trust Co. v. Memphis Hotel Co., supra), is distinguished. Robinson v. Baugh involved both smoke from the use of soft coal and noise, and also jars from steam hammers, resulting in sensible inconvenience to the plaintiffs and appreciable injury to the plaintiffs' dwellings. There the right to injunctive relief was fully sustained. See, also, Georgia R., etc., Co. v. Berry, 78 Ga. 744, 4 S. E. 10(3); Brimberry v. Savannah, Florida & Western Ry. Co., 78 Ga. 641, 3 S. E. 274.

Is there in case of nuisance produced by smoke alone any satisfactory reason upon which the court of equity can withhold injunctive relief and remit the injured party to his action at law? The importance of the question justifies a further examination of the decided cases. In Crump v. Lambert, supra, Romilly, M. R., said:

"The law on this subject is, I apprehend, the same, whether it be enforced by action at law or by bill in equity. In any case where a plaintiff could obtain substantial damages at law, he is entitled to an injunction to restrain the nuisance in this court. There is, I apprehend, no distinction between any of the cases, whether it be smoke, smell, noise, vapor, or water, or any other gas or fluid. The owner of one tenement cannot cause or permit to pass over, or flow into, his neighbor's tenement any one or more of these things in such a way as materially to interfere with the ordinary comfort of the occupier of the neighboring tenement, or so as to injure his property. * * * The owner of the adjoining or neighboring tenement, whether he has or has not previously occupied it—in other words, whether he comes to the nuisance or the nuisance comes to him—retains his right to have the air that passes over his land pure and unpolluted, and the soil and produce of it uninjured by the passage of gases, by the deposit of deleterious substances, or by the flow of water."

And in that case an injunction was granted to—

"restrain the issuing of smoke and effluvia from a factory chimney, and the making of noise in the factory, although it was situated in a manufacturing town; it being proved that such smoke, effluvia, and noise were a material addition to previously existing nuisances."

The doctrine of this case has been adopted by the English courts, and generally by the courts of this country. Wood on Nuisances, § 507, and cases cited in notes.

In Lord Colchester v. Ellis, 2 Starkie's Ev. 538, the defendant, who was the owner of a building in London, erected a chimney in his building for the purpose of having a fire in his saddle room. The smoke from this chimney entered the plaintiff's dwelling about 50 yards distant, to the great annoyance of the plaintiff and his family and to the injury of his furniture. It appeared that the chimney was lower than the surrounding buildings and lower than the plaintiff's building. It was held that, if the plaintiff would have a fire in his establishment, he must construct his chimney so as not to injure his neighbor's property or impair its comfortable enjoyment.

In Sampson v. Smith, 8 Sim. 272, the plaintiff was the owner of a dwelling house and shop. He had valuable furniture in his dwelling house and also a stock of merchandise in the shop. The defendants owned a manufacturing establishment on the opposite side of the street from the plaintiff's house and shop. In the manufacturing establishment were steam engines. Dense volumes of smoke issued from the defendants' flue, and the soot and cinders descended in volumes into the streets, and into the shop and dwelling house of the plaintiff, so as to injuriously affect the goods in the store and the furniture in the house, and to sensibly impair the comfortable enjoyment of the dwelling. It was held that the use of the steam engine with such results was a nuisance, and that the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction restraining the use of the same in the manner shown. The case is based upon the fact that the defendants' flue was not as high as the roof of the plaintiff's building and other buildings in the vicinity.

Cartwright v. Gray, 12 Grant's Ch. (Ont.) 400, is an illustrative and instructive case. It there appeared that the nuisance arose principally from the fuel used by the defendant in running his steam engine located near the dwelling houses of the plaintiffs, and from the failure on the part of the defendant to employ the best known appliances for discharging the smoke. Mowat, V. C., in delivering the opinion of the court, after citing and applying the doctrine laid down in Walter v. Selfe, 4 Eng. Law & Eq. 15, and St. Helen's Smelting Co. v. Tipping, 4 B. & S. 608, concludes as follows:

"My opinion on the whole case is that the defendant has a right to use steam for propelling his machinery, but is bound to employ such reasonable precautions in the use of it as may prevent unnecessary danger to his neighbors' property from sparks, and unnecessary annoyance or injury to them from the noise or smoke; that though he seems, since the bill was filed, to have performed this duty as respects these sparks and noise, he has done nothing in respect to the smoke; and that the plaintiffs' complaint in reference thereto is well founded. The decree will therefore require the defendant to desist from using his steam engine in such a manner as to occasion damage or annoyance to the plaintiffs, or either of them, as owning or occupying the houses mentioned in the bill."

The case of Galbraith v. Oliver, 3 Pittsb. (Pa.) 79, was an action to restrain the defendants, the proprietors of a flouring mill, from using soft coal to run their steam engine. In the course of the opinion by Johnson, J., it was said:

"No occupation is more legitimate and no erection more careful than that of a flouring mill. There can be no denial of the owner's right to build one and to run it by steam. So of any other manufacturing establishment. They may not be agreeable to his next neighbor. He is not bound to consult the taste, pleasure, or preference of others; but he is bound to respect his neighbor's rights. * * * While mills and manufactories are legal and necessary, it is neither legal nor necessary that they be so located as to interfere with the rights of others in the enjoyment of their possessions. When, therefore, they create noises that prevent sleep, or taint the atmosphere with vapors prejudicial to health or nauseous to the smell, or fill it with a smudge that depreciates its use for every purpose, they trench on the rights of persons affected thereby. Just here is where the line must be drawn. At this point they become nuisances."

In Wood on Nuisances, § 502, the author, after reviewing many cases, English and American, says:

"Thus it will be seen that, even in the ordinary uses of buildings, the owners and occupants are bound, not only to see to it that their chimneys are so arranged as to carry off the smoke developed therein, but are also bound to use such fuel as will produce the least obnoxious smoke."

This doctrine is supported by many cases. See Rhodes v. Dunbar, 57 Pa. 274, 98 Am. Dec. 221; Sullivan v. Royer, 72 Cal. 248, 13 Pac. 655, 1 Am. St. Rep. 51; Campbell v. Seaman, 63 N. Y. 568, 20 Am. Rep. 567; Ross v. Butler, 19 N. J. Eq. 294, 97 Am. Dec. 654; Tuebner v. Cal. Street R. Co., 66 Cal. 171, 4 Pac. 1162; Hurlbut v. McKone, 55 Conn. 31, 10 Atl. 164, 3 Am. St. Rep. 17; Wesson v. Washburne Iron Co., 13 Allen (Mass.) 95, 90 Am. Dec. 181; Hutchins v. Smith, 63 Barb. (N. Y.) 252; Hyatt v. Myers, 71 N. C. 271. See, also, Joyce on Law of Nuisances, § 136 et seq., and cases cited in notes.

The case of Austin v. Augusta Terminal Ry. Co., 108 Ga. 671, 34 S. E. 852, 47 L. R. A. 755, was a suit by the owner of property to recover damages caused by the tracks of the railway company running in the rear of the plaintiff's premises. Injury from smoke and noise was claimed by the plaintiff. The suit really involved the construction of the clause of the Constitution which protects private property from being "taken or damaged" for public purposes without just compensation. This court held, in the majority opinion by Chief Justice Simmons, that the plaintiff's property was not "taken or damaged" within the meaning of the Constitution, under the special facts of the case. The Chief Justice was careful to note that—

"While holding that a lawfully constructed and lawfully operated railroad is not a nuisance, we are very far from holding that it may not be so operated in streets or on its private property as to become a nuisance. * * * But when they do so they will get no protection from their charter; for the Legislature does not legalize nuisances, whether they are maintained by manufacturing companies, railroads, municipalities, or private individuals."

In the majority opinion much is said, arguendo, on the question of nuisances produced by noise and smoke. It was, however, observed that "the evidence does not show any unlawful, improper, or unusual noise, smoke, or movement of cars." Two justices (Lumpkin, P. J., and Lewis, J.) dissented in that case. The dissenting opinion, by Lewis, J., discusses at length many English and American cases in line with the general doctrine laid down by Wood on Nuisances, heretofore referred to in this opinion. This court has said that—

"The foundation for the interference of equity in restraint of nuisances rests in the necessity of preventing irreparable mischief and multiplicity of suits. * * * There must be such an injury as from its nature is not susceptible of being adequately compensated at law, or such as from its continuance or permanent mischief must occasion a constantly recurring grievance, which cannot be otherwise prevented but by injunction. * * * By continuing nuisance or constantly recurring grievance or permanent injury is not meant a constant and unceasing nuisance or injury, but a nuisance which occurs so often, and is so necessarily an incident of the use of property complained of, that it can be fairly said to be continuous, although not constant or unceasing."

See Central Ry. Co. v. Americus Construction Co., 133 Ga. 392, 397, 65 S. E. 855. See, also, Farley v. Gate City Gas-Light Co., 106 Ga. 323, 337, 338, 81 S. E. 193; Richmond Cotton Oil Co. v. Castellaw, 134 Ga. 472, 67 S. E. 1126(4).

"If the injury caused to the adjacent property be continuing so as to cause a constantly recurring grievance, injunction is an available remedy." Tate v. Mull, 147 Ga. 195, 93 S. E. 212 (2).

The rule is well stated by Pitney, V. C., in Hennessy v. Carmony, 50 N. J. Eq. 616, 620, 25 Atl. 374, 377:

"The familiar ground on which the extraordinary power of the court is invoked in such cases is that it is inequitable and unjust that the injured party should be compelled to resort to repeated actions at law to recover damages for his injury, which, after all, in this class of cases, are incapable of measurement; and I presume to add the further ground that in this country" such recovery "must result in giving the wrongdoer a power not permitted by our system of constitutional government, viz. to take the injured party's property for his private purposes upon making, from time to time, such compensation as the whims of a jury may give. This ground of equitable action is of itself sufficient in those cases where the injury, though not irreparable, promises to be repeated for an indefinite period, and so is continuous in the sense that it will be persevered in indefinitely."

The English courts, it would seem, have not hesitated to grant injunctive relief in cases of nuisances produced by smoke alone. Many American courts, in such cases, have, upon various grounds, denied the right to such relief, and have remitted the complaining parties to their actions at law. The principal and usual grounds upon which injunctive relief has been denied may be referred to as the "de minimis," the "balance of injury," or the "public benefit," and the "discretionary" doctrines. With respect to the first it is sufficient if the injury be appreciable, within the meaning of the term heretofore indicated in this opinion. With respect to the second: In Richards' Appeal, 57 Pa. 105, 98 Am. Dec. 202, it was said:

"The chancellor will consider whether he would not do a greater injury by enjoining than would result from refusing, and leaving the party to his redress at the hands of the court and jury."

In Campbell v. Seaman, 2 Thomp. & C. 231, the Supreme Court of New York said of this case that it was in direct conflict with the authorities of the state of New York, and could not be there adopted as the law. The case is also criticized and explained in Wood on Nuisances (3d Ed.) § 532. In line with Richards' Appeal is also Huckenstine's Appeal, 70 Pa. 102, 10 Am. Rep. 669. These cases have been distinguished and in part disapproved in the later Pennsylvania case of Sullivan v. Jones & L. Steel Co., 208 Pa. 540, 57 Atl. 1065, 66 L. R. A. 712. The doctrine of comparative injuries is of course clearly applicable in the grant or refusal of interlocutory injunctions to restrain nuisances. The doctrine has generally been applied in such cases, or in cases involving special facts. The weight of authority is to the effect that at the final trial the right to injunctive relief is not discretionary. See Clark's Equity, §§ 213, 214, 215, and numerous cases cited in notes. The discretionary doctrine is well disposed of by Pitney, V. C., in Hennessy v. Carmony, supra, when he says:

"I have never been able to see how the question of the right of the complainant to an injunction on final hearing could ever be a matter properly resting in the 'discretion' of the chancellor, as I understand the force of that word in that connection. If by 'discretion' is here meant that the judge must be discreet, and must act with discretion, and discriminate, and take into consideration and give weight to each circumstance in the case, in accordance with its actual value in a court of equity, then I say that that is just what he must do in every case that comes under his consideration—no more and no less. * * * But if the word 'discretion,' in this connection, is used in its secondary sense, and by it is meant that the chancellor has the liberty and power of acting, in finally settling property rights, at his discretion, without the restraint of the legal and equitable rules governing those rights, then I deny such power. It seems to me that the true scope of the exercise of this latter sort of discretion in the judicial field is found in those matters which affect procedure merely, and not the ultimate right."

The discretionary doctrine is not peculiar to proceedings to abate or enjoin nuisances, but applies generally to the grant of injunctions and other extraordinary equitable remedies. This court has said that—

"The exercise of the jurisdiction of courts of equity to decree a specific performance or the rescission of a contract is not a matter of right in either party, but is a matter of sound and reasonable discretion in the court, which governs itself, as far as it may, by general rules and principles, but at the same time withholds or grants relief according to the circumstances of each particular case, when these rules and principles will not furnish any exact measure of justice between the parties."

See, also, Bagwell v. Bagwell, 72 Ga. 92 (2), Swint v. Carr, 76 Ga. 322, 2 Am. St. Rep. 44; Kirkland v. Downing, 106 Ga. 530, 32 S. E. 632.

However, in Franklin v. Newsom, 53 Ga. 580, it was ruled:

"Whilst it is a general rule that the right to specific performance is in the sound discretion of a court of equity, yet, in this state, that power is to be exercised by the jury under the evidence and charge of the court."

This ruling was followed in Miller v. Watson, 139 Ga. 29, 31, 76 S. E. 585. See Lan drum v. Rivers, 148 Ga. 744, 98 S. E. 477.

This court has applied the doctrine in case where the plaintiff prayed for the specific performance of a fraudulent, illegal, or hard and unconscionable contract. It would seem to be a misapplication of the doctrine to deny one his equitable rights solely upon the ground of inconvenience to the opposite party or to the public. Neither the opposite party nor the public has the right, legal or equitable, to invade the clear legal rights of another. It has been said that the final settlement of property rights does not lie in the broad discretion of the chancellor, but in the clear legal and equitable rules which bind the chancellor himself. The case of Somerset Water, Light & Traction Co. v. Hyde, 129 Ky. 402, 111 S. W. 1005, where an injunction to restrain the defendant from discharging sewerage upon the plaintiff's land was denied, and the case of City of Wheeling v. Natural Gas Co., 74 W. Va. 372, 82 S. E. 345, where the city was refused an injunction to restrain the defendant from supplying gas in violation of its franchise, because of the inconvenience it would cause to the public, forcefully illustrate what we believe to be a misconception of the extent of equitable power. The following cases, among others, support what we believe to be the true rule: Bristol v. Palmer, 83 Vt. 54, 74 Atl. 332, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 881, and note; Smith v. Rochester, 38 Hun (N. Y.) 612; 5 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, 530, 531; Kerr on Injunctions; *166; 1 High on Injunctions, § 739.

[6] 6. The case in hand is purely one for injunctive relief against a nuisance in consequence. Equity is asked to do no more than to restrain the defendant from using soft coal, that is, "such coal as throws out a black, dense smoke," and the evidence in the record is such as to authorize a finding by the jury that the use of coke was at once convenient and practical. The court is not asked to abate the defendant's laundry. If a case be otherwise made out, injunctive relief cannot be denied the plaintiff, although the nuisance results from smoke alone. Whether the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction was a question for the jury.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

STATE ex rel. BRANDON v. BOARD OF CONTROL.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 8, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)*1. FISH  $\S$ 11 — GAME  $\S$ 6 — WOODS AND FORESTS  $\S$ 7 — APPOINTMENT — CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

The act creating the office of forest, game and fish warden being silent as to the manner of filling the same after the making of the initial appointment thereto, all future appointments to fill said office must be made in accordance with the provisions of section 8 of article 7 of the Constitution; that is, by the Governor, with the advice and consent of the Senate.

2. STATUTES  $\S$ 218 — CONTEMPORANEOUS CONSTRUCTION BY EXECUTIVE OFFICERS.

Where a statute is of doubtful meaning, the contemporaneous construction placed thereon by the officers of government charged with its execution is entitled to great weight, and will not be disregarded or overthrown, unless it is clear that such construction is erroneous.

Original mandamus by the State on the relation of C. W. Brandon, against the Board of Control, etc. Writ refused.

Wm. T. George, of Philippi, for relator.

E. T. England, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

RITZ, J. The relator seeks by this proceeding to compel the respondent to approve his accounts as forest, game and fish warden, in order that he may secure the payment of the same out of the public fund provided for the maintenance of that office.

[1] It appears that the relator was appointed to the office of forest, game and fish warden by the Governor on the 20th of February, 1918; that he immediately entered upon the duties of said office, and performed the same until the month of May, 1919, when Clare W. Harding was appointed by the Governor to fill said office. Relator's term of office, as provided by the statute, was for four years, and he, contending that his term had not expired, and the board of control refusing to approve his accounts for expenses incurred by him and for his salary after the issuance of a commission to Harding, brought this writ seeking to compel the respondent to approve said accounts in order that the same might be paid. The respondent, by its return to the writ, challenges the right of the relator to hold the office, for the reason that his appointment thereto was by the Governor submitted to the Senate at the regular 1918 session, and by that body rejected, and the Governor being of opinion that this left the office vacant thereupon appointed said Harding and commissioned him thereto. The relator's contention is that his appointment is not required to be confirmed by the Senate, and that the action of the Governor in submitting the same to the Senate for confirmation was without authority of law, and that the rejection of the same by the Senate had no force or effect. On the other hand, the respondent contends that under the law it was incumbent upon the Governor to submit this appointment to the Senate for its action, and of course if this contention is correct the refusal of the Senate to confirm the same left the office vacant, and the appointment of Harding thereto was clearly authorized by law. The solution of this question depends upon the construction of the act of the Legislature creating the office of forest, game and fish warden, as well as upon the construction of section 8 of article 7 of the Constitution. Section 8 of article 7 of the Constitution provides as follows:

"The Governor shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the senate (a majority of all the senators elected concurring by yeas and nays), appoint all officers whose offices are established by this Constitution, or shall be created by law, and whose appointment or election is not otherwise provided for; and no such officers shall be appointed or elected by the Legislature."

The act creating the office of forest, game and fish warden (section 1, ch. 62 [sec. 3449] of the Code), so far as the same is pertinent to the matter of the appointment of that officer provides:

"The Governor shall between the first day of June and the first day of July, one thousand nine hundred and nine, appoint some person, a citizen of this state, whose term of office shall begin on the first day of July, one thousand nine hundred and nine, to the office of forest, game and fish warden. Said warden shall hold his office for four years and until his successor has been appointed and qualified, unless sooner removed for cause by the Governor."

It will be observed that section 8 of article 7 of the Constitution provides that the officers created by that instrument shall be appointed by the Governor, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and further that all appointments to fill offices created by law, subsequent to the enactment of the Constitution, shall be filled by appointment by the Governor, with the advice and consent of the Senate, unless other provision is made therefor. The contention of the relator is that as to the office of forest, game and fish warden the Legislature has made provision for the appointment of this officer by the Governor alone, without requiring the concurrence of the Senate therein, while it is contended by the respondent that the act creating the office does not make any such provision. It will be observed by so much of said act as is above quoted that it provides for the appointment of a forest, game and fish warden at a certain time for the term of four years.

The act does not even create the office by express terms, but by necessary implication it may be said that the office is permanently created. However, neither by implication nor by express terms is there provision made for the appointment of such officer by any person or tribunal, except as to the individual who shall be appointed thereto in the first instance. As to how his successor shall be appointed, or as to how the office shall be filled after the expiration of that four years, the act is entirely silent. This being the case, we must look to the constitutional provision for authority to fill the same, and when we do this we find that the same shall be filled by appointment by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

[2] We are therefore of the opinion that under the act, as it now stands, it was necessary to the validity of this appointment that the same be submitted to the Senate for its action thereon, and that the refusal of the Senate to confirm the relator's appointment to the office determines his title thereto. Under the constitutional provision the Governor could not reappoint him thereto by a recess appointment, but must appoint another person to the office. This construction is in keeping with the uniform interpretation of the act by the legislative and executive departments of the government ever since the office was created, as averred by the respondent in its return, and in all cases where a statute is of doubtful meaning, the contemporaneous construction placed thereon by the officers of government charged with its execution is entitled to great weight, and will not be disregarded or overthrown, except for strong reasons, or unless it is clear that such construction is erroneous. United States v. Johnston, 124 U. S. 236, 8 Sup. Ct. 448, 31 L. Ed. 389.

The relator, however, contends that, even though he is not the forest, game and fish warden de jure, he is so de facto. He avers in his petition that he is performing the duties of the office; that he has possession of the seal, and of the books and records of the same. The return alleges that Harding is now, and has been since his appointment, performing the duties of the office, but does not say anything about the possession of the seal and other insignia of office. This return was demurred to, without other reply, so that it may be said from the state of the pleadings here that the relator has possession of the insignia of office, but it is not quite clear as to who is performing the duties thereof. It seems that the weight of authority is that a de facto officer cannot ordinarily maintain a suit to recover the salary belonging to the office which he is filling. Usually the salary belongs to him who has the title. 22 R. C. L. p. 599; Constantineau on the De Facto Doctrine, § 219. But we are not called upon to decide this question, inasmuch as it does not appear who has been exercising the duties of the office since the appointment of Harding, and, in the absence of a clear and unequivocal showing in this respect, it will not be presumed that the same are being performed by one other than the person who is entitled by right to perform the same.

It follows from what we have said that the writ of mandamus prayed for will be refused.

STATE, for Use of PINGLEY, v. PINGLEY et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Sept. 9, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PLEADING  $\S$  216(2)—EXHIBITS CANNOT BE CONSIDERED ON DEMURRER TO DECLARATION.

Papers annexed or attached to a declaration, as for exhibits or parts thereof, are not parts of it, and cannot be considered upon a demurrer thereto.

2. INJUNCTION  $\S$  250—WHEN DECLARATION ON INJUNCTION BOND STATES CAUSE OF ACTION.

A declaration on an injunction bond, alleging procurement of an injunction to have been the sole purpose of the suit in which the bond was given, dissolution of the injunction, expenditure of money in payment of attorney's fees in effecting such dissolution and not otherwise, and nonpayment of such fees and of the penalty of the bond by the defendant, states a good cause of action.

3. INJUNCTION  $\S$  250—IN SUIT ON BOND, ALLEGATION OF NONPAYMENT OF ATTORNEY'S FEES SUFFICIENT.

The allegation of such nonpayment may be general and awkwardly expressed, in so far as it relates to the persons to and by whom payment should have been made, if it is broad enough to include all of such persons.

4. INJUNCTION  $\S$  250—ON DEMURRER TO DECLARATION ON BOND DISPOSITION OF CAUSE ON APPEAL DISREGARDED.

Upon such a demurrer, the disposition of the chancery cause, on an appeal from the decree of dissolution and dismissal, cannot be considered.

Case Certified from Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Action by the State of West Virginia, for the use of George W. Pingley against D. W. Pingley and others. Demurrer to amended declaration overruled, and decision certified. Order adjudging correctness of decision to be entered, and certified to circuit court.

A. M. Cunningham, of Parsons, for plaintiff.

W. B. & E. L. Maxwell, of Elkins, for defendants.

POFFENBARGER, J. Having overruled a demurrer to an amended declaration claiming by a single count, right of recovery, upon an injunction bond, of attorney's fees, as part of the damages occasioned by the injunction and as an item within the indemnity afforded by the bond, the trial court has certified its decision upon the question of the sufficiency of the declaration to this court for review, upon the joint request of the parties. Being of the opinion that the declaration, as originally filed, was insufficient, the court sustained a demurrer to it. Thereupon the plaintiff amended it at the bar of the court in material respects, and the court overruled a demurrer to the amended declaration.

[1] Fundamental differences between law and equity procedure render it impossible to consider the bill and final decree in the equity cause, attached to the declaration, as exhibits filed therewith and parts thereof. In actions at law, the pleadings are always for the court, and the evidence goes to the jury primarily. In equity causes, both the pleadings and the evidence go to the court for consideration. Consequently the annexation of documents, constituting the basis of right of action, to the declaration as for exhibits therewith and parts thereof, has never been recognized. In so far as a document is relied upon to fix and determine the rights of the parties by contract, adjudication, or legislation, the declaration should set forth its legal purport and effect, and then the document goes to the jury as evidence. Upon an inquiry as to the sufficiency of a pleading, the court is not supposed to look to the evidence at all. Nor does good pleading countenance a narration or statement of the evidence in a pleading. Snyder v. Wheeling Electrical Co., 43 W. Va. 661, 28 S. E. 733, 39 L. R. A. 490, 64 Am. St. Rep. 922. "In the absence of a statute, the annexing and filing of papers as exhibits to a pleading does not make them a part thereof, and they cannot be referred to for the purpose of supplying the omission of a material allegation or curing a fatal defect." 8 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 740. This text is well sustained by authority. The rule is not relaxed in even the Code practice states. Burkett v. Griffith, 90 Cal. 542, 27 Pac. 527, 13 L. R. A. 707, 25 Am. St. Rep. 151; Brooks v. Paddock, 6 Colo. 36. This conclusion disposes of the argument founded upon the so-called exhibits and the printed record of the chancery cause.

[2] Admitting payment of the costs incurred by the defendant in the chancery cause, and claiming no damages other than those represented by the payment of attorney's fees, the declaration charges that the plaintiffs in the chancery cause sought no relief therein other than an injunction; that the injunction awarded therein had been dissolved; that the plaintiff in this action had been compelled to retain, hire, and employ attorneys to answer, implead, defend, take depositions, appear at the taking of depositions, and otherwise defend him in the suit; and that the attorney's fees and expenses paid out and expended by him in said suit were so paid out and expended solely for the purpose of procuring dissolution of the injunction. It then avers nonpayment of attorney's fees, after request for payment.

Uniform decisions of this court, commencing with State v. Medford, 34 W. Va. 633, 12 S. E. 864, and ending with State v. Nash, 72 W. Va. 812, 79 S. E. 829, recognize right of recovery of attorney's fees, as damages within the meaning of the condition of an injunction bond, under the circumstances alleged in the declaration. It is sanctioned by the great weight of authority throughout the country also. The argument submitted in the brief filed for the defendants does not seem to controvert this proposition. Recognizing the difficulty incident to a definition of the limits within which such recoveries are allowed, the brief seems to invoke, in support of the demurrer, the facts and circumstances disclosed by the bill and the decree annexed to the declaration and the printed record of the chancery cause. For reasons stated, none of these papers can be considered upon the demurrer. The argument submitted will be appropriate and applicable only when the case reaches the court or the jury upon the evidence.

[3] The attack made upon the assignment of the breach of the condition of the bond is not well founded. The bond produced and read on over thereof, before the demurrer was interposed, shows by a recital that the injunction was obtained by David W. Pingley and French L. Pingley and others. The bond was executed by D. W. Pingley, F. L. Pingley, and Charles Gibson. The alleged defect in the assignment of the breach is failure to show who the other parties referred to in the bond were, and negative payment of the damages by them. But the allegation of nonpayment, though expressed in general and awkward terms, is amply sufficient in breadth to include the parties not specifically named. It says: "The said D. W. Pingley and F. L. Pingley, nor no one for them or either of them, nor no other parties thereto, nor no one for them," have not paid and satisfied the damages aforesaid or any part thereof, though well advised of the premises and often requested so to do. This is supplemented by an allegation of nonpayment of the penalty of the bond by the defendants or any of them. Though an allegation of nonpayment is essential, and omission thereof is fatal, it is well settled that an allegation of nonpayment in general terms, sufficiently broad to include all the parties upon whom the duty of payment rests, suffices. Moundsville, etc., R. Co. v. Wilson, 52 W. Va. 647, 44 S. E. 169; Cobbs v. Fountaine, 3 Rand. 484.

[4] The brief closes with an inquiry as to whether the disposition of the chancery cause in this court, on the theory of extinguishment of the controversy by acts of the parties, while the appeal was pending, does not bar the plaintiff in this action. It suffices to say the trial court could not, and this court cannot, take any cognizance of that matter upon a demurrer to the declaration. It may be relevant and pertinent matter on the trial, but, as to this, we express no opinion.

The ruling complained of is right, and an order adjudging its correctness will be entered and certified to the circuit court.

TAYLOR v. CHESAPEAKE & O. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 9, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨171(2)—
DEFENDANT NOT NEGLIGENT NOT LIABLE FOR FLOOD DAMAGES.

In the absence of some initial or intervening act of negligence on his part contributing thereto one is not liable for damages arising from an act of God, such as an unprecedented flood of waters of great force and volume caused by a cloud burst at the head waters of a creek or river.

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨51—
RIPARIAN OWNER HAS RIGHT TO UNOB-STRUCTED FLOW OF STREAM.

A riparian proprietor has as a general rule the right to have the waters of a stream or water course pass his land in its natural flow unobstructed and to render anyone violating or interfering with such right liable to him in damages sustained thereby.

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨171(1)—
RIPARIAN OWNER MAY CONSTRUCT BAR-RIERS TO KEEP FLOOD WATERS IN STREAM.

The only limitation on such right of a riparian owner is that any other riparian owner may erect barriers or dykes on his own land on the banks of such water course or on the interior of his land for the purpose of confining flood waters within the natural banks of the stream although such action may result in injury to another riparian owner.

4. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨171(1)—
RIPARIAN OWNER MAY NOT OBSTRUCT STREAM, FLOODING LAND OF ANOTHER.

But such limitation upon the general rule will not justify a riparian owner or other person in erecting or placing within the channel or banks of such stream any obstruction or barrier which will interfere with the free flow of the waters therein or cause the same to be backed up and to flood the land or property of a riparian owner along such stream.

Case Certified from Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

Action by W. O. Taylor against the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company. Demurrer to declaration sustained, and questions presented, with circuit court's rulings thereon, certified for review. Judgment reversed, demurrer overruled, and cause remanded.

J. Howard Hundley and H. W. Houston, both of Charleston, for plaintiff.

Fitzpatrick, Campbell, Brown & Davis, and C. W. Strickling, all of Huntington, for defendant.

MILLER, P. The sufficiency of plaintiff's declaration was challenged by defendant's demurrer. The court below sustained the demurrer, and has certified the questions presented with its rulings thereon to us for review.

The substantial averments are that the plaintiff was owner of certain real estate and personal property in the town of Eskdale, situated upon and near the banks of Cabin Creek, a non-navigable stream, and about one hundred yards above the trestles or bridges of the defendant company crossing said creek; that on or about August 9, 1916, there was a cloud burst on the head waters of said creek which caused a flood therein of unprecedented volume and violence to sweep down the valley and channel of said creek and through said town of Eskdale and Cane Fork and over and through said trestles or bridges of the defendant company, carrying large quantities of wreckage and debris before it; and that defendant through its agents, servants and employees acting within the scope of their employment and with full knowledge that the said flood was sweeping down the channel of said creek toward its said railroad trestles or bridges, and in disregard of its duty not to divert, impede or obstruct the natural flow of the waters in said creek so as to cause them to flow back, over and upon the plaintiff's property and damage it, and for the purpose and with the object of protecting its said trestles or bridges from being washed away and destroyed by said flood, wrongfully, negligently, knowingly and unlawfully ran or caused to be run and propelled a large railroad engine, owned and controlled by it, out upon one of said trestles or bridges just below the said town of Eskdale and just below plaintiff's property, and in the course and path way of the waters of said flood, and there to remain and to obstruct the natural flow of the waters in said creek, and causing the wreckage and debris then being conveyed down said stream, and thereby causing the water to be dammed and backed up stream and over and upon plaintiff's said property, whereby it was damaged and destroyed and whereby he sustained great damage and loss, amounting to ten thousand dollars.

[1] It is conceded on both sides that the cloud burst causing the flood and the waters of unprecedented volume and force to flow down the creek as alleged constituted an act of God for which the defendant without some initial act of negligence on its part could not be rendered liable in damages to plaintiff. This is a well settled proposition of law in this State and elsewhere. Williams v. Columbus Producing Co., 80 W. Va. 683, 93 S. E. 809, L. R. A. 1918B, 179; Atkinson v. Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co., 74 W. Va. 633, 82 S. E. 502.

But counsel for plaintiff contend that with knowledge on the part of defendant of the oncoming flood waters, the placing of its engine on the trestle or bridge in the middle of the creek and in the way of the stream so as to obstruct the natural flow of the water therein, which together with the wreckage and debris caught thereby caused the water to be dammed and backed up upon plaintiff's property as alleged, constituted an original act of negligence and invasion of his rights for which defendant is liable to account to him in damages.

[2] The right of a riparian proprietor to have the waters of a stream or water course pass his land in its natural course unobstructed and to hold anyone violating this right liable for damages sustained thereby is not controverted. This proposition is well settled and recognized not only by the decisions of this court but elsewhere. Roberts v. Martin, 72 W. Va. 92, 77 S. E. 535; Williams v. Columbus Producing Company and Atkinson v. Chesapeake Ry. Co., supra; Cline v. Norfolk & Western Railway Co., 69 W. Va. 436, 71 S. E. 705; Cubbins v. Mississippi River Commission, 241 U. S. 351, 36 Sup. Ct. 671, 60 L. Ed. 1041.

[3, 4] The only limitation upon this right is that each riparian owner for his own protection may erect barriers or dykes so as to confine the flood waters within the natural banks of the stream, a right pertaining to all such proprietors, and when exercised no one has the right to complain of another, although the effect of the thing done may have caused some injury to him or his property. Cubbins v. Mississippi River Commission, supra, 241 U. S. page 364, 36 Sup. Ct. 671, 60 L. Ed. 1041, and cases cited.

The contention of counsel for demurrant is that because of the accidental and extraordinary conditions existing at the time of the alleged injury, the defendant had the right to run its engine upon the trestle or bridge, not for the purpose of restraining the flood waters to the natural banks of the creek and thereby protecting its property, but to hold in place works constructed by it across the stream, though the result of that act was to obstruct the free flow of the waters in the channel, catching the wreckage and debris therein, and to dam up the water and throw it back upon plaintiff. We find no warrant for this position in C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Meriwether, 120 Va. 55, 91 S. E. 92, nor in Cubbins v. Mississippi River Commission, supra, nor in Jackson v. United States, 230 U. S. 1, 33 Sup. Ct. 1011, 57 L. Ed. 1363, cited and relied on by counsel. The only right recognized in these cases is the defensive one accorded owners to protect themselves against damages by defensive works constructed at or upon the borders of rivers or creeks or on the interior of their own lands against such extraordinary conditions. This is the limitation recognized by very ancient authority and in the federal and other cases cited. But they furnish no precedent for the position of counsel that the defendant might lawfully in the emergency existing cast the burden of loss on plaintiff in order to protect its own property. Section 50, subd. 6 of chapter 54 (sec. 2949) of the Code gives railroad companies the right to cross with their railroads along or upon any stream or water course, but specifically requires them to restore such stream or water course to its former state so as not to injure or impair its usefulness.

The case presented by the declaration, in our opinion comes clearly within the principles of Williams v. Columbus Producing Company and Atkinson v. Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co., supra, and Neal v. Railroad Co., 47 W. Va. 316, 34 S. E. 914. The first of these cases cited originated or grew out of the same flood conditions on Cabin Creek involved in the case at bar. The only material difference in the facts is that in the Williams case the injury resulted from the building of an oil well derrick and oil tanks within the banks of the creek, while in this case the alleged negligence consisted in placing a railroad engine across the stream in view of the approaching waters to avoid damages to the trestles or bridges of the railroad company. The latter was as much an initial act of negligence as the other.

Counsel for defendant also rely on cases involving the blowing up of buildings to prevent the spread of fire; such as Keller v. Corpus Christi, 50 Tex. 614, 32 Am. Rep. 613, and Surocco v. Geary, 3 Cal. 69, 58 Am. Dec. 385, all involving the exercise of the police power of the State. We think these cases have no application to the case at bar.

Our conclusion is to reverse the judgment below, to overrule the demurrer to the declaration and to remand the case to the circuit court.

PITTSBURGH & WEST VIRGINIA GAS CO. v. RICHARDSON.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Sept. 9, 1919.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. MINES AND MINERALS Ⓒ79(5) — GAS LEASE—FREE USE BY LESSOR FOR DOMESTIC PURPOSES.

An owner of real estate, who has leased the same for the production of oil or gas therefrom, with a stipulation in such lease that he shall be allowed to use at his residence gas from any well drilled upon the premises for domestic purposes, free of charge, is entitled, in case a producing well is drilled upon such premises, to such quantity of gas produced therefrom as is reasonably necessary for his domestic uses, for the purposes to which such natural gas is ordinarily devoted.

2. MINES AND MINERALS Ⓒ79(7) — GAS LEASE—RESERVATION OF FREE GAS FOR DOMESTIC PURPOSES—METERS.

A regulation by a lessee in an oil and gas lease for the establishment and maintenance of meters upon lines furnishing free gas to the lessor, under the terms of the lease providing that such lessor is entitled to the use of gas free of charge for domestic purposes, is a reasonable and proper regulation, and a court of equity will enjoin such lessor from interfering with or obstructing such lessee in the installation, maintenance, or reading of such meters.

3. GAS Ⓒ2—LESSOR'S FREE USE OF NATURAL GAS—REPORT AS TO AMOUNT—INJUNCTION.

A regulation by the Public Service Commission of West Virginia, requiring all producers of natural gas who furnish any of their product to persons free of charge to measure such part thereof by a meter, and to report the amount thereof to the commission at certain intervals, is a reasonable and proper regulation, and any interference or obstruction upon the part of such free user of gas to the carrying out of such regulation will be enjoined by a court of equity.

Case Certified from Circuit Court, Marion County.

Suit for injunction by the Pittsburgh & West Virginia Gas Company against Elmus P. Richardson. Demurrer to bill sustained, and temporary injunction dissolved, and question as to sufficiency of bill certified. Decree reversed, temporary injunction reinstated, and cause remanded.

H. H. Rose, of Fairmont, and Law & McCue, of Clarksburg, for plaintiff.

RITZ, J. Plaintiff is the owner of a lease for oil and gas purposes on a certain tract of land owned by the defendant, by the terms of which lease the defendant is entitled to have free gas for domestic purposes for one house from any gas well drilled or utilized on said premises. A gas well was drilled upon the premises, and in accordance with the terms of said lease defendant was allowed to make connection with plaintiff's gas line in order to secure a supply of gas for his domestic purposes, and the same has been continuously furnished to him under the terms of said lease for many years. In July, 1915, the Public Service Commission of West Virginia adopted a rule providing that all gas furnished without charge within the state should be metered, and that reports should be made to it monthly of the quantities of gas so furnished. The plaintiff's bill alleges that in order to comply with this provision, as well as in order to be in a position to protect itself against the waste of gas by the defendant, it desired to install a meter upon the pipe supplying gas to the defendant's residence. To this the defendant objected, and, the plaintiff having installed said meter, the defendant removed the same. This suit was then brought and an injunction asked to restrain the defendant from interfering with the plaintiff in the installation of a meter upon his supply line, and the maintenance and reading of the same at proper intervals. A temporary injunction was granted, but subsequently, when the defendant appeared and demurred to the bill, the demurrer was sustained, and the temporary injunction dissolved. The question arising upon the sufficiency of said bill is now certified to this court.

[1, 2] The plaintiff insists that it is entitled to establish a meter upon the defendant's supply line, entirely at its own expense, as one of the practicable ways of securing information for the proper regulation of its business, and also in order that it may comply with the regulation made by the Public Service Commission of West Virginia. It is a little difficult to understand why the defendant objects to having the quantity of gas used by him ascertained in this manner. It involves no expense to him, nor does it appear how it can in any manner inconvenience him in the exercise of his right. The quantity of gas to which the defendant is entitled under this free gas clause in his lease is not unlimited, but is only such amount as is customary and reasonable for his domestic uses. Hall v. Philadelphia Co., 72 W. Va. 573, 78 S. E. 755; Harbert v. Hope Natural Gas Co., 76 W. Va. 207, 84 S. E. 770, L. R. A. 1915E, 570. It cannot be said that the plaintiff has any arbitrary right to determine such amount. Neither has the defendant the right to say that he may use the gas produced to any extent which he wants, real or capricious, may demand. He is entitled under his contract only to so much gas free of charge as is ordinarily used, and as is reasonably necessary for such domestic purposes as natural gas is usually devoted to. This being true, it is entirely proper for the plaintiff to adopt such regulatory measures as may be practicable and appropriate for the purpose of determining that its product is not being wasted. Whatever production of gas remains after the free use thereof by the defendant is the property of the plaintiff. If the defendant uses more gas than his reasonable wants require, if gas is wasted by him, either because of defective appliances, or because of excessive use thereof, to the extent that such quantity exceeds his reasonable ordinary requirements, he is taking the property of the plaintiff. It is represented by the plaintiff that this free gas is in many instances furnished through pipe lines constructed by the users thereof. These lines become out of order; they leak, and much gas is wasted in this way. These leaks can only be determined by a system of continuous inspection, unless meters are allowed to be installed, in which case such meters will give information as to any excessive use and waste, and lead to the repair of any defects or leaks in the supply line, or the correction of any wasteful use of the substance. We are very clearly of the opinion that inasmuch as it appears from the allegations of the bill that the attachment of this meter to the supply line of the defendant is a practicable and appropriate way of detecting any loss of gas by leaks, or wasteful consumption of the same, and further that it will not in any way hinder or obstruct the defendant in the full and free exercise of his rights, the plaintiff had and has a right to enforce such regulation, and that the attempt of the defendant to interfere with it in the installation, maintenance and reading of such meter is an invasion of its right in this regard, which a court of equity will prevent.

[3] Aside from the right of the plaintiff to protect its property by this regulatory measure, it would seem that the authority of the Public Service Commission to make the regulation which it has made is entirely justified. It is shown by the bill that the amount of gas delivered to free gas consumers, so far as it has been able to be accurately measured, is something like 30 times as much as is delivered to other consumers for similar service. One of the duties devolved upon the Public Service Commission is to regulate the distribution of natural gas, and undoubtedly the purpose of the regulation it has adopted is to prevent the waste or improper use thereof to the end that as large an amount as possible may be devoted to the beneficial uses of the inhabitants of the state. The regulations adopted by the Public Service Commission are appropriate, to say the least, for the effectuation of this purpose, and it may be said that not only does the plaintiff have the right to install these meters with the view of giving effect to the Public Service Commission's regulation, but it is its duty to do so, and it is entirely competent for a court of equity to restrain any one who interferes with the discharge of such duty.

We are, therefore, of opinion to reverse the decree of the circuit court sustaining the demurrer and dissolving the injunction, overrule the demurrer, reinstate the temporary injunction, and remand the cause for further proceedings.

LOUIS STIX & CO. et al. v. YORK et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 9, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

EXECUTION  $\Leftrightarrow$  403 — SUIT IN EQUITY SOLE REMEDY AGAINST PROPERTY INCAPABLE OF SEIZURE.

The remedy given by section 15 of chapter 141 (sec. 5137) of the Code of 1913 to enforce the lien of an execution upon property owned by the judgment debtor not capable of manual seizure, possession, and delivery, and sale by the officer under the execution, that is, by suit in equity by or in the name of the officer, is exclusive of all other remedies. A judgment creditor cannot in his own name maintain such suit.

Case Certified from Circuit Court, Wayne County.

Bill by Louis Stix & Co. and others against J. F. York and others. Demurrer to amended bill overruled, and correctness of the ruling certified. Reversed and remanded.

Williams, Scott & Lovett, of Huntington, for defendants.

MILLER, P. We pass the questions presented by the demurrer, sustained, to the original bill. The plaintiffs have by their amended bill waived any questions arising thereon, and rely solely on the amended bill.

The court below overruled defendant's demurrer to the amended bill, and the correctness of that ruling has been certified to us, pursuant to the statute.

Plaintiffs allege recovery by them of certain judgments against the defendant J. F. York, and the docketing thereof in the clerk's office of the county court in the judgment lien docket, and the suing out of executions thereon, the placing of the same in the hands of the proper officer, and the return thereof by him indorsed "No property found."

They furthermore allege that the judgment debtor owns a large amount of the stock of the defendant York Realty Company, a corporation, and that their said judgments, which have not been paid, constitute valid liens on all of the property of the said York. It was probably intended to allege that by virtue of their said executions plaintiffs had a valid lien on the shares of stock of said York in the York Realty Company, but this fact is not otherwise distinctly alleged, except by the allegation that said judgments constitute liens on all the judgment debtor's property located in Wayne County, where they were so recovered and docketed.

The proposition of law relied on to reverse the decree of the circuit court is that a suit to enforce the lien of an execution can be brought and maintained only by or in the name of the officer in whose hands the execution was placed, and that this remedy given by section 15 of chapter 141 (sec. 5137) of the Code is the exclusive remedy in such cases. If this proposition be correct, the demurrer to the amended bill should also have been sustained.

Stock in a corporation being by statute personal estate, a personal judgment against the stockholder constitutes no lien thereon, and without some ground of equitable jurisdiction other than the supposed lien, equity has no jurisdiction to enforce payment thereof out of such personal estate. But by execution a lien may be created on personal estate, such as stock in a corporation, not susceptible of being reduced to possession by the officer and sold and disposed of by him, under chapter 140, §§ 1-17 (secs. 5106-5122), of the Code, which may be enforced by the specific remedy provided by section 15 of said chapter 141. Manifestly the view of the circuit court was that a judgment creditor independently of the officer may maintain the suit and enforce the lien of his execution.

We are cited to no case in which this exact point has ever been adjudicated. But we are disposed to hold that the remedy prescribed by the statute is exclusive of all others and must be pursued. The statute gives the lien and prescribes the remedy. The only case cited and relied on by counsel for demurrants is Lambert v. Huff, Andrews & Thomas Co., 96 S. E. 1031, 1 A. L. R. 650. The extent to which that case goes in point of decision is that though an execution creates a lien upon shares of the capital stock of a corporation owned by a debtor, being intangible property and of the nature of choses in action and not capable of manual seizure, possession and delivery, they cannot be seized and sold under an execution by the officer. Wherefore the necessity of resorting to the remedy of a suit by or in the name of the officer, as prescribed by the statute. This statute empowers the officer holding the execution to sue in his own name for enforcement of the lien, and makes it his duty to do so if indemnified, and permits the creditor to sue in the name of the officer at his own costs and expense. At common law stock in a corporation by reason of its character as property was not subject to execution or attachment. Lipscomb's Adm'r v. Condon, 56 W. Va. 416, 49 S. E. 392, 67 L. R. A. 670, 107 Am. St. Rep. 938. But as the cases all hold, the statute has changed this, both as to executions and attachments. It is not subject to attachment or execution but in the manner and by the remedies prescribed.

The right of a shareholder in a corporation is not to any specific property, but to such a proportion of it all which the owner has in the management of the corporation, in the surplus profits, and upon dissolution in all the assets remaining after paying the debts, an equitable right. In Swann, Adm'r, v. Summers, 19 W. Va. 115, it was decided that the remedy to enforce a purely equitable liability is provided in said section 15 of chapter 141, by suit in equity in the name of the sheriff or of such other officer as the court may designate.

Our conclusion is that the demurrer to the amended bill should have been sustained, and that the decree below must be reversed and the cause remanded.

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS §408(1)—SPECIAL ASSESSMENT—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE.

A statute purporting to impose liability upon one or more property owners to the relief of other taxpayers, by way of a special assessment for the improvement or maintenance of a public road, street or alley, is to be construed strictly, and, if its scope is doubtful, such doubt will be resolved against the public and in favor of the property owners.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS §413(2)—SPECIAL ASSESSMENT—STATUTE.

Where, as in this case, the amendment of a city charter omits a provision theretofore contained therein imposing liability upon abutting property owners, by way of special assessment, for the cost of paving street intersections and of setting curbing, and provides further that the city council shall fix the amount of the assessment and do all other things in connection therewith as is provided in a preceding section of the charter, which specifically states that such costs shall be borne and paid by the city and shall not be included in the amount chargeable to abutting owners, such omission and specific reference to a different provision will be deemed and treated as made with the intention thereafter to exonerate abutting owners from such liability.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

Suit for injunction by S. F. Bonham, who sues, etc., against the City of Charleston. From a decree making perpetual an injunction, the defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Donald O. Blagg, of Charleston, for appellant.

E. B. Dyer and Morgan Owen, both of Charleston, for appellee.

LYNCH, J. Complaining of a decree of the circuit court of Kanawha county which made perpetual an injunction restraining the city of Charleston from assessing against the property of the plaintiff and the property of others similarly situated, in proportionate shares, certain portions of the cost of grading and paving Monongalia street in said city, namely, the cost of curbing along the same and of paving the street intersections, the defendant city prosecutes this appeal. The sole question to be determined is whether or not under section 88 of the charter of the city of Charleston, as amended by the Legislature of 1919, the city is authorized to assess against abutting property owners the cost of the entire improvement, including curbing and street crossings or intersections.

[2] Prior to the amendment of 1919 the city charter (chapter 1, Acts 1915, Municipal Charters) provided two methods for paving the streets of the city:

(1) Under section 61, known as the "bond issue plan," by which the city council was authorized to cause any street or alley in said city to be paved when it deemed it expedient so to do, and upon completion of the work to pay the contractor the full cost of the work out of the city's funds, and to reimburse itself by means of an assessment against the owners of property abutting on the street improved. It was expressly provided in that section, however, that—

"The cost of such paving or improvement chargeable to the abutting owners is not to include any portion of the amount paid for paving of squares at intersection of streets or for curbing, which shall in all cases be borne and paid by the city."

(2) Under section 88, known as the "certificate plan," which in part was as follows:

"Upon the petition in writing of the owners of not less than sixty per cent. of the lineal feet of the property abutting upon any block of any avenue, street or alley in said city, asking the city council to grade, curb, pave or macadamize, or otherwise permanently improve such avenue, street or alley, or to construct a sewer in front of said block, and offering in said petition to have their property so abutting * * * assessed not only with their part of the cost of such improvements abutting upon their property, * * * but also * * * to have their said property proportionately assessed with the total costs of paving, grading, curbing or macadamizing, or other permanent improvements, of the intersection at the end of said block of the avenue, street or alleys so * * * improved, * * * the council may order the block of such avenue, street or alley * * * to be paved or otherwise permanently improved as prayed for therein, and the council may order the mayor and city clerk to issue to the contractor doing the paving or other said improvement a certificate for each installment of the amount of the assessment to be paid by the owner of any lot or fractional part thereof fronting on such block, * * * and the council shall fix the amount of such assessments, advertise for bids, and do all other things in connection therewith as is provided for paving or permanently improving any street or alley or any portion thereof in this act, and such certificates shall be issued in the same number of installments and payable at the same time as other paving of (or) permanent improvements are provided to be paid for. * * *"

Under that section it was not necessary for the city to provide funds in the first instance, by a bond issue or other means, to pay for the improvement. Instead, upon completion of the work, it issued and delivered to the contractor certificates against each abutting owner for his proportionate share of the total expenditure, including the street curbing and the paving of street intersections. But action under this section was dependent upon the petition in writing of the owners of 60 per cent. of the lineal feet of the property abutting on the street. The petitioners thereby expressly consented to be charged with the entire cost of the improvement.

Because of the difficulty frequently experienced in obtaining the requisite number of petitioners, the city having no funds with which to pave under the "bond issue plan," section 88 was amended and re-enacted by the Legislature of 1919, omitting all reference to the necessity of a "petition in writing by the owners of * * * the property abutting upon any block," and providing simply that "council may order" the same to be paved, provided "two-thirds of all the members elected to council shall concur therein." It was under this amended section 88 that the paving and curbing involved here were done. The material parts of section 88, as so amended, are:

"In addition to the method provided for paving streets by section 61 of the charter, * * * the council may order any block, street, avenue or alley to be paved or otherwise permanently improved, and * * * the mayor and city clerk to issue to the contractor * * * a certificate for each installment of the amount of the assessment to be paid by the owner of any lot or fractional part thereof fronting on such street, avenue or alley, * * * and * * * shall fix the amount of such assessment, advertise for bids and do all other things in connection therewith as is provided for paving or permanently improving any street or alley or any portion thereof in section 61. * * *"

Section 88, as it stood before the amendment of 1919, authorized the assessment of the entire cost of paving, including the setting of curbing and the paving of street intersections, upon abutting property owners, but only upon the petition of the prescribed percentage of such owners. Section 88, as amended, omits reference to curbing and street intersections. It is contended by the city, however, that it was the intention of the Legislature to continue in effect the method of paving streets as formerly provided by section 88 and again to include in the assessment the cost of curbing and of paving intersections; in other words, that no material change was made except by dispensing with the necessity of a petition by property owners.

This construction seems to us not to comport with the language employed in that section, as amended. It materially changes the old method of procedure in that it empowers the city council to order the paving and improvement of any street or alley without the necessity of a petition by abutting property owners, and irrespective of their wishes, provided two-thirds of the members of the council concur in the passage of the ordinance. It also omits that provision of the section as it originally stood whereby the cost of curbing and of the paving of street intersections was charged to abutting owners and expressly requires that—"The city council shall fix the amount of such assessment, advertise for bids, and do all other things in connection therewith as is provided for paving or permanently improving any street or alley, or any portion thereof, in section 61."

The section last referred to clearly states that the cost of curbing and of paving intersections "shall in all cases be borne and paid by the city," and not included in the amount chargeable to abutting owners. This, when considered with the omission of the provision from section 88 authorizing the inclusion of such costs in the assessment when the abutting owners petitioned therefor, seems to evince a legislative intent not to impose that burden upon such owners. Under the section as it originally stood, it was only when the owners petitioned for the improvement and included in their petition the offer to pay the total cost thereof that such burden could be imposed. The Legislature may have had reasons of its own for omitting the last-named costs when it provided for the paving of streets upon the order of the city council without the necessity of a petition therefor by abutting owners and irrespective of their wishes. New and additional powers are thereby bestowed upon the council, and the reference made in section 88, as amended, to the provisions of section 61 strengthen the conclusion that the Legislature intended to impose only such burdens upon abutting owners under that section as are imposed by section 61.

[1] It is only by a forced construction, if at all, departing from the natural meaning of words, that the contention of appellant can be sustained. Such construction we are unwilling to approve, especially in view of the rule that statutes which impose burdens generally are to be construed strictly. 2 Lewis' Sutherland, Statutory Construction (2d Ed.) §§ 536-538. In Fox's Adm'rs v. Com., 16 Grat. (Va.) 1, 11, the court says:

"It is a well-settled rule of law that every charge upon the citizen must be imposed by clear and unambiguous language. Statutes which impose a duty upon the public will be critically construed with reference to the particular language in which they are expressed. When there is any ambiguity found, the construction must be in favor of the public; because it is a general rule that where the public are to be charged with a burden, the intention of the Legislature to impose that burden must be explicitly and distinctly shown."

"Laws imposing a license or tax are strictly construed, and whenever there is doubt as to the meaning or scope of such laws they are construed more strongly against the government and in favor of the citizen." Brown v. Com., 98 Va. 366, 370, 36 S. E. 485, 487; Jamison v. Com., 120 Va. 137, 149, 90 S. E. 640.

See, also, State v. County Court, 60 W. Va. 339, 55 S. E. 382.

While it is true that statutes conferring power of taxation should not be construed so strictly as to defeat the manifest purpose or intent thereof, or to withhold or deny powers plainly given (County Court v. Brammer, 68 W. Va. 25, 69 S. E. 450; State v. Board of Education, 68 W. Va. 40, 69 S. E. 378), it is sufficient to state here that, upon a fair construction of the charter involved, the power alleged to exist in the city council to include in its assessment against abutting property owners the cost of curbs and the paving of intersections is not manifest or plainly authorized within the meaning of the two cases just cited.

Nor is Hager v. Melton, 66 W. Va. 62, 66 S. E. 13, inconsistent with the result reached in this case. There the charter provided that the owners of abutting property should pay two-thirds "of the total cost of grading and paving said street, alley, or portion thereof," exclusive of the cost of curbing, which was expressly made a charge against the city. The court held the language thus used to be sufficient to authorize the inclusion of the cost of paving street intersections in the estimate as part of the total cost. Here, however, the reference to the provisions of section 61 seems clearly to evince an intention that they should govern; and they by their express terms exclude the cost of paving intersections and of setting curbs.

For these reasons we affirm the decree.

Granting, but not conceding, that the court erred in rejecting the evidence of O. A. M. Hancock, Bugg, and Jinright. In addition, a model of the machine and pictures thereof were introduced in evidence, and were with the jury during the consideration of the case.

Where a life insurance policy provides that, "upon failure to pay a premium on or before the date when due, or any note [italics ours] or other obligation given therefor, this policy shall thereupon cease without any action or notice by the company, and all right shall be forfeited to the company, except as herein provided," the policy becomes forfeited by failure to pay upon maturity a note given in payment of a premium. Stephenson v. Empire Life Insurance Co., 139 Ga. 82, 76 S. E. 592.

(a) Under the allegations of the petition in a suit brought by the beneficiaries of a life insurance policy to recover for the death of the insured which occurred on the 25th day of May, 1915, it being alleged that the insured had paid the first premium and in full payment of the second annual premium due the 21st day of February, 1914, paid to the insurance company a certain sum of money in part payment thereof, and gave to the company a promissory note for the balance, maturing November 1, 1914, and received in return the company's official receipt, and that before the maturity of the note the insurance company did, for a valuable consideration extend the date of maturity of such note until February 21, 1915, upon which latter date the note was not paid, and there being no allegation of any tender to the company, or effort by the insured to make payment of the amount due on the note at or before the last-mentioned date, the policy of insurance became forfeited. That the insurance company, through its authorized agent, did, before such note became due, fraudulently procure from the insured a surrender of the policy was no excuse for a failure upon the part of the insured to afterwards pay such note at maturity.

1. GIFTS  $\S$ 18(1), 19(1), 49(3) — ACTUAL MANUAL DELIVERY UNNECESSARY TO GIFT OF PERSONALTY.

While delivery is essential to a valid gift of personalty, actual manual delivery is not required. The mere fact that the donee of personalty allows possession of the property to remain with the donor will not necessarily defeat the gift. Accordingly, where the evidence shows that a grandfather, whose grandchild lived in the house with him, had stated that he had given to such grandchild a certain heifer, and the heifer continued to remain on the premises and in the lot of the donor, where both the donor and the donee resided, the donee and his wife working for the donor, such evidence is sufficient to authorize the inference that the subject-matter of the alleged gift was delivered to the donee, and that the donor parted with his title and relinquished all dominion and ownership over the property, thereby constituting a valid gift.

CITIZENS' BANK v. TOWN OF LUDOWICI et al. (No. 10193.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Sept. 20, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS  $\S$ 955(2)—IN ACTION ON NOTE, PETITION MUST SHOW POWER TO CONTRACT DEBT.

The petition as originally filed showed an action in three counts against a municipal corporation and its mayor and aldermen, individually, to recover on a promissory note given to secure a loan to the municipality. One of the counts attempted to plead an action for money had and received, and, while so designated by the pleader, its recitals plainly evidence an action on a contract.

(a) The petition, failing to show that the debt evidenced by the note sued on was within the municipality's power to contract or within the saving exceptions of Const. art. 7, § 7, par. 1 (Civ. Code 1910, § 6563), was subject to the general demurrer interposed. See Whigham v. Gulf Refining Co., 20 Ga. App. 428, 93 S. E. 238 (5, 6).

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ¶955(2) — PLEADING ¶8(3), 251 — PETITION FOR MONEY HAD AND RECEIVED, WITHOUT ALLEGATIONS AS TO AUTHORIZED USE, INSUFFICIENT.

The defect stated above was not cured by the amendment seeking to elaborate the third count of the petition, and to convert the action into one for money had and received (even if such procedure were permissible), and the amendment was properly disallowed. The statement therein that "the money had and received by said defendants from petitioner . . . became money actually and beneficially applied by the said defendants to the authorized objects and lawful municipal uses of the said town of Ludowici, or for which revenue or money of the said town of Ludowici may be lawfully used and applied by said town of Ludowici," was a mere conclusion of the pleader; there being no facts recited to authorize it. See, in this connection, Butts County v. Jackson Banking Co., 129 Ga. 801, 810, 811, 60 S. E. 149, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 567, 121 Am. St. Rep. 244; Tate v. City of Elberton, 136 Ga. 301, 71 S. Where a constable is specially deputized by the sheriff, and sworn in, for the purpose of serving a particular writ, he becomes a de facto deputy sheriff, and service by him is legal. *Twiggs v. (Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.

Sept. 18, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. HOMICIDE ¶134 — INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION ¶189(8)—UNDER INDICTMENT FOR MURDER CONVICTION OF INVOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER MAINTAINABLE.

Under an indictment for murder the accused may be convicted of a lesser offense, if the latter is one involved in the homicide and is sufficiently charged in the indictment. Watson v. State, 116 Ga. 607, 43 S. E. 32, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1.

(a) Where such an indictment contains an allegation that the defendant "unlawfully" killed a named person by driving an automobile upon and against such person, then and there giving to such person a mortal wound with said automobile, from which mortal wound such person died, there is sufficiently charged the offense of involuntary manslaughter in the commission of an unlawful act. It is a sufficient allegation of an unlawful act that the automobile was driven upon and against the person alleged to have been killed.

2. DEMURRER TO INDICTMENT—EXCEPTIONS TO CHARGE.

For the reasons above stated the demurrer to the indictment was, upon all of the grounds thereof, properly overruled, and the exceptions to the charge of the court and to the admission of evidence upon the ground that same were not germane to an indictment, which failed to charge involuntary manslaughter, are wholly without merit.

3. HOMICIDE ¶340(4) — ERROR IN CHARGE ON MURDER HARMLESS ON CONVICTION OF MANSLAUGHTER.

The portions of the charge of the court relative to the law governing a conviction of the offense of murder were harmless to the defendant, since he was, upon conviction of involuntary manslaughter, acquitted of the offense of murder. Land v. State, 11 Ga. App. 761, 76 S. E. 78 (2).

4. HOMICIDE  $\S$ 170, 174(1) — IN PROSECUTION FOR KILLING IN AUTOMOBILE COLLISION, EVIDENCE ADMISSIBLE TO IDENTIFY CAR.

Evidence that the defendant was seen, shortly after the homicide, running his car in the same peculiar manner in which the car which ran over and killed the deceased was being run at the time of the homicide, was relevant for the purpose of identification, and to further illustrate the issue.

5. ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR.

The assignments of error not dealt with above are not insisted upon.

6. CRIMINAL LAW  $\S$ 1160 — VERDICT — EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR  $\S$ 1046(3)—TRIAL  $\S$ 25(7)—ERROR IN REFUSING RIGHT TO OPEN AND CLOSE HARMLESS.

The defendant's plea having admitted the execution of the note sued on and the right of possession thereof in the plaintiff, and the defendant, prior to the introduction of any evidence, having demanded the opening and conclusion, the court erred in denying him this right, and allowing the plaintiff first to introduce his evidence. However, this error does not require a new trial, since upon the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence the court reversed its ruling, and gave the defendant the opening and conclusion of the argument.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR  $\S$ 1062(1)—SUBMISSION OF ISSUE AS TO ATTORNEY'S FEE CURED BY WRITING OFF AMOUNT FROM JUDGMENT.

The error in submitting to the jury the question of attorney's fees was cured by the plain-tiff's writing off from the judgment, upon direction of the court, the amount found for attorney's fees.

3. TRIAL  $\S$ 171—REFUSAL TO DIRECT VERDICT.

The court did not err in refusing to direct a verdict for the defendant. It has been repeatedly held, by this court and the Supreme Court, that the refusal to direct a verdict is never error.

4. REFUSAL OF NEW TRIAL.

The verdict was authorized by the evidence, and the court did not err in refusing a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. TRIAL  $\S$ 260(10) — REQUESTED INSTRUCTIONS, COVERED BY CHARGE GIVEN, NEED NOT BE GIVEN.

The trial judge, having fully and fairly instructed the jury upon the law relative to a reduction in damages by reason of contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff, did not err in failing to again instruct the jury in this connection, when charging upon plaintiff's right to recover for pain and suffering.

2. CHARGE OF COURT.

The charge of the court fully and fairly submitted all the issues to the jury, and is not subject to any of the exceptions thereto.

3. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence authorized the verdict, and no error of law was committed.

1. CHARGE OF COURT.

When considered in connection with the entire charge of the court and in the light of the evidence, there is no error harmful to the defendant in the excerpt from the charge of which complaint is made in the motion for a new trial.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR §987(2)—GEORGIA COURT OF APPEALS CANNOT GRANT NEW TRIAL FOR INSUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

"This court, by the constitutional amendment creating it, is limited in jurisdiction to the correction of errors of law alone, and therefore has no power to grant a new trial on the ground that the verdict is strongly contrary to the weight of the evidence, if there is any evidence at all to support it." *Edge v. (No. 10537.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Sept. 18, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. DIRECTED VERDICT.

The sole issue raised by the dispossessory warrant and the counter affidavit was whether the defendant was holding the premises over and beyond the term of his lease. On this issue the evidence demanded a finding in favor of the plaintiffs, and the court did not err in directing a verdict for them.

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT §18(3)—EVIDENCE INSUFFICIENT TO SHOW NEW LEASE, BUT PROMISE ONLY FOR FUTURE.

The lease under which the defendant held the property expired on January 1, 1919. The evidence does not authorize a finding that a new lease contract was made by the parties, but shows merely that in September, 1918, one of the two members of the plaintiff partnership verbally promised the defendant that, if the defendant would surrender part of the property, he would give him a three-year lease after the expiration of the then existing lease, and that on the strength of this promise, and the reduction of his rent by $15 per month, the defendant relinquished a part of the property to the partnership. Conceding that this partner had a right to make such a lease on behalf of the partnership (which right, however, was expressly denied by the undisputed testimony of the other partner), the evidence clearly showed that no actual lease contract was made, but a mere promise to contract at a future date. See, in this connection, Steininger v. Williams, 63 Ga. 476(3). The defendant himself testified as follows: "I did not continue to use the store under the agreement to lease for three years, but remained there under the old lease from Sheehan expiring January 1, 1919, and in giving back the keys and surrendering the corner I was operating under the lease expiring January 1, 1919."

Under this ruling, the amendment to the motion for a new trial is without merit.

STEPHENS, J. (dissenting). I am of the opinion that the surrender by the tenant of a part of the rented premises before the expiration of his lease, in consideration of the verbal agreement of his landlord to lease to him the remaining part of the premises, occupied by such tenant and not surrendered, for a period of three years from the date of the expiration of the old lease, and the acceptance by the landlord of such surrender, and the actual taking over by him of the part of the premises surrendered by the tenant, constituted a complete contract at the time, to commence in the future, and was not a mere promise to contract at a future date. Steininger v. Williams, 63 Ga. 475 (1). While this perhaps constituted such a part performance as would take the contract out of the operation of the statute of frauds, yet, being a parol agreement respecting the renting of lands for a period longer than one year, it became, under section 3693 of the Civil Code, a tenancy at will, to commence on January 1, 1919. The tenant could not on that date, the date of the issuance of the warrant to dispossess him, while in possession as a tenant at will, be dispossessed as a tenant holding over. It was error, therefore, to direct a verdict in favor of the landlord.

Sept. 18, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CARRIERS — 185(1) — SHIPMENT IN GOOD CONDITION, PRESUMABLY DELIVERED IN SAME CONDITION TO CONNECTING INTERSTATE CARRIER.

In a suit against a connecting carrier in interstate commerce to recover for damage to goods received by it from a preceding carrier and delivered by the connecting carrier at the point of destination in a damaged condition, proof that the goods were delivered in a good condition to the initial carrier raises a presumption that they were received in a good condition by the connecting carrier. There is nothing in the acts of Congress, including the Carmack Amendment (Act June 29, 1906, c. 3591, § 7, pars. 11, 12, 34 Stat. 595 [U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8604, 8604aa]), fixing the liability for interstate carriers for goods damaged in transit, which relieves a connecting carrier of this presumption.

2. CARRIERS — 185(3), 187 — IN ABSENCE OF CONTRARY SHOWING, SHIPMENT WHEN RECEIVED BY CONNECTING CARRIER, IN GOOD CONDITION.

The presumption that goods delivered in good condition to the initial carrier were in good condition when received by the connecting carrier is not conclusive as a matter of law, but may be rebutted by proof. In the absence of competent evidence rebutting this presumption, and showing that the goods were not in good condition when received by the connecting carrier, the evidence is sufficient, where there is proof of the other material allegations in plaintiff's petition, to support a verdict against the connecting carrier. Capital City Oil Co. v. Central of Ga. Ry. Co., 16 Ga. App. 750, 86 S. E. 57.

(a) Where the only evidence introduced in rebuttal of this presumption was that of the baggage master of the connecting carrier, who testified that the goods were received by such connecting carrier from the preceding carrier in bad condition, and that he knew this only from his records, the jury had a right to conclude that the witness was testifying to a conclusion merely, and had no actual personal knowledge of the circumstances. In view of the presumption, it cannot be said that as a matter of law this evidence was conclusive of the fact that the carrier had received the goods in a bad condition. Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Ry. v. Truitt Co., 17 Ga. App. 236, 240, 86 S. E. 421.

3. CARRIERS — 187 — PRESUMPTION THAT SHIPMENT WAS RECEIVED IN GOOD CONDITION BY CONNECTING CARRIER REBUTTABLE.

The charge of the court as a whole instructed the jury that the defendant carrier would not be liable unless the goods were damaged while in defendant's possession, and that the presumption as to the receipt of the goods in good condition by the defendant was one of fact and subject to rebuttal. This issue was fairly submitted to the jury. The charge of the court was not erroneous for any reason assigned, and the evidence authorized the verdict.

such company is located, or in any county where said insurance company may have an agent, * * * or in any county where such agent * * * was located at the time the cause of action accrued, or the contract was made out of which said cause of action arose." Civ. Code 1910, § 2563.

2. INSURANCE ¶811—IN SUIT AGAINST INSURER, DIRECTED VERDICT FOR WANT OF JURISDICTION IN COUNTY OF SUBORDINATE LODGE ERRONEOUS.

In a suit against a fraternal benefit society by a beneficiary of a policy issued by the society, where it is shown that, while the Supreme Lodge of the society had its head office in another county within the state, it had a subordinate lodge in the county in which suit was pending, in which subordinate lodge the deceased had applied for membership and had been initiated, and had paid his dues to the secretary of the same, who sent them to the head office, and that the subordinate lodge had a place in the county where it met regularly, the jury were authorized to infer that the subordinate lodge was the agent of the defendant in the county in which the suit was pending, and that the court had jurisdiction. It follows, therefore, that upon the trial of an issue formed upon a plea to the jurisdiction, where the evidence showed the above facts, it was error for the trial judge to direct a verdict in behalf of the defendant, sustaining the plea to the jurisdiction. Supreme Circle of Benevolence v. Beall, 18 Ga. App. 425, 89 S. E. 630.

3. INSURANCE ¶811—SUIT AGAINST BENEFIT SOCIETY IN ONLY COUNTY WHERE IT HAD AN AGENT PROPER.

The jurisdiction of the superior court of Wilkes county, in which the suit was pending and where the defendant had an agent, was not ousted by an agreement signed by the insured in his application for the issuance of the policy, or by its being stipulated on the back of the policy issued, that "suit shall be instituted on said policy against said district grand lodge only in the state court of Fulton county, as the order has no agent or agency in any other county of said state." BANKRUPTCY ¶437 — EVIDENCE INSUFFICIENT TO SHOW MALICIOUS TORT IN COLLISION BETWEEN AUTOMOBILES.

The sole question in this case is whether the evidence authorized a finding by the jury that the defendant willfully and intentionally drove his automobile against the automobile in which the plaintiff was riding, so as to constitute such a malicious tort as would come within section 17a(2) of the Bankruptcy Act of July 1, 1898 (30 Stat. 550, c. 541 [U. S. Comp. St. § 9601]). The record fails to disclose any evidence which would have authorized such a finding. The plaintiff himself testified, in effect, that he did not know, and could not say, that the defendant deliberately or intentionally did so. The court, therefore, did not err in directing a verdict for the defendant. See, in this connection, Collier on Bankruptcy (11th Ed.) 402, 441; Tinker v. Colwell, 193 U. S. 473, 481, 24 Sup. Ct. 505, 48 L. Ed. 758, 11 Am. Bankr. Rep. 568.

STEPHENS, J. (dissenting). If there is any evidence to authorize the inference that the defendant willfully and intentionally drove his automobile into the automobile in which the plaintiff was riding, there would then be an issue of fact for determination by the jury, and the direction of a verdict by the trial judge was error. There is evidence in this case that the two automobiles were approaching each other along a public road; that the defendant held his course and failed to turn out, although there was ample room in the road for him to do so and a suitable roadbed to his right for his car to pass over; that the defendant was driving the larger car; and that the defendant, after the collision, continued on without stopping. Without reference to the rest of the evidence, this, it would seem, is sufficient to authorize the inference that the defendant was acting willfully and intentionally.

"Assault and battery may be committed by striking another with an automobile intentionally, or by driving the machine so recklessly as to justify a jury in finding that there was a reckless disregard of human life and safety. Dennard v. State, 14 Ga. App. 485, 81 S. E. 378. And see Gallery v. State, 92 Ga. 464(2), 17 S. E. 863; Collier v. State, 39 Ga. 31, 34 [99 Am. Dec. 449]. The same is true where, under like circumstances, the automobile is driven against another vehicle in which persons are riding, whereby the collision occasions bruises, blows, and similar physical injuries to persons in the vehicle so struck." Tift v. State, 17 Ga. App. 663, 88 S. E. 41 (1), and authorities there cited.

In the Dennard Case, supra, it was said:

"A reckless disregard of human life may be the equivalent of a specific intent to kill; and whether it existed * * * was a question for the jury."

That the plaintiff in this case was unable to say that the defendant deliberately and intentionally drove into him does not eliminate the issue as raised by the other testimony in the case.

SIMMS v. MASSENGALE ADVERTISING AGENCY. (No. 10534.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Sept. 18, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EVIDENCE  $\S$ 471(2) — EVIDENCE THAT CREDIT FOR ACCOUNT WAS GIVEN DEFENDANT, AND NOT CORPORATION, ADMISSIBLE.

The court did not err in admitting in evidence the testimony of an officer of the plaintiff advertising agency that credit for the account sued on was given to the defendant, and not to the milling company, of which the defendant was vice president. Reynolds v. Simpson & Ledbetter, 74 Ga. 454 (1), 460.

2. TRIAL  $\S$ 330(2)—IN ACTION ON SINGLE CONTRACT, RULE AS TO MINGLING ITEMS NOT APPLICABLE.

It does not appear, from the evidence, that there were two separate and distinct transactions, or "orders," between the plaintiff and the defendant; but it appeared that the defendant guaranteed the payment of a single contract for newspaper advertising, and later, by mutual consent, there was merely a substitution of certain newspapers for those originally named in the order. The doctrine, therefore, that where a plaintiff mingles items upon which he is entitled to recover with items upon which he is not entitled to recover, and does not furnish to the jury means to separate them, a verdict and judgment in his favor is contrary to law, is not applicable in this case.

3. EVIDENCE TO SUPPORT VERDICT.

1. CHARGE OF COURT.

The court did not err in charging as complained of in the first and second grounds of the amendment to the motion for a new trial.

2. CRIMINAL LAW $\S$ 823(1), 828—INSTRUCTION AS TO PUNISHMENT NOT ERRONEOUS FOR FAILING TO STATE COURT COULD IGNORE RECOMMENDATION OF JURY.

Error is assigned on the following part of the charge of the court: "The larceny of an automobile, locomobile, motor cycle, or other like vehicle propelled by electricity or gasoline in this state shall be a felony, and any person convicted thereof shall be punished in the penitentiary for a term not less than 1 year nor longer than five years. So you see the offense charged in this indictment is a felony, made so by a special act of the Legislature. However, it is a felony that may be reduced to a misdemeanor. Should the jury believe this defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, and if they so find, they may recommend him to the mercy of the court, in which case, should the court approve the recommendation, the defendant would be punished as for a misdemeanor; that is to say, he would receive a sentence on the chain gang for a term of not more than 12 months, or in the county jail nor more than 6 months, or to pay a fine of not more than $1,000, any one or more, in the discretion of the court." This charge, which is excepted to "for the reason that the trial judge omitted to charge the jury in this connection that if they recommended defendant to the mercy of the court, to be punished as for a misdemeanor, that the court could ignore their recommendation altogether and put the defendant in the penitentiary." This charge was correct and pertinent, and is not rendered erroneous by failure to give other instructions appropriate to the case in connection therewith. Grimsley v. Singletary, 133 Ga. 56, 57, 65 S. E. 92 (3), 134 Am. St. Rep. 196; Western & Atlantic Railroad Co. v. Watkins, 14 Ga. App. 388 (4), 392 (80 S. E. 916), and cases cited. In addition, the judge told the jury: "If you believe the defendant guilty of the offense of larceny of an automobile, the verdict will be: 'We, the jury, find the defendant Leon Johnson guilty.' To which you may add a recommendation, should you see fit."

In Lingerfelt v. State, 125 Ga. 4, 53 S. E. 803 (15 Ann. Cas. 310), the fourth paragraph of the decision is as follows: "Where the court charged that, if the jury should find the defendant guilty generally, he would be subject to confinement in the penitentiary for a time not less than 2 years nor longer than 10 years; that they would have the right to reduce the punishment to that appropriate to a misdemeanor; that, 'if the judge should approve that, he would be punished as for a misdemeanor;' and that the form of verdict proper for that purpose would be to find the defendant guilty and recommend that he be punished as for a misdemeanor—in the absence of any request to charge more specifically on the subject, there was no error in failing to explain to the jury that, in the event they should find the defendant guilty with the recommendation referred to, the judge could disregard such recommendation and punish him as for a felony." In the case of Taylor v. State, 14 Ga. App. 492, 81 S. E. 372, the judge failed to charge the jury that they could recommend that the defendant be punished as for a misdemeanor, and to inform the jury that such a recommendation, to be effective, would have to meet with the approval of the judge. The judgment was reversed because of the total failure of the judge to charge these propositions. However, in discussing this error, Judge Russell said (14 Ga. App. 499, 81 S. E. 376): "In Lingerfelt's Case, it is true, the instructions of the trial judge were not held to be erroneous; and this was because the jury were told that 'if the judge should approve [the recommendation] he would be punished as for a misdemeanor.' The court held only that, in the absence of a request for a more specific charge on the subject, there was no error in failing to explain to the jury that the judge could disregard the recommendation and punish as for a felony; and it is therefore clear to our minds that the instruction was held sufficient because further explanation would only have made more plain the negative pregnant couched in the language used by the trial judge. When the judge, in Lingerfelt's Case, told the jury that the accused would be punished as for a misdemeanor if he approved the recommendation, it was easily to be inferred by the jury that, if the recommendation as to misdemeanor punishment was not approved, the accused would be punished as for a felony." In Frazier v. State, 15 Ga. App. 365, 83 S. E. 273, Judge Wade said in the opinion: "If the judge presiding at the trial of one accused of a felony, where under the law the jury may recommend that he be punished as for a misdemeanor, informs the jury of their right so to recommend, and clearly indicates to them in unmistakable language that the recommendation will not be effective unless it meets with his approval, this is sufficient, though he may not couch the instruction in the precise words set out in the headnote quoted from Taylor v. State, supra." Applying the rule announced in the Lingerfelt Case, and approved in the Taylor and Frazier Cases, it will be seen that, in the absence of a timely and proper written request, there was no error in the failure of the judge to give a more specific charge on this branch of the case.

3. CRIMINAL LAW §1160—VERDICT APPROVED BY JUDGE WILL NOT BE DISTURBED, IN ABSENCE OF ERROR AT LAW.

There was evidence to support the verdict, and, under the uniform and repeated rulings of this court and of our Supreme Court, the verdict approved by the trial judge, where no error of law is committed, will not be disturbed.

1. DEPOSITIONS §109 — EXCEPTION TO OPENING AND READING INTERROGATORIES FOR WANT OF POSTMASTER'S CERTIFICATE OF RECEIPT OVERRULED.

During the trial objection was made to the opening of certain interrogatories and to the reading of the same to the jury, on the ground that "there was no entry upon said envelope as required by law, showing that the postmaster at Jefferson, Ga., had received said interrogatories by due course of mail." The court properly overruled the objection. The record does not show that the interrogatories had been in the clerk's office less than 24 hours prior to the trial, or that the exception to the execution and return was made in writing and notice given to the opposite party before the case was submitted to the jury. Civ. Code 1910, § 5904; Rogers v. Truett, 73 Ga. 386 (1, a); Roper v. Roberts, 143 Ga. 128, 84 S. E. 553 (1).

2. TRIAL  $\Leftrightarrow$ 252(7)—IN ACTION FOR LOSS OF MULE HIRED, INSTRUCTION REQUIRING EXTRAORDINARY CARE OF HIREE ERRONEOUS.

Where suit was brought to recover damages from one to whom a mule was hired, the petition alleging that the mule was taken sick while in the possession of the hirer, and that knowing this fact he "continued to work said mule, mistreated and neglected it, until the mule died," it was error requiring the grant of a new trial for the court to charge: (a) "Extraordinary diligence is that extreme care and caution which every prudent and thoughtful person use in securing and preserving their own property. The absence of such diligence is termed slight neglect." In Evans v. Nail, 1 Ga. App. 45, 57 S. E. 1021, Chief Judge Hill said: "The contract of hire being one of mutual benefit, the hirer is bound only for ordinary diligence, and is responsible only for ordinary negligence. Civil Code [of 1895] § 2907 [Civil Code of 1910, § 3480]; Mayor and Council of Columbus v. Howard, 6 Ga. 218. The judge should have confined his instructions on the subject of negligence to that degree of care which by law was applicable to the case." (b) "In cases of loss the presumption of law is against the bailee, and no excuse avails him unless it was occasioned by the act of God. In order for a bailee to avail himself of this defense, the act of God, he must establish, not only that the act of God occasioned the loss, but that his own negligence did not contribute thereto." This charge is composed of parts of paragraphs 2712 and 2713 of the Civil Code of 1910, which apply to railroads as common carriers and to other like carriers, and is not applicable to the facts of this case, and was likely to confuse and mislead the jury. The illness from which the mule died was not in a legal sense "the act of God." In Central Line of Boats v. Lowe, 50 Ga. 509, Judge McCay said (page 511): "There is, doubtless, a distinction between an 'act of God' and an 'unavoidable accident.' The former covers only natural accidents, such as lightning, earthquakes, tempests, and the like, and not accidents arising from the negligence or act of man." See, also, Cannon v. Hunt, 113 Ga. 509, 38 S. E. 983.

WALLACE v. MOORE. (No. 174.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 24, 1919.)

1. RAILROADS  $\Leftrightarrow$ 62—CANNOT ACQUIRE LAND NOT FOR RAILROAD PURPOSES.

Railroad under its charter (Laws 1852, c. 136), and Revisal 1905, § 2566, and section 2567, subsecs. 2, 3, could not acquire land for other than railroad purposes.

2. PUBLIC LANDS  $\Leftrightarrow$ 164—ON ENTRY OF LAND AS TRUSTEE COURTS WILL EXECUTE TRUST.

Where one makes entry upon land as a trustee, court will execute the trust, under the statutes.

3. RAILROADS  $\Leftrightarrow$ 62—CANNOT ENTER LAND BY TRUSTEE UNLESS INTENDED FOR RAILROAD PURPOSES.

Railroad, having no right under its charter (Laws 1852, c. 136), or under general law (Revisal 1905, § 2566 and section 2567, subsecs. 2, 3), to acquire land for other than railroad purposes, cannot acquire land by procuring a trustee to make entry upon the land in its behalf, in absence of showing that land is to be use for railroad purposes.

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW  $\Leftrightarrow$ 205(6)—CORPORATIONS NOT "CITIZENS" WITHIN PROVISIONS GUARANTEEING PRIVILEGES.

Corporations are not considered "citizens" within the meaning of constitutional and statutory provisions guaranteeing the privileges and immunities of citizenship.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Citizen.]

5. STATUTES  $\Leftrightarrow$ 190—WHETHER "PERSON" INCLUDES CORPORATIONS DEPENDS ON CONTEXT.

Whether the word "person," as used in statute, includes corporations may depend largely on the context and the extent and purpose of the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Person.]

6. PUBLIC LANDS  $\Leftrightarrow$ 164 — WHERE GRANTS ARE AUTHORIZED TO "CITIZENS" AND "PERSONS," CORPORATIONS NOT INCLUDED.

The words "citizens" and "persons," within Revisal 1905, § 1692, authorizing issuance of grants for state lands to any "citizen" of the state and to "persons" who shall have come into the state, do not include corporations.

Appeal from Superior Court, Carteret County; Daniels, Judge.

Proceeding for entry of land by L. I. Moore, trustee, protested by Charles S. Wallace. Judgment dismissing entry, and enterer excepts and appeals. Affirmed.

This is an application for an entry of land instituted by defendant, in which there was protest by plaintiff on possession of said land claiming the same as owner, the ground of his claim being fully set forth in his written protest, duly filed in the proceedings. The facts pertinent to the case are sufficiently shown in the judgment of his honor dismissing the cause as follows:

This cause coming on to be heard before his honor, F. A. Daniels, judge and a jury, counsel for protestant requested in open court that the enterer, L. I. Moore, as trustee, should disclose to the court in whose behalf he was trustee. Without ruling of the court, counsel for the enterer stated that the entry was made as trustee for the Atlantic & North Carolina Railroad Company, and for the purpose of protecting their property adjacent to the water which they claim has been filled in. Thereupon the protestant denied that the property entered was filled in property, or that the entry was for the purpose of protecting the property now owned by the railroad company. The protestant moved to dismiss the entry upon the ground that same could not be made by a trustee in behalf of the railroad company. His honor, being of the opinion that the railroad company in the first instance could not make the entry, ruled that the entry could not be maintained by a trustee for the benefit of the railroad company. The court sustained the motion and dismissed the entry, to which the enterer excepted and appealed.

J. F. Duncan, of Beaufort, and Moore & Dunn, of Newbern, for appellant.

D. L. Ward, of Newbern, and Luther Hamilton, of Morehead City, for appellee.

HOKE, J. The position is very generally recognized here and elsewhere that a railroad corporation is without power to acquire and hold real estate except by statutory authority, either expressly conferred or necessarily implied from the powers contained in the charter or arising to it under the General Laws. Cross v. Railroad, 172 N. C. 119, 90 S. E. 14; Case v. Kelly, 133 U. S. 21, 10 Sup. Ct. 216, 33 L. Ed. 513; Pacific Railway v. Seely, 45 Mo. 212, 100 Am. Dec. 369; Coe v. Railroad, 10 Ohio St. 372, 75 Am. Dec. 518; 1 Elliott on Railways, §§ 390, 391, 392, etc.; 22 R. C. L. p. 813, title, Railroads, § 66.

In the citation to Elliott, supra, the general principle is stated as follows:

"The rule is well established that a railroad corporation cannot acquire and hold lands for any purposes except such as are authorized by statute. The authority must be conferred by legislation or it does not exist. It is, however, not necessary that the authority should be expressly conferred. It may be implied."

And in answer to the suggestion that the question is one that concerns the state alone, and may not avail as between the corporation and individuals, Associate Justice Miller, delivering the opinion in the case of Case v. Kelly, supra, said:

"We need not stop here to inquire whether this company can hold title to lands, which it is impliedly forbidden to do by its charter, because the case before us is not one in which the title to the lands in question has ever been vested in the railroad company, or attempted to be so vested. The railroad company is plaintiff in this action, and is seeking to obtain the title to such lands. It has no authority by the statute to receive such title and to own such lands, and the question here is, not whether the courts would deprive it of such lands if they have been conveyed to it, but whether they will aid it to violate the law and obtain a title which it has no power to hold. We think the questions are very different ones, and that while a court might hesitate to declare the title to lands received already, and in the possession and ownership of the company, void on the principle that they had no authority to take such lands, it is very clear that it will not make itself the active agent in behalf of the company in violating the law and enabling the company to do that which the law forbids."

In the present case, a careful examination fails to disclose that the charter (chapter 136, Laws 1852) confers upon the A. & N. C. R. R. Co. any power to acquire and hold real estate for general purposes or otherwise, except for the purposes of constructing and operating its road, restricted usually to a proper right of way and the necessary terminal facilities. In section 5 the power is given to acquire real estate by purchase, lease, etc., and the same is immediately restricted by the express limitation, "So far as shall be necessary for the purposes embraced within the scope, object, and intent of this charter and no farther," etc.

In section 25, conferring power to condemn land when same cannot be acquired by agreement, the same limitation appears, and in section 28 the right of way is limited to 100 feet on either side of the line of road as permanently located. Nor is the power in question in any way enlarged by the general law on the subject. Revisal, c. 61, § 2566, and section 2567, subsecs. 2, 3. In the first named section it is enacted that the provisions of the general law shall apply and affect railroad charters unless the charter itself otherwise especially provides, but the powers thereby conferred in reference to locating real estate as shown in the section that follows section 2567 and subsections are in no wise different from the special charter containing substantially the same restrictions on that subject. Thus in subsection 2 as to donations it is provided:

"To take and hold such voluntary grants of real estate and other property as shall be made to it to aid in the construction, maintenance and accommodation of its railroad; but the real estate received by voluntary grant shall be held and used for the purposes of such grant only."

And in subsection 3 as to purchases:

"To purchase, hold and use all such real estate and other property as may be necessary for the construction and maintenance of its railroad and the stations and other accommodations necessary to accomplish the object of its incorporation."

[1-3] This being the law applicable, and the proponent having instituted the proceedings for himself as trustee generally, and having avowed in open court that he was acting for the railroad and intended to hold as trustee for it, a trust that our statute appertaining to this subject would at once execute (Cameron v. Hicks, 141 N. C. 21, 53 S. E. 728, 7 L. R. A. [N. S.] 407; Smith v. Proctor, 139 N. C. 314, 51 S. E. 889, 2 L. R. A. [N. S.] 172), this cause should be properly dealt with as if the company itself was the actor in the proceedings and in accord with the authorities heretofore cited, and in the absence of any claim or suggestion that the land applied for is required for the purposes of the road, or that it comes within the powers and privileges as to realty, contained in the charter or general laws, we concur in his honor's view and approve the ruling that proponent is without right to proceed further.

It is contended for defendant that although the charter and general law applicable to railroads may not confer the power to acquire this property, it arises to the company by virtue of the very general terms of the statute authorizing the issuance of grants for the state lands (Revisal, c. 37, § 1692), to the effect that—

"any citizen of this state, and all persons who * * * shall come into this state with the bona fide intent of becoming * * * citizens thereof, shall have the right and privilege of making entries of, and obtaining grants for, vacant and unappropriated lands."

[4-6] Although it is held that corporations are to be regarded as citizens under the statutes conferring jurisdiction on the federal courts by reason of diversity of citizenship, they are not so considered within the meaning of the constitutional and statutory provisions guaranteeing the privileges and immunities of citizenship, nor do they come generally within this meaning of that term. Orient Insurance Co. v. Daggs, 172 U. S. 557, 19 Sup. Ct. 281, 43 L. Ed. 552; Insurance Co. v. Commonwealth, 5 Bush (Ky.) 68. And while the word "person" is more usually held to extend to corporations, this may depend largely on the context and the extent and purpose of the particular law (7 R. O.

L.), citing Overland Cotton Mill Co. v. People, 32 Colo. 263, 75 Pac. 924, 105 Am. St. Rep. 74, and other cases. A perusal of the statute in question here will disclose that it applies primarily to natural persons, having general capacity to take and hold real estate; and, if it extends to corporations at all, it is subject to the restrictions and limitations established by the charter or the general law.

There is no error, and the judgment dismissing the proceedings is affirmed.

Affirmed.

Laws 1913, c. 44, § 2, evidence of defendant's denial of possession, his attempt to shoot officer making arrest, and his being found later making a still, is competent in support of the presumption.

5. INTOXICATING LIQUORS §140 — POSSESSION FOR PURPOSE OF SALE VIOLATION OF PROHIBITION LAW.

If a person has liquor in his possession for the purposes of sale he is guilty of the crime of having possession of liquor with intent to sell it, whether he makes a sale or not.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Kerr, Judge.

W. L. Simons was convicted of having whisky in his possession with intent to sell the same, and he appeals. No error.

The defendant was convicted on a charge that he "did unlawfully and willfully have in his possession illicit whisky, three gallons, with the intent to sell, and did unlawfully and willfully receive at one time and in one package more than one quart of intoxicating liquor, contrary to law." Verdict and sentence. Appeal by defendant.

The evidence was that a constable with a search warrant for whisky went to defendant's house; that he read the warrant to the defendant, who also read it. The defendant asked the officer to go in the house with him. They went through a narrow passage, to a back room, when the defendant reached up and grabbed his pistol from a shelf; but the officer was too quick for him, and, presenting his own pistol, made the defendant put his down. The defendant then said that he did not have but one quart of whisky, and he would be damned if any man was going to search his house or have it. The officer, however, did search his house. The defendant pulled out one quart from behind the bureau, and after some conversation he also handed out 3 gallons of corn whisky. The other officer who was with the constable gave the same evidence. The defendant did not put on any testimony, and the above evidence was not contradicted.

Albion Dunn, of Greenville, for appellant.
Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

CLARK, C. J. The statute (Laws 1913, c. 44, § 2) makes "the possession of more than one gallon of spirituous liquors at any one time," whether in one or more places "prima facie evidence of having it for the purpose of sale."

[1] The defendant makes no exception to the charge, and therefore it is presumed that the judge charged in accordance with the law. The defendant put on no evidence whatever to contradict the testimony that he had three gallons and a quart, though he had denied having any, and he attempted to shoot the officer.

The sole exception is to the testimony of the sheriff that in August, 1919, he was at the defendant's house, and "found a new still, almost completed, on which the defendant was working, and he had nearly enough copper for another one."

[2] The exception is upon the ground that, as the whisky had been found in possession of the defendant on 2d June, this testimony was "irrelevant and incompetent." The evidence of the finding of the three gallons and a quart being uncontradicted, the jury found in accordance with the prima facie presumption, corroborated, as it was, by defendant's denial and his attempt to shoot. The evidence excepted to, at the most, was unnecessary, but not incompetent.

[3] There are offenses which are committed in sudden temper, or under violent provocation, or by the impulse of passion. As to these, the only competent evidence is what took place at the time. State v. Norton, 82 N. C. 630. But the crime of illicit dealing in intoxicating liquor is in the same class with larceny, counterfeiting, forgery, obtaining money under false pretenses, and burglary; which are all committed with deliberation, in defiance of law, and for the ignoble motive of making profit thereby. In all such cases it is competent to prove intent by showing matters of like nature before or after the offense. If one is found in possession of counterfeit money, it would be competent to show that in a reasonable time thereafter he was working on an apparatus for counterfeiting or had passed other counterfeit notes, even though it should fix him with guilt of another offense. State v. Twitty, 9 N. C. 248. And the same is true as to the counterfeiting coin. If the charge is forgery, evidence is competent that the defendant was found not long afterwards in possession of other forged notes, or had passed other forged notes, or was in possession of chemicals and other apparatus used for that purpose. 2 Whart. Cr. Law (11th Ed.) § 920, note 7. Or if there was evidence that the defendant was found at night in a dwelling house with burglary tools, the fact that he was found not long afterwards fashioning and shaping such tools, this would be competent evidence.

The question when evidence of other crimes is competent is discussed in People v. Molineux, 168 N. Y. 284, 61 N. E. 286, which is reprinted with an admirable analytical table and very full notes (62 L. R. A. 193-357), which leaves nothing to be added. The subject is fully discussed in a line of decisions in this state. In State v. Murphy, 84 N. C. 742, it is held:

"Evidence of a 'collateral offense' of the same character, and connected with that charged in an indictment, and tending to prove the guilty knowledge of the defendant, when that is an essential element of the crime, is admissible."

This is a very clear discussion by Judge Ashe as to the instances in which such evidence is competent to show the quo animo, intent, design, guilty knowledge, and scienter. That case has been cited in many cases with approval, among them the following:

In State v. Parish, 104 N. C. 692, 10 S. E. 462:

"The rule is that testimony as to other similar offenses may be admissible as evidence to establish a particular charge, where the intent is of the essence of the offense, and such testimony tends to show the intent or guilty knowledge. State v. Murphy, 84 N. C. 742."

In State v. Weaver, 104 N. C. 761, 10 S. E. 487, it is said:

"This court has gone further, and allowed evidence of a different offense of the same character, and connected with that charged in the indictment, in order to show guilty knowledge, where the intent is of the essence of that charge" (citing the above cases).

In State v. Walton, 114 N. C. 783, 18 S. E. 945, McRae, J., says:

"In the trial of an indictment for obtaining money under false pretenses it is competent, in order to show the scienter and intent, to prove other similar transactions by the defendant."

In State v. Graham, 121 N. C. 623, 28 S. E. 409, it is held that, when the evidence tends to prove guilty knowledge of the defendant, the quo animo, the intent or design, evidence of other acts of the defendant are competent, as, for instance, passing counterfeit money of like kind, sending a threatening letter, and the like. In the latter case it is said:

"Prior and subsequent letters to the same person are competent in order to show the intent and meaning of the particular letter in question."

In State v. Adams, 138 N. C. 693, 50 S. E. 787, Walker, J., says:

"True it is that evidence as to one offense is not admissible against a defendant to prove that he is also guilty of another and distinct crime, the two having no relation to or connection with each other. But there are well-defined exceptions to this rule. Proof of another offense is competent to show identity, intent or scienter, and for other purposes" (citing State v. Murphy, supra).

The same is stated by Connor, J., in Johnson v. R. R., 140 N. C. 586, 53 S. E. 362.

In State v. Leak, 156 N. C. 646, 72 S. E. 568, Allen, J., says:

"It was competent for the state to prove that the defendant placed his hands on the prosecutrix at another time on the day of the assault, as evidence of another assault of which the defendant could have been convicted under the indictment, and as tending to prove the animus and intent of the defendant" (citing State v. Murphy, State v. Parish, and State v. Adams, supra).

In the very late case of Gray v. Cartwright, 174 N. C. 49, 93 S. E. 432, Walker, J., held:

"In an action to recover damages for malicious prosecution of a criminal action for the larceny of a cow, evidence is competent to show that the defendant in the criminal action, and the plaintiff in the civil one, had taken at other times cattle to his premises, under similar circumstances, when relevant to his criminal intent in the matter under consideration in the present action" (State v. Murphy, 84 N. C. 742, and State v. Walton, 114 N. C. 783, 18 S. E. 945, being cited and approved).

In State v. Bush, 177 N. C. 551, 98 S. E. 281, the court, speaking of the illicit sale of whisky, or possession of it for purposes of sale, said that, like the crime of larceny, it is "generally done furtively, and direct evidence is not easily had. It is usually an inference to be drawn by the jury from a combination of circumstances."

[4] The evidence in this case of the denial by the defendant of possession, his attempt to shoot the officer, and his being found later making a still, are all competent in support of the presumption raised by his possession of liquor, that he had the liquor in his possession for the illicit purpose of sale.

[5] If a person had liquor in his possession for the purposes of sale, he is guilty whether he makes a sale or not. State v. Davis, 168 N. C. 144, 83 S. E. 345.

No error.

STATE v. STANCILL. (No. 161.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 24, 1919.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW $\S$ 423(1)—ACTS AND DECLARATIONS OF DEFENDANTS IN FURTHERANCE OF CONSPIRACY ADMISSIBLE.

In prosecution of three defendants for larceny of leaf tobacco, where there was evidence tending to show that they had formed a conspiracy to commit the theft, the acts and declarations of the defendants in furtherance of the conspiracy were competent.

2. CRIMINAL LAW $\S$ 1144(14) — WHERE CHARGE IS NOT IN RECORD, PROPER INSTRUCTIONS PRESUMED.

Where the charge is not in the record, it must be presumed, upon appeal, that the jury were correctly instructed as to the competency and relevancy of the evidence, and as to circumstances and extent to which evidence may be considered by them.

3. CRIMINAL LAW $\S$ 425—DECLARATIONS OF DEFENDANT INADMISSIBLE AGAINST CODEFENDANT.

In prosecution for larceny of leaf tobacco, testimony as to what one of the defendants had told witness about the stealing of the tobacco by such defendant and a codefendant was incompetent against codefendant.

4. CRIMINAL LAW $\S$ 1169(7)—ERROR IN ADMISSION OF TESTIMONY HARMLESS WHERE ACCUSED TESTIFIED TO SAME FACTS.

The admission of evidence as to what one of the defendants had told witness about the commission of crime by such defendant and a codefendant was cured, or at least was rendered harmless, where defendant who had told witness of the crime subsequently testified to same facts himself.

5. CRIMINAL LAW §824(8)—REQUEST NECESSARY TO CONFINE EVIDENCE TO CERTAIN POINT.

Defendant who desires to have evidence confined to a single purpose should ask court to have it so confined.

6. CRIMINAL LAW §1162—HARMLESS ERROR NO GROUND FOR REVERSAL.

Judgment will not be reversed for error which does no harm and is free from prejudice.

7. CRIMINAL LAW §680(1)—ORDER OF TESTIMONY IS IN DISCRETION OF COURT.

The order of testimony is regulated by the discretion of the court.

8. CRIMINAL LAW §1153(3)—UNLESS DISCRETION ABUSED ORDER OF PROOF NOT REVIEWED.

Supreme Court will not interfere with court's exercise of its discretion in regulating order of testimony, in absence of clear and gross abuse of discretion.

9. CRIMINAL LAW §372(5)—EVIDENCE OF SIMILAR CRIMES ADMISSIBLE TO SHOW INTENT.

In prosecution of three defendants for larceny of leaf tobacco, where there was evidence of a conspiracy to plunder the tobacco barns in the neighborhood, testimony as to the theft by the defendants of tobacco other than that for the theft of which they were indicted, but in same neighborhood, was admissible to show the intent with which they stole the tobacco, and not to prove the accusation substantively, the theft of such tobacco being a series of transactions carried out in pursuance of the original design.

10. CRIMINAL LAW §370, 371(1, 12)—EVIDENCE OF OTHER LIKE CRIMES ADMISSIBLE TO SHOW MOTIVE OR INTENT.

Proof of commission of other like offenses to show the scienter, intent, or motive is generally competent when the crimes are so connected or associated that this evidence will throw light upon that question.

11. CRIMINAL LAW §693 — OBJECTIONS TO QUESTION NECESSARY BEFORE ANSWER.

Counsel should object to question before it is answered, since the right to object after it is answered, if given, would give him an advantage in the opportunity of objecting only if answer is unfavorable.

12. WITNESSES §248(1)—ANSWER NOT RESPONSIVE MAY BE STRICKEN.

If answer is not responsive, and contains unfavorable new matter, counsel can move to strike it out.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Daniels, Judge.

Garland Stancill was convicted of larceny and receiving property knowing it to have been stolen, and he appeals. No error.

The appellant, Garland Stancill, was jointly indicted with Ernest Perry and Raymond Stancill for the larceny of a lot of leaf tobacco of the value of $250, property of J. H. Little and others, and for receiving the same knowing it to have been stolen.

The evidence for the state tended to show that on Friday night, October 25, 1918, the defendants Ernest Perry and Garland Stancill took and carried away from the packhouse of J. H. Little 49 sticks of tobacco, the property of J. H. Little. They were driving the car of Raymond Stancill, and carried the tobacco thus stolen to the home of Raymond Stancill, where it was received by said Raymond. The testimony of the defendant's witnesses tended to show that both Garland and Raymond Stancill were not guilty. Both of them admitted the fact that Little's tobacco was carried to Raymond Stancill's house by Perry and Garland Stancill, but both disclaim guilty knowledge.

Garland Stancill testified as follows:

"That he went with Perry, but had never been in that territory before, and Perry told him that he was going to his Uncle Bob Parker's after the tobacco; that Perry got out of the car and went up to the house, which he told witness was his uncle's house, came back, and stated to the witness that his uncle said go ahead and get the tobacco; that the witness had no idea that Perry was not telling the truth, and did not know that the tobacco was not Perry's tobacco."

At the trial Ernest Perry submitted to a verdict of guilty, and Raymond Stancill was acquitted, while Garland Stancill was convicted. From the judgment upon such conviction, Garland Stancill appealed to this court.

Albion Dunn, of Greenville, for appellant. James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). It will be perceived from the foregoing statement that the issue in the case, and it was clear-cut and sharply drawn by the contention of both the Stancills, was, Did the Stancills know that Ernest Perry had stolen the tobacco? The errors assigned by the defendant relate to the competency of testimony. It appears that the three defendants were jointly indicted for stealing tobacco from J. F. Harris and others, and the evidence tends to show that they had formed a conspiracy to commit the theft, and this was the substance of the offense, as shown by the bill and the testimony. They had combined together, at least two of them—and there was evidence against the third, who was finally acquitted,—to do an unlawful act; that is, to steal from the prosecutors.

[1] The acts and declarations of those who were parties to the common design, in furtherance of the conspiracy, were competent. State v. Anderson, 92 N. C. 732; State v. Brady, 107 N. C. 822, 12 S. E. 325.

[2] As the charge is not in the record, it must be presumed that the jury were correctly instructed as to the competency and relevancy of such evidence, and as to the circumstances under which it could be used by them, and as to what extent it could be considered.

[3] The testimony of Ed. Marks, as to what the defendant Ernest Perry had said to him about the stealing of the tobacco by Garland Stancill and himself, was, standing by itself, an unsworn declaration of Ernest, incompetent against Garland; but he afterwards took the stand himself as a witness, and testified to the same facts.

[4] If the statement by him was technically incompetent at the time of its introduction—and we will admit that it was so—the error was cured when Ernest Perry testified, substantially at least, to the same thing. (Albert v. Insurance Co., 122 N. C. 92, 30 S. E. 327, 65 Am. St. Rep. 693; Strother v. Railroad Co., 123 N. C. 197, 31 S. E. 386; Beaman v. Ward, 132 N. C. 68, 43 S. E. 545; Summerlin v. Railroad Co., 133 N. C. 550, 45 S. E. 898; Turner v. Commissioners, 127 N. C. 153, 37 S. E. 191); or, in any view, it was harmless error (see cases above). It was immaterial whether he made the statement to Ed. Marks or to any other person; the important fact was whether he made it at all.

[5] That he made it was merely corroborative of his own testimony, and, if defendant desired it to be confined to that single purpose, he should have asked the judge to do so. But, as we have said, it is but harmless, when considered with the testimony of Ernest Perry. Rawls v. White, 127 N. C. 17, 37 S. E. 68.

[6] We do not reverse for error which does no harm and is free from prejudice.

[7, 8] The statement came first, before Ernest Perry testified; but the order of the testimony is regulated by the discretion of the judge, and, when there is no clear and gross abuse of it, we will not interfere. Worth v. Ferguson, 122 N. C. 381, 29 S. E. 574. It may be that the court admitted this testimony at the time it appears to have come into the case, in anticipation of similar and sworn testimony of Ernest Perry, when he took the stand as a state's witness, and as corroborative of it. Besides, it appears that the objection was not offered until the question was answered. This was too late. Beaman v. Ward, 132 N. C. 68, 43 S. E. 545; Dobson v. Railroad Co., 132 N. C. 900, 44 S. E. 593. But, as already shown by the authorities, slight error, where there is no prejudice, works no harm, and does not justify a reversal. Griffin v. Railroad Co., 138 N. C. 55, 50 S. E. 516; West v. Grocery Co., 138 N. C. 166, 50 S. E. 565.

[9] The testimony as to the theft of the Wilkinson Tobacco was offered merely to show the intent with which the defendants stole this tobacco, and not to prove the accusation substantively. It was sufficiently connected with the main charge to render it competent for this purpose. It was all taken to Raymond Stancill's, the common storehouse for the loot of these defendants. It was but a part of a series of transactions carried out in pursuance of the original design, and it was contemplated by them in the beginning that they should plunder the tobacco barns in the neighborhood, and this was one of them. The jury might well have inferred this common purpose from the evidence. Robbing Wilkinson was a part of the common design, and done in furtherance of it.

[10] Proof of the commission of other like offenses to show the scienter, intent, or motive is generally competent when the crimes are so connected or associated that this evidence will throw light upon that question. In Wharton's Cr. Ev. (10th Ed.) p. 60, such testimony is thus classified:

"First, as part of the res gestæ. State v. Freeman, 49 N. C. 5; State v. Murphy, 84 N. C. 742; State v. Thompson, 97 N. C. 496, 1 S. E. 921; State v. Mace, 118 N. C. 1244, 24 S. E. 798; State v. Adams, 138 N. C. 688, 50 S. E. 765. Second, to prove identity of person or crime. State v. Thompson, supra; State v. Weaver, 104 N. C. 758, 10 S. E. 486. Third, to prove guilty knowledge. State v. Twitty, 9 N. C. 248; State v. Walton, 114 N. C. 783, 18 S. E. 945; State v. Hight, 150 N. C. 817, 63 S. E. 1043; Insurance Co. v. Knight, 160 N. C. 592, 78 S. E. 623. Fourth, to prove intent. State v. Weaver, 104 N. C. 758, 10 S. E. 486. Fifth, to prove motive. State v. Plyler, 153 N. C. 630, 69 S. E. 269. Sixth, to prove system. State v. Wilkerson, 98 N. C. 696, 3 S. E. 683; State v. Winner, 153 N. C. 602, 69 S. E. 9. Seventh, to prove malice. Eighth, to rebut special defenses."

We think that several of these classes embrace the objections made here, and that the latter are answered by the law as there stated by Wharton. It is said in State v. Murphy, 84 N. C. 742:

"Evidence of a 'collateral offense' of the same character and connected with that charged in an indictment, and tending to prove the guilty knowledge of the defendant, when that is an essential element of the crime, is admissible; therefore on the trial of an indictment for the larceny of a hog, where the prosecutor testified that he identified the property as his in an inclosure of the defendant, and demanded its delivery to him, it was held competent for the state to prove by the testimony of another witness that at the same time and place, and in the presence of the prosecutor and defendant, such witness said that the other hog therein was his, and he then and there claimed and demanded it of defendant."

In that case the court says, in an opinion by Justice Ashe, who always wrote clearly, accurately, and vigorously, and reviews the law at length:

"Where the question of identity or intent is involved, or where it is necessary to show a guilty knowledge on the part of the prisoner, evidence may be received of other criminal acts than those charged in the indictment" (citing and approving Yarborough v. State, 41 Ala. 405; Tharp v. State, 15 Ala. 749).

The whole question is considered and fully reviewed, in Gray v. Cartwright, 174 N. C. 49, 93 S. E. 432, where the authorities are collected. This question is fully discussed by the Chief Justice in State v. Simons, 100 S. E. 239, at this term, and evidence of the kind admitted in this case is held there to be competent to show knowledge, intent, and motive.

The testimony of Oscar Bryant was competent as corroborative of the witness Henry Crowell. It was also competent as rebutting Garland Standill's special defense, that he was not familiar with that neighborhood, and that he was deceived by Perry as to the latter's purpose. In going to "his Uncle Bob Parker's house."

[11] It may be said generally that the objections to testimony were taken after the questions had been answered. This is not the proper course, and the reason is that it gives the objector two chances; if the answer proves to be favorable to him, he would not need an objection, but if unfavorable he would. He can be silent if he likes it, or object when he finds that he does not.

[12] He should object to the question, and then, if the answer is not responsive, and contains unfavorable new matter, he can move to strike it out. Beaman v. Ward, supra; Dobson v. Railroad Co., supra.

The prisoner was ably defended, but, with all the light shed upon the case at the trial below and in this court, we deem the criticisms of counsel in regard to the rulings of the court to be unsound.

We can discover no tenable ground for reversal.

No error.

PARKER et al. v. BOARD OF COM'RS OF JOHNSTON COUNTY. (No. 97.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 24, 1919.)

COUNTIES  $\Leftrightarrow$  195—PROVISION THAT PROCEEDS OF SALE OF STOCK LAW FENCES SHALL GO TO COUNTY FUND CONSTITUTIONAL.

Pub. Loc. Laws 1915, c. 466, § 4, providing that the commissioners of Johnston county are authorized to sell for cash all stock law fences in the county, and directing that the proceeds, with any stock law funds on hand, be returned to the general fund of the county, held constitutional; the landowners assessed for stock law fences having no paramount right to refund.

Walker, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Johnston County; Kerr, Judge.

Action by James D. Parker and others against the Board of Commissioners of Johnston County. From judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

S. S. Holt, of Smithfield, and Parker & Parker, of Graham, for appellants.

Abell & Ward, of Smithfield, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. This is an action, upon facts agreed, to compel the commissioners of Johnston county to distribute and refund the surplus of the fund which had been collected in said county to construct and maintain a stock law fence. The whole of Johnston county having been placed under the stock law by legislative enactment, the necessity for the continuance of said fence had ceased. Thereupon by section 4, c. 466, Public Local Laws 1915, it was provided:

"The board of commissioners of Johnston county is hereby authorized to sell for cash at public or private sale all stock law fences in the county, and the proceeds derived from the sale of the same, together with any stock law funds now on hand, shall be returned to the general fund of said county."

This statute is clearly mandatory.

The plaintiffs claim that this statute is unconstitutional, and seek to have the fund distributed to the landowners from whom it has been collected as a special assessment. The surplus consists of something over $4,000 accumulated, in the several years beginning in 1912, and probably $1,500 from the sale of the fence made in compliance with the statute. As to the latter it is clearly county property, as much so as proceeds from the sale of an abandoned courthouse, or a discarded bridge, or any other kind of property. As to the accumulated excess the bounds of the stock law have been changed from time to time and besides some of those paying the assessment have died, and their estates have been settled and others have moved away. If the commissioners should have desired to refund the surplus to those who paid it in, this would have been difficult.

The cost of calculating and dividing the sums to refund to each of those who from 1912 down to this time have paid assessments for the stock law fence would be considerable. Almost the only benefit that would accrue to any one would be the commissions to the tax collectors for again collecting the same sum for necessary county purposes.

But the only question really before us is whether there is any restriction in the Constitution forbidding the General Assembly to direct that the surplus of a fund in the county treasury collected for any purpose shall be used by the county for any necessary expenses. We know of no such provision. Suppose this fund had been raised by a special tax authorized by the Legislature to build a jail or a courthouse or for any other purpose, is there any constitutional restriction which forbids the Legislature from directing afterwards that the surplus which may happen instead of being returned to the taxpayers shall be used by the county for any other necessary purpose. In the absence of a statute officers have no power to refund taxes, though illegally collected. 27 A. & E. 756.

It is true that this particular fund was collected from the real estate owners for the purpose of building a stock law fence. But there are other taxes which have been collected from certain specified sources, and in like manner applied to special purposes. For instance, the license tax derived from automobiles is appropriated to the highway commission for the purpose of building and maintaining public roads. Should there be any unused excess of such fund by reason of funds derived from the federal government, or from the general property tax, or otherwise, would not the Legislature have power to direct its application to general purposes?

There is also a fertilizer tax which has been appropriated to the use of the Agricultural Department, and 25 cents per bale on all cotton ginned in the state to provide for a warehouse system. If for any reason there should be an excess in these funds, or if the warehouse system were abandoned, the Legislature could certainly direct that the unused surplus of these funds should be applied to other purposes, and it would not be necessary on constitutional grounds to divide up this remnant of the fund and to return dividends therefrom to the companies paying the fertilizer tax or to the farmers paying the gin tax.

There have been many other instances of taxes raised from special sources and appropriated by the act creating them to special purposes, among them the retail liquor license which went to the schools. Would it be necessary to return the surplus if any, of such fund to the barkeepers? Whenever there is an excess, which rarely happens, it is in the power of the sovereign either to redistribute this surplus to the parties paying it in, or (as probably has always been done) direct that it shall be applied to other purposes. Whether the fund has been accumulated in the state treasury, or in the county treasury, it is in the discretion of the General Assembly whether that in the state treasury shall be applied to other state purposes and whether the funds accumulated in the county treasury shall be applied to other necessary county purposes.

It is true that the stock law funds were collected by an assessment upon real estate only, but whether it was collected from real estate, or from all property or from property and polls or from license and other taxes is an immaterial circumstance which cannot affect the power of the General Assembly to direct that any fund in the county treasury unused shall be applied to general county purposes. If so applied, it will go to schools, roads, and bridges and all other necessary expenses of the county. If it were returned to the real estate owners who are among the largest taxpayers, the amount returned would have to be again assessed and collected. The difference between the small dividend refunded to each of the 2,600 taxpayers in this case and the amount which would be again collected out of them to make good the deficit thereby caused in the county treasury would be almost infinitesimal.

In Connor and Cheshire on the Constitution, 282, it is said:

"Where a statute, authorizing the levy of a tax beyond the constitutional limit, for a special purpose, is infra vires, the taxes collected beyond the requirement of the special purpose may be turned into the general fund and used for general purposes."

In Long v. Com'rs, 76 N. C. 280, the court says:

"We know of no statute nor any rule of law or of public policy, which prevents county commissioners from applying a tax raised professedly for one purpose to any other legitimate purpose."

In Williams v. Com'rs, 119 N. C. 520, 26 S. E. 150, the court held that where a statute authorized the levy of a tax for a lawful purpose, but beyond the constitutional limit, the taxes collected beyond the requirements of the special purpose may be turned into the general fund and used for general purposes, but where the act will authorize the levy partly for a legal purpose and partly for an illegal purpose, it is ultra vires and no part of the levy can be collected. The court was unanimous as to the application of such taxes after collection. Though there was dissent on another point, there was no difference on the view expressed in the latter opinion that—"If the levy had been authorized for * * * two purposes only, and a surplus had been raised, it would have gone into the county treasury to meet current expenses, without any further authorization in the act. Long v. Com'rs, 78 N. C. 273."

The plaintiff relies upon Com'rs v. Com'rs, 92 N. C. 180, where, Lenoir and Greene counties, having united to erect a stock law fence around a district lying partly in both, and Greene complained that owing to a difference in the assessment of real estate in the two counties an excessive amount had been paid by the taxpayers therein, it was adjudged that the disparity should be corrected by reassessment, and that the surplus wrongfully collected in Greene should be reimbursed by Lenoir, such fund to be held in trust for the former for the reimbursement of those who had overpaid their share.

But in that case there was no statute, as in this, authorizing the fence to be sold and the proceeds thereof and any surplus funds still in hand to be used for general purposes. It was an equalization statute between the contributors to the fund in the two counties.

We find in the Constitution nothing denying to the General Assembly the power to direct that the surplus of this fund in the county treasury (which seems already to have lain there idle for 4½ years, since this act was passed in 1915, at a loss in interest equal to more than a fourth of the fund) shall be used for general county purposes.

In Parker v. Com'rs, 104 N. C. 166, 10 S. E. 137, it is held that the requirement in Const. art. 5, § 7, that "every act of the General Assembly levying a tax shall state the special object to which it is to be applied, and that it shall be applied to no other" has no application to taxes levied by the county authorities for county purposes.

In Railroad v. Com'rs, 148 N. C. 247, 61 S. E. 699, the court said:

"We do not concur with the suggestion that the commissioners have the power to levy and collect a tax for a specific purpose and apply any part of it to another purpose," —giving as a reason that the taxpayer was entitled to an order enjoining the appropriation of any part of the excess over interest on the bonds to any other purpose, for it could be held to meet the interest for the following year or for a sinking fund. This clearly does not apply to cases where, the purpose for which the sum is raised having been completely attained, there is a surplus left in the treasury which must either be applied to general county purposes or be returned to the taxpayers to be collected again for such general purposes, which is avoided by retaining such surplus for that use.

When a tax or assessment is paid into the public treasury of the state or a county, if the purpose expressed in the act is fully accomplished, leaving an unexpended surplus, the state or county has control of it, and bad faith cannot be imputed by the courts to the Legislature in authorizing such surplus to be "covered into the general fund."

Affirmed.

WALKER, J. (dissenting). It is a mistake to suppose that this stock fence fund was collected under a levy upon all the taxpayers of Johnston county. It was collected from only a part of them. If this law is enforced, it will, both in theory and in practice, be simply permitting one part of the people to be solely taxed for the benefit of another, and the cases cited in support of the opinion do not sustain such a proposition, or anything like it, but a very different one. It would be clearly violative of the principle declared in the recent case of Commissioners of Johnston County v. B. R. Lacy, State Treasurer, 174 N. C. 141, 93 S. E. 482, 2 A. L. R. 726. Justice Hoke, in his opinion delivered for the court, says:

"It is not within the legislative power to tax one community or local taxing district for the exclusive benefit of another, a principle which has been directly approved in several recent decisions of this court and is one very generally accepted"—citing Keith v. Lockhart, 171 N. C. 451, 88 S. E. 640, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 916; Faison v. Com'rs, 171 N. C. 411, 88 S. E. 761; Harper v. Com'rs, 133 N. C. 106, 45 S. E. 526; Commissioners Prince George v. Commissioners Laurel, 70 Md. 443, 17 Atl. 388, 3 L. R. A. 528; Lumber Co. v. Township of Springfield, 92 Mich. 277, 52 N. W. 468; People of Salem, 20 Mich. 452, 4 Am. Rep. 400, citing Lexington v. McQuillan's Heirs, 9 Dana (Ky.) 513, 35 Am. Dec. 159; Cooley on Taxation (3d Ed.) 420; Judson on Taxation, § 254; 37 Cyc. 749.

He adopts what Judge Cooley says upon the subject, as follows:

"The taxing district through which the tax is to be apportioned must be the district which is to be benefited by its collection and expenditure. The district for the apportionment of the state tax is the state, for the county tax the county, and so on. Subordinate districts may be created for convenience, but the principle is general, and in all subordinate districts the rule must be the same." Cooley on Taxation, supra.

And also the general principle, as stated by another standard text-writer, was approved:

"The constitutional requirement of uniformity of taxation forbids the imposition of a tax on one municipality or part of the state for the purpose of benefiting or raising money for another." 37 Cyc., supra.

He further says, and what he says completely covers this case as with a blanket:

"It is a fundamental principle in the law of taxation that taxes may only be levied for public purposes and for the benefit of the public on whom they are imposed, and to lay these burdens upon one district for benefits appertaining solely to another is in clear violation of established principles of right and contrary to the express provisions of our Constitution (article 1, § 17), which forbids that any person shall be dispossessed of his freehold liberties and privileges or in any manner deprived of his life, liberty or property but by the law of the land."

It would be useless to pursue the discussion further, so apt and pointed are the extracts we have made from that well-considered opinion of this court. Here the tax was a special one, levied upon the inhabitants of a stock law district in Johnston county, in and near Smithfield township, for the purpose of building a fence to surround said district, the same having been created under a special statute and authority also given thereby to levy the tax. It was not a tax levied under legislative authority extending to the entire county of Johnston. If the excess of the tax levy can be given to the other inhabitants of the county for their benefit, it follows that one section of the county, in this indirect way, can be taxed for the benefit of another. Admitting that the surplus of a general tax can be thus constitutionally added to the general funds or revenues of the county, it does not follow that the surplus of a special tax can be thus applied to general county purposes. Every citizen should be made to contribute his full share to the particular burden of taxation resting upon him and those similarly situated, but the state cannot, under our Constitution, or under that of any other well regulated system of government, exact more of the taxpayer. There should always be, as near as may be, an equal distribution of benefit and burden. This may be adjusted, it is true, and it has been so held, upon some equitable principle of apportionment applicable alike to all (8 Cyc. pp. 1071 and 1132), for example by districts or area or by lineal feet, as in the case of local assessments, but in whatever way it is done, it must not amount to the taking of one taxpayer's property and giving it to another, who contributed nothing to the tax. It had might as well be accomplished directly as indirectly. Circumlocution or indirection is no justification of it. In principle and in effect, it is the same to the taxpayer as if the state should reach into his pocket and, against his consent, hand over his money to his neighbor, as a gratuity. It makes little difference to the loser, whether it is taken in one way or the other, if he is wrongfully or inequitably deprived of it. If the surplus of the tax collected in this stock law district cannot be returned to its taxpayers, they should, at least, have the benefit of it in their own district or locality. There is no more reason for giving it to those outside the district than for giving any surplus of county taxation to this special district, which we said, in the Johnston Case, supra, could not be done.

LIPSITZ v. SMITH et al. (No. 103.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 24, 1919.)

1. INTERPLEADER §21 — PAYMENT OF SURPLUS FUND INTO COURT ON SALE OF LAND BY MORTGAGEE PROPER.

Where mortgagee sold land under power of sale, and brought civil action in nature of bill of interpleader against claimants to balance in his hands after payment of mortgage indebtedness and costs, court properly directed him to pay fund into court or give bond to secure it.

2. MORTGAGES §334—FORECLOSURE UNDER POWER AFTER DEATH OF PRINCIPAL MORTGAGOR PROPER.

Mortgagee properly exercised power of sale, notwithstanding death of principal mortgagor.

3. MORTGAGES §376—DEVISEES OF DECEASED MORTGAGOR PROPER PARTIES IN SUIT FOR DISTRIBUTION OF SURPLUS.

Where mortgagee sells land under a power of sale after death of principal mortgagor, the devisees under the principal mortgagor's will are the proper, and usually the sufficient, parties in a suit involving a distribution of the surplus.

4. INTERPLEADER §21—READINESS TO PAY MONEY INTO COURT MUST BE ALLEGED.

In civil action in nature of bill of interpleader, plaintiff must have the fund in his possession, and must allege his readiness to pay the money into court as a jurisdictional or essential averment.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR §91(1)—ORDER FOR INTERPLEADER TO PAY MONEY INTO COURT OR GIVE BOND NOT APPEALABLE.

In civil action in nature of bill of interpleader, order requiring plaintiff to pay money into court or give bond, being interlocutory and in no manner affecting plaintiff's substantial rights, is not appealable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Bertie County; Connor, Judge.

Action by Lewis Lipsitz against William R. Smith and others. From a judgment directing plaintiff to pay fund into court or give a solvent bond to secure the same, plaintiff excepts and appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Gillam & Davenport, of Windsor, for appellant.

Winston & Matthews, of Windsor, and Martin & Winborne, for appellees.

HOKE, J. On the hearing it was made to appear that in 1915 William R. Smith and his wife, Mary, being indebted to the plaintiff, in order to secure said indebtedness, executed a mortgage on the land of Mary Smith, his wife, with power of sale, and soon thereafter said Mary Smith died, leaving a last will and testament, devising her lands in unequal proportion to her husband, her three daughters, Hattie Hardy, Mariah Hardy, and Joe Alfred Hardy, now intermarried with her codefendant Lonnie Perry; that said indebtedness being due and unpaid as per contract, plaintiff under the power of sale contained in said mortgage sold said land for the price of $2,030, executed a deed for same to the purchaser, applied the proceeds to payment of the amount due on said debt and costs, etc., amounting to $284.45, leaving a balance in his hands of $1,745.55, which plaintiff now holds for distribution among the parties justly entitled to same, and having no other interest in said fund; that William R. Smith, the husband, has acquired the interest in said land devised to two of the daughters, Hattie and Mariah Hardy, and as between William R. Smith and the other daughter, Joe Alfred Hardy Perry, there is a bona fide dispute as to how much of said fund in plaintiff's hands is due to either of said parties, the nature of the dispute being fully set forth in the pleadings; that he cannot with safety pay out this fund to the respective claimants until the correct proportion is determined, etc.

[1] On these facts chiefly relevant we are of opinion that the order directing the payment of money into court was clearly within the power of his honor, and that the same has been providently made.

[2] So far as now appears, and under our decisions applicable, this power of sale contained in the mortgage has been properly exercised, notwithstanding the death of the principal mortgagor. Carter v. Slocumb, 122 N. C. 475, 29 S. E. 720, 65 Am. St. Rep. 714.

[3] The devisees under the will, as holders of the equity of redemption therein, are the proper, and usually the sufficient, parties in a suit involving a distribution of the surplus. Snow v. Warick Institute, 17 R. I. 68, 20 Atl. 94; 27 Cyc. pp. 1498, 1499, 1792; 2 Jones on Mortgages, §§ 1687, 1929-1931. And the proceedings showing that plaintiff is the holder and in possession of the fund, to which he makes no claim, and that defendants are in a bona fide controversy as to their respective interests, the facts would seem to present a clear case for an original bill of interpleader under the old system, and now disposed of by civil action. In such case, not only is it within the court's power to make all proper orders for the care and supervision of the fund; but the plaintiff in such a bill must have the fund in his possession and allege his readiness to pay the money into court as a jurisdictional or essential averment. Fox v. Kline, 85 N. C. 174-176; Martin, Adm'r, v. Maberry et al., 16 N. C. 169; Look v. McCahill, 106 Mich. 108, 63 N. W. 898; Walker et al. v. Aldrich et al. (Williams v. Walker) 2 Rich. Eq. 291, 46 Am. Dec. 53; Ammendale Institute v. Anderson, 71 Md. 128, 17 Atl. 1030; Pomeroy's Equity, § 59; 23 Cyc. p. 23.

[5] This being true, we are of opinion further that no appeal lies from the order made in this case; the same being interlocutory in its nature and no substantial right of appellant being affected. Blackwell v. McCaine, 105 N. C. 460, 11 S. E. 860; Warren v. Stancill, 117 N. C. 112, 23 S. E. 216; Sutton v. Schonwald, 80 N. C. 20; 2 Beach, Modern Equity Pr. § 924. As said in the last citation, it is ordinarily true that—

"A decree that money be paid into court, or that property be delivered to a receiver, or that property held in trust shall be delivered to a new trustee appointed by the court for preserving the property pending litigation, is interlocutory merely, and no appeal lies from it."

The plaintiff, having sought the aid of the court for his own protection in making proper disposition of a fund among several claimants, is required, as stated, to allege as an essential fact that he has the fund in possession and is ready and willing to pay the same into court, or do whatever the court may order concerning it. In no event should he be allowed to maintain a position inconsistent with or directly antagonizing the basic facts of his own suit, or question orders which the court may make in furtherance of his own application. Brown v. Chemical Co., 165 N. C. 421, 81 S. E. 463; Railroad v. McCarthy, 98 U. S. 258, 24 L. Ed. 693; First National Bank v. Dovetail, 143 Ind. 534-538, 42 N. E. 924.

On the record, defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiff's appeal must be allowed; and it is so ordered.

Appeal dismissed.

RADFORD et ux. v. ROSE et ux. (No. 102.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 1, 1919.)

1. WILLS ¶470—MUST BE CONSIDERED AS A WHOLE.

It is the duty of the court to consider a will as a whole, and to reconcile apparently conflicting provisions.

2. WILLS ¶466—"LOAN" OF LAND TO CHILDREN CONSTRUED A DEVISE.

Testator's will, providing that he "loaned" realty to certain children, meant that he gave or devised to them.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Loan.]

3. WILLS ¶608(3)—DEVISE TO CHILDREN FOR LIFE AND THEN TO HEIRS CREATES FEE.

A devise to children for their lifetime, and then to their heirs, standing alone, would pass an estate in fee, under the rule in Shelley's Case.

4. WILLS ¶608(3)—DEVISE TO CHILDREN FOR LIFE, AND FAILING BODILY HEIRS TO OTHERS, CREATES DEFEASIBLE FEE.

A devise to children for their lifetime, and then to their heirs, but, should they have no bodily heirs, with provision that the property should go back to testator's family, made defeasible the children's fee-simple estate on condition they had no bodily heirs, so that with the birth of children to a daughter her fee simple became absolute.

Appeal from Superior Court, Johnston County; Kerr, Judge.

Action by H. H. Radford and wife against W. P. Rose and wife. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

This is an action to recover $2,900, the balance due on the purchase money of a tract of land. The defendant admitted the indebtedness, but alleged that the title to the land was defective, and the plaintiff agreed in the pleading to a cancellation of the contract of purchase if the title was not good.

The feme plaintiff, Mrs. H. H. Radford, derived her title under the will of her father, Henry C. Rose, the material parts of which are as follows:

"Home tract of land to be equally divided by number of acres between W. D. Rose, L. T. Rose, W. P. Rose, and my daughter, Mrs. H. H. Radford. I loan to them their lifetime and then to their heirs, provided they have any that have attained the age of 21 years, but should they, my children, have no bodily heirs, the property shall go back to the Rose family. Should they have an heir at their death not 21 years of age, that the said heir shall be in possession at the age of 21 years of its share of the estate."

His honor held, and rendered judgment accordingly, that the plaintiff's deed conveyed a title in fee to the defendant, and the defendant excepted and appealed.

James D. Parker, of Smithfield, for appellants.

Wellons & Wellons, of Smithfield, for appellees.

ALLEN, J. It is well at the outset to determine the true meaning and legal effect of the clause in the will, "provided they have any that have attained the age of 21 years." If this is dealt with literally, and without association with the other parts of the will, it will operate as a limitation upon the estate devised to the children of the testator, and will deprive them of any interest in the estate of their father under the will, unless children are born who reach the age of 21 years.

That this was not the intent of the testator is shown by the whole scope of the will, from which it appears that his children were the primary objects of his bounty, and that the will was made for their benefit, and after the devise to them the limitation over is, not if they die leaving no bodily heirs, but "should they have no bodily heirs," then to the Rose family, indicating a purpose for them to have the property if children were born, although they did not live to be 21.

The next provision of the will throws much light on the question:

"Should they have an heir at their death not twenty-one years of age, that the said heir shall be in possession at the age of twenty-one years of age its share of the estate."

This can only mean that, if the plaintiff died leaving a child under 21, the child would take, but his right to possession would be postponed, which is entirely inconsistent with the construction that the estate of the plaintiff would be defeated, and would go to the Rose family, if she had no child to reach 21.

[1] It is the duty of the court to consider the will as a whole and to reconcile apparently conflicting provisions (Dunn v. Hines, 164 N. C. 113, 80 S. E. 410), and when this is done the proviso cannot be held to be a limitation on the estate of the plaintiff, but as having the effect of postponing the right of enjoyment by the heirs, and, so understood, the will should read:

"I loan to them their lifetime and then to their heirs, but should they have no bodily heirs the property shall go back to the Rose family, provided heirs under the age of twenty-one shall not take possession until they reach that age."

Under this construction what estate does the plaintiff take?

[2, 3] "Loan," in the connection in which it is used, means the same as "give or devise" (Smith v. Smith, 173 N. C. 124, 91 S. E. 721), and a devise "to them their lifetime and then to their heirs," under all the authorities, standing alone, would pass an estate in fee under the rule in Shelley's Case (Daniel v. Harrison, 175 N. C. 120, 95 S. E. 37, and cases cited).

[4] The subsequent provision, "but should they have no bodily heirs," has, however, the effect of making this fee-simple estate defeasible, but only upon condition that they have no bodily heirs. Whitfield v. Garria, 134 N. C. 24, 45 S. E. 904; Maynard v. Sears, 157 N. C. 4, 72 S. E. 609. Note that the language is not "dying without bodily heirs," or "leaving no bodily heirs," but that they "have no bodily heirs" a condition fully met by the fact that the plaintiff has three bodily heirs, to wit, three living children.

The facts and principle involved in Dunn v. Hines, supra, sustain this interpretation, as well as the rules of construction stated therein as follows:

"The first taker in a will is presumably the favorite of the testator. Rewalt v. Ulrich, 23 Pa. 388; Appeal by McFarland, 37 Pa. 300. And in doubtful cases the gift is to be construed so as to make it as effectual to him as possible, or as the language will warrant. Wilson v. McKeethan, 53 Pa. 79. And, too, the law favors the early vesting of an estate, to the end that property may be kept in the channels of commerce. Underhill on Wills, § 861; Hilliard v. Kearney, 45 N. C. 221; Galloway v. Carter, 100 N. C. 111 [5 S. E. 4], and cases there cited."

We therefore conclude that the plaintiff took a defeasible fee under the will of her father, which became absolute upon the birth of children.

The case of Tyson v. Sinclair, 138 N. C. 24, 50 S. E. 450, 3 Ann. Cas. 397, is almost directly in point, except it is stronger for the plaintiff's position, in that the having bodily heirs was at the death of the first taker, while here it is having no bodily heirs. In that case the devise was to Thomas B. Tyson "during the term of his natural life, then to the lawful heirs of his body in fee simple, on failing of such lawful heirs of his body, then to his right heirs," and it was held that Thomas B. Tyson took an estate in fee, as the limitation to the right heirs over did not change the course of descent; and this is true of the will before us, because, the plaintiff being a Rose, if she died without having had children, her heirs and the heirs of her father, the testator, would be the Rose family.

And this fact—that the Rose family would be the heirs of the plaintiff, if she had no children—marks the distinction between this case and Puckett v. Morgan, 158 N. C. 344, 74 S. E. 15, and Jones v. Whichard, 163 N. C. 244, 79 S. E. 503; both of these cases being decided upon the principle that the language of the ulterior limitation carried the estate to a different line of descent, and was sufficient, when read with the other parts of the will, to show that the words "bodily heirs" were used as a description of the person, and not to denote a class who were to take in succession, and therefore that the rule in Shelley's Case did not apply. Sessoms v. Sessoms, 144 N. C. 121, 56 S. E. 687, is also an authority for the position of the plaintiff. Affirmed.

CHAMBERLAIN v. DUNN. (No. 232.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 1, 1919.)

WITNESSES ⇐ 275(2)—CROSS-EXAMINATION OF DEFENDANT, AS TO IDENTITY OF JUDGMENT DEBTOR, RELEVANT TO ISSUE.

On contest for a fund in custody of the clerk, involving whether plaintiff had been served with process in cases wherein two judgments had been rendered which plaintiff contended were against his son, but which defendant contended were against plaintiff, defendant's testimony on cross-examination as to certain notes secured by mortgage, on which it was alleged the judgments were taken, and about the credits or entries thereon, was relevant on the issue of whom the judgments were against.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lenoir County; Gulon, Judge.

Action by Ben Warren Chamberlain against Charles F. Dunn. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. No error.

Rouse & Rouse, of Kinston, for appellant. Cowper, Whitaker & Allen and J. L. Hamme, all of Kinston, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. The parties contested for the possession of a fund in the custody of the clerk, and the controversy involved the question as to whether the plaintiff had been served with process in the cases wherein two judgments had been rendered. If he was served, the issue should be answered "No," and if he was not, it should be answered "Yes," the issue being, "Is plaintiff entitled to the fund in dispute?" The jury answered it "Yes." The defendant testified in his own behalf to show that plaintiff had been served with process, and was the defendant in the judgments, and he was cross-examined as to certain notes (secured by mortgage) upon which it was alleged that the judgments were taken, and about the credits or entries thereon. This cross-examination was properly permitted, as it tended to throw light upon the questions involved whether the plaintiff was the person who was served with the process in those actions, and whether the judgments were rendered against him. The judge in his charge explained the matter fully to the jury, and stated what was the object of the cross-examination, and how it bore on the case and to what extent the matters elicited by it could be used by them, that is, only to identify the true defendant in the judgment, whether it was the father (the plaintiff in this action) or his son, who had a somewhat similar name. The defendant alleged that the judgments were against plaintiff, who was always known as Warren Chamberlain, while plaintiff contended that they were against his son, who was named Warren Chamberlain, while his own name is Ben Warren Chamberlain, and by that name he had always been known. The relevancy of the facts disclosed by the cross-examination is apparent from this statement.

There is no fault in the charge.

No error.

PATE v. BANKS. (No. 223.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 1, 1919.)

COVENANTS — 96(8) — DRAINAGE ASSESSMENTS ARE "PUBLIC CHARGES" AND NOT WITHIN COVENANTS AGAINST "INCUMBRANCES."

Drainage assessments against land in the district sold by a nonresident, both seller and buyer being fixed with legal notice by the statutory proceedings for the formation of the district, held "public charges" on or against the land, and not "incumbrances," as contemplated by the seller's covenant against incumbrances.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Incumbrance; Second Series, Public Charge.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Lenoir County; Gulon, Judge.

Action by George B. Pate against Florence K. Banks. From judgment dissolving a restraining order, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The Moseley Creek drainage district, which lies partly in Craven and partly in Lenoir, was established under chapter 442, Laws 1909, amended by chapter 67, Laws 1911, by proceedings taken out in Craven, but embraced certain lands in Lenoir, among which is part of the tract conveyed by the defendant to the plaintiff August 30, 1913, with covenants of warranty against "incumbrances." The regularity of the drainage proceedings as to this land has been upheld in Banks v. Lane, 170 N. C. 14, 86 S. E. 713, which was affirmed on rehearing, 171 N. C. 506, 88 S. E. 754, and certain other questions connected with it were passed upon in Taylor v. Com'rs, 176 N. C. 217, 96 S. E. 1027. The drainage district and the amount of the assessments were confirmed on April 17, 1911. These assessments became due and collectible in 10 annual installments, the first of these maturing in 1914, about one year after the conveyance to the plaintiff by the defendant.

The plaintiff executed to the defendant a mortgage for $4,000 to secure the balance of purchase money. After the opinion in Taylor v. Com'rs, supra, was rendered, the defendant demanded payment of $2,300, balance due on purchase money, and began advertisement of foreclosure under the mortgage. This action was instituted to restrain such foreclosure. Upon the hearing, the court dissolved the restraining order, holding that on August 30, 1913, no part of said assessments were incumbrances in the scope of the warranty in the deed. The plaintiff appealed.

Rouse & Rouse and Y. T. Ormond, all of Kinston, for appellant.

Dawson, Manning & Wallace, of Kinston, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. The only question presented is "whether the drainage assessments against the land which was conveyed to the plaintiff by the defendant on August 30, 1913, none of which were due and payable at the time of the conveyance, constitute an incumbrance against said land on that date which was contemplated by the covenant against incumbrances."

In Taylor v. Com'rs, 176 N. C. 224, 96 S. E. 1030, the court, while holding that the point was not absolutely necessary to a decision of that case, said:

"But as the case is before us, we think it proper to say that the view of the clerk is correct that the land is liable to the drainage assessments, just as it is liable for other taxes as they fall due from time to time. As owner of the land, he does not have to consent to the assessment of either the drainage tax or county or state taxation. The drainage tax becomes a lien, just as the benefits accrue, i. e., annually. The decree in the drainage district is not a personal liability of Mrs. Banks, nor is it a personal liability of George B. Pate. It is a lien in rem, accruing annually and resting upon the land into whosever hands it may be at that time. Pate, as purchaser, entered into possession of the land nearly 2½ years after the final decree establishing the drainage district, and necessarily with physical knowledge of the drainage district. While such lien was decreed by the final judgment April 17, 1911, the assessments were not liens then, but only became such as they subsequently accrued, respectively. They were not actual liens and collectible till each fell due, in turn, in the years 1914 to 1921, and therefore not incumbrances within the meaning of the warranty clause of the deed, any more than taxes falling due in each future year. We do not see that Mrs. Banks has any cause to restrain the collection of the assessment for drainage, upon the allegation that she would be liable on her warranty. The future benefits are adjudged to be more than 'the charge.'"

Neither the plaintiff nor the defendant, it appears, had actual notice of the drainage district at the time of the conveyance, and the defendant was then a resident of South Carolina. But they were fixed with legal notice by the proceedings which were conducted in the manner, and with the publication of notices, prescribed by statute, and we so held. Banks v. Lane, 170 N. C. 14, 88 S. E. 713, affirmed on rehearing, 171 N. C. 505, 88 S. E. 754, and in Taylor v. Com'rs, 176 N. C. 217, 96 S. E. 1027. The system of drainage districts was created by the Legislature as a matter of public policy, and, the notices required being a sufficient compliance with constitutional requirements, as we have repeatedly held in numerous cases, the fact that a vendor happens to be a nonresident, or the vendee fails to go upon the land for examination by himself or an agent, cannot vitiate the proceedings, nor can it make the duties and other charges which will accrue, from time to time, upon land in the drainage district an incumbrance. The law makes no exemption for such reasons. If it did so it would make it difficult to sell land lying in those districts.

The lien of the charges for drainage is not a debt of the owner of the land therein, but is a charge solely upon the land and accrues, pari passu with the benefits as they shall accrue thereafter. They are not liens until they successively fall due, and are presumed to be paid out of the increased productiveness and other benefits as they accrue from time to time. These assessments are to be levied from time to time to pay, not the indebtedness of the owner of any tract, but to pay the bonded indebtedness of the district, in that they are exactly like bonds issued by the township, county, or state for public benefits and which become liens on property in futuro only to the extent of the taxes falling due each year to pay the interest, and such part of the principal as may become due. One who purchases land in a township, county, or state cannot complain that these successive tax liens will, from time to time, be collectible out of his realty. Whether he knew of the existence of such indebtedness or not makes no difference. They are not incumbrances within the sense of the warranty clause of a deed. The assessments in a drainage district to take the water off the land is simply an annual tax for that purpose, limited in this case to 10 years, just as bonds issued by a township, county, or state become an annual lien to the extent of the amount falling due each year of principal and interest and limited to 10 or 20, or 40 years, as may be prescribed.

In like manner to drainage districts, the government has created irrigation districts in the western part of the Union, the cost of which is charged upon each tract of land for a series of years or in perpetuum. These are not incumbrances, but, like the cost of taking water off the land, or for payment of bonds issued for roads or other purposes, are a "charge" upon the land, falling due from time to time.

These "public charges" are entirely different from a mortgage, which is to secure an indebtedness of the mortgagor for a benefit such as money borrowed, or other purpose, already received, nor like the laborer's or mechanic's lien, which are for benefit already received, and which are primarily a personal debt of the employer.

"Pavement" assessments, as is said in Raleigh v. Peace, 110 N. C. 32, 14 S. E. 521, 17 L. R. A. 330, are like these assessments for drainage purposes, being "founded upon the principle that the land abutting upon the improvement receives a benefit over and above the property of the citizens generally, and should be charged with the value of such peculiar benefits," and "do not authorize a personal judgment against the owner of the property." Being a public charge, the owner is not liable therefor, and the purchaser takes the land cum onere.

In the case of laying water on the land in an irrigation district, or in taking the water off in a drainage district the benefits will arise anew each year, and the assessments are presumed to be more than counterbalanced by the benefits which shall accrue. It is so adjudged in the decree creating the district. Otherwise, the district would not be made. The annually recurring benefits in an irrigation district, or a drainage district, accrue to the then owners of the property, and can be of no benefit to him who has parted from it by sale. The charge runs with the land, as do the annual benefits. The vendor receiving none of the recurring benefits is not liable for the recurring charges. Both alike are in rem, and accrue to the land in the hands of the then owner.

It is otherwise when the owner of lands gives a mortgage for a benefit already accrued or there is a laborer's or a mechanic's lien for work, or lien for material already furnished.

The drainage system was deemed by the Legislature a measure required for the public benefit. While a drainage district is not a governmental agency like a township or county (Sanderlin v. Luken, 152 N. C. 741, 68 S. E. 225; Com'rs v. Webb, 160 N. C. 594, 76 S. E. 552; Leary v. Com'rs, 172 N. C. 26, 89 S. E. 803) it is a geographical quasi public corporation, and the bonds issued by it for the improvement of the district, like bonds issued for public roads or other purposes, become an indebtedness of the district, and not of any landowner therein. These bonds, as in the case of township and county bonds, are not an "incumbrance," nor yet a lien; they are a "public charge" which falls upon the land in the district in rem, and to be collected in the same manner as all other public charges, but do not become a lien till the maturity each year of the prescribed amount falling due.

If the drainage district and its assessments and other duties and burdens were an "incumbrance," then the vendor of land lying therein would incur no end of liability, for from time to time other assessments must be called for to maintain, or perhaps extend, the drainage system. The liability, however, is upon the land only, and the grantee takes it just as he takes property subject to the payment of other public bonds, already issued or to be issued, but which are an "incumbrance" for which the vendor is liable only to the extent that any installment of the charge or tax is past due.

Affirmed.

DUDLEY et. al. v. JEFFRESS. (No. 172.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 24, 1919.)

1. BOUNDARIES ⇨46(2)—PURCHASER KNOWING AGREED BOUNDARY ESTOPPED TO CLAIM BEYOND IT.

Purchaser, who bought land with knowledge that boundary line had been agreed upon and marked at time of partition of land, and that the parties since the partition, including those under whom purchaser claimed, had recognized and held up to such line, is estopped from claiming beyond line.

2. BOUNDARIES ⇨3(6)—LINE MARKED AND SURVEYED PREVAILS OVER DESCRIPTION IN DEED.

Where with a view to make a deed or division the parties go upon the land and have the line marked and surveyed, intending it to be the line and to be included in the deed, the line so surveyed and marked prevails against the description in the deed, where there is a difference between them.

3. WORDS AND PHRASES—"PRIVITY" DENOTES SUCCESSIVE RELATIONSHIP TO SAME PROPERTY RIGHT.

The term "privity" denotes mutual or successive relationship to the same right of property (citing Words and Phrases, Privity).

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Daniels, Judge.

Action by S. I. Dudley and others against R. O. Jeffress. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. No error.

This was an action to establish a boundary line. On December 8, 1904, the defendant and Dr. Moye agreed to partition a tract of land which they held as tenants in common—two-thirds to defendant, and one-third to Dr. Moye—and employed J. D. Cox to survey the land for partition. They were with the surveyor, and the division line was run by him with their approval, and was marked at the time through the cleared land by a fence and in the woodland by chopped trees and well-defined surveyor's marks to Tar river, and the deed was made at that time. It further appears from the record that from the date of the survey, Dr. Moye occupied only the land lying to the east thereof, and the defendant occupied and cultivated the land to the west of this division line. Dr. Moye conveyed the part which he then held in severalty to Ada M. Cherry and husband in January, 1906, who recognized this division line. They conveyed in October, 1908, to the plaintiff, who went into possession of said land claiming only up to the division line between Jeffress and Moore as marked by the dividing fence and the chopped trees. When the plaintiff purchased said land he had actual knowledge of this boundary line to which Jeffress and Moye and the grantee of the latter had occupied. He made no other claim prior to June, 1916, when Harding, surveyor, suggested to him that if he desired to put his lands on the market for sale it would be wise to have the lands surveyed and platted according to the courses and distances contained in the deed. According to that survey he would obtain the locus in quo, but to do so the line would not only take in land which the defendant had been all the time occupying, but would run through certain buildings which were on the defendant's side of the line, as it had been surveyed and marked on the ground by the surveyor when Moye and Jeffress were present and agreeing upon the division. The jury found that this marked line was the true line, and the plaintiffs appealed.

F. C. Harding, L. W. Gaylord, and Albion Dunn, all of Greenville, for appellants.

Skinner & Whedbee, of Greenville, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. The sixth assignment of error is to the following charge of the court:

"Now, our court has held that ordinarily a survey or in running the lines of a tract of land shall be governed by the description contained in the deed conveying it, but there are exceptions to that. One of the exceptions is this, that where, with a view to making a deed or a division, the parties go upon the land and have the line marked and surveyed, intending it to be the line and to be included in the deed, then the line so surveyed and marked prevails against the description in the deed where there is a difference between them."

This is in exact accordance with the holding of Hoke, J., in Clarke v. Aldridge, 162 N. C. 327, 78 S. E. 216, and numerous cases there cited. This case has been cited with approval since, with full citation of authorities by Brown, J., in Allison v. Kenion, 163 N.

C. 586, 79 S. E. 1110, and by Walker, J., in Lumber Co. v. Lumber Co., 169 N. C. 89, 85 S. E. 438; also in Lee v. Rowe, 172 N. C. 846, 90 S. E. 222. In a still later case (Millikin v. Sessoms, 173 N. C. 725, 92 S. E. 361) it is said:

"It is settled beyond a controversy in this state that a line surveyed and marked out and agreed upon by the parties at the time of the execution of the deed will control the course and distance set out in the instrument. Adlington v. Jones, 52 N. C. 582; Safret v. Hartman, 50 N. C. 185; Williams v. Kivett, 82 N. C. 111."

[1] The plaintiffs while conceding that this would apply as between the original parties, Moye and Jeffress, and their privies contend that it is inequitable as to the plaintiffs, who are innocent purchasers for value. In this case Dudley, however, bought with notice that the line had been agreed upon and marked, and that the parties and their assignees held up to said marked line, and he holds subject to the same estoppel.

[2] This is the chief point in the case, and the jury have found their verdict upon a proper instruction from the court as to the law. The other exceptions do not require discussion.

"Privy means a privy in estate; a property right acquired * * * by contract or inheritance. Bigelow, Estoppel, 142," cited with approval, in Shew v. Call, 119 N. C. 454, 26 S. E. 33, 56 Am. St. Rep. 678.

[3] "The term 'privy' denotes mutual or successive relationship to the same right of property." 6 Words and Phrases, and the exhaustive citations and authorities there cited, pages 5606-5609. It is there held that privies are of three kinds—in blood, in law, and in estate. A privy in estate is one who derives his title to the property in question by purchase. Orthwein v. Thomas, 127 Ill. 554, 21 N. E. 430, 4 L. R. A. 434, 11 Am. St. Rep. 159.

"Privy exists between two successive holders when the later takes under the earlier, as by descent, will, grant, or voluntary transfer of possession." Sherin v. Brackett, 36 Minn. 152, 30 N. W. 551. "Privy implies succession. He who is in privy stands in the shoes or sits in the seat of the owner from whom he derives his title, and thus takes it charged with the burden attending it." Boughton v. Harder, 46 App. Div. 352, 61 N. Y. Supp. 574.

The plaintiff Dudley having bought and taken the deed with knowledge that the line as claimed by the defendant had been settled and marked on the ground by a fence and a line of chopped trees to the river, and that the parties since said partition, including those under whom he claims, had recognized and held up to that line, cannot go beyond that boundary by reason of any error of the parties in drawing the deed not in conformity to said line.

No error.

BAGGETT v. LANIER. (No. 116.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 24, 1919.)

1. EVIDENCE ⇨353(3), 383(3)—RECITALS IN COMMISSIONER'S DEED ARE SUFFICIENT TO SHOW HIS AUTHORITY.

Recitals in commissioner's deed are competent and sufficient to show commissioner's authority to make deed.

2. EVIDENCE ⇨178(3) — COMMISSIONER'S DEED COMPETENT ON PROOF THAT RECORD WAS DESTROYED.

The destruction of the record in which commissioner's deed was recorded must be shown to make deed competent.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨204(5)—OBJECTIONS NOT MADE TO DEED BELOW WILL NOT BE CONSIDERED.

Objection to competency of deed not made in lower court cannot be urged on appeal.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨901—BURDEN OF PROOF TO SHOW ERROR IS ON APPELLANT.

Burden of showing error is upon appellant, for in absence of anything to the contrary, appellate court will presume that ruling of lower court was correct, and that the necessary facts to support it had been proved.

5. JUDICIAL SALES ⇨47—REMEDY FOR IRREGULARITY IN PROCEEDING IS BY MOTION IN ORIGINAL CAUSE.

If proceeding pursuant to which commissioner sold land was irregular, the proper remedy is by motion in the original cause to have it set aside, and not by collateral attack.

6. REMAINDERS ⇨17(3) — REMAINDERMEN NOT AFFECTED BY LIMITATIONS DURING LIFE TENANT'S LIFE.

In action for possession of land, court's failure to submit question of whether plaintiff had been in adverse possession for 7 years was not error, where defendant, having purchased interest of remaindermen, went into possession less than 7 years after death of life tenant, since remaindermen, having no right to possession during life tenant's life, are not affected by statute of limitations during such time.

7. TRIAL ⇨256(1)—REQUEST FOR FULLER INSTRUCTIONS NECESSARY.

Party who feels that he needs fuller instructions should ask for them.

Appeal from Superior Court, Harnett County; Kerr, Judge.

Action by Hiram Baggett against J. B. Lanier. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. No error.

This is an action to recover the possession of land, for an injunction, and for damages. Defendant disclaimed ownership as to the first tract, but denied plaintiff's title as to the second tract of 17 acres. The plaintiff claimed the land under a grant from the state, issued on December 12, 1898, to one James R. Grady, and mesne conveyances from the latter and others to himself. Defendant asserted his right to the land by adverse possession for more than 30 years prior to the date of the grant to J. R. Grady, and he also proved that N. G. Jones conveyed it to J. R. Grady October 7, 1882; that John A. Green, sheriff, conveyed it to Geo. W. Pegram by deed dated June 1, 1877, which was made by him at a sale pursuant to a levy under an execution against Grady. Geo. W. Pegram died, and his executor, John D. Pegram, sold the land, under a power contained in his will, to J. R. Grady, for life, with remainder to the children of Mary I. Grady, wife of J. R. Grady, four of whom conveyed their interests, as tenants in common, to the defendant. The latter also introduced a deed from D. H. McLean, commissioner, to him, dated July 8, 1911. It was admitted that J. R. Grady resided on the land and occupied it until his death, which occurred June 11, 1906. Defendant testified that he took possession of the land immediately after receiving his deed from D. H. McLean, commissioner.

The court charged the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the land, unless the defendant had satisfied them, by the greater weight of the testimony, that he, and those under whom he claimed or derived his title, had been in possession of the land openly, notoriously, and adversely for 30 years before the grant was issued to J. R. Grady, which, under the presumption that a grant had theretofore been issued, would take the title out of the state, and further he must so prove that he and those under whom he claims had held possession of the land adversely, as above defined, for 20 years of said time, or, in lieu of such proof, he must show that he and those under whom he claims had so held for 21 years under color of title before the state had granted the land to Grady. The verdict was for the defendant, and, judgment being entered thereon, plaintiff appealed.

E. F. Young and Clifford & Townsend, all of Dunn, for appellant.

Chas. Ross and W. P. Byrd, both of Lillington, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). The plaintiff reserved but two exceptions: First, that the deed of D. H. McLean, commissioner, to defendant was competent, but it did not appear that he had authority to make it, and that it does not appear that it covers this land; and, second, that the charge in reference to the possession of the defendant and those under whom he claims was erroneous.

[1-5] First, we do not see why the recitals in the McLean deed were not competent and sufficient to show his authority to make the deed. Irvin v. Clark, 98 N. C. 437, 4 S. E. 30. Plaintiff relies on Barefoot v. Musselwhite, 153 N. C. 208, 69 S. E. 71. It may be that the objection was intended to be directed against the competency of this deed, because the preliminary fact, as to the destruction of the record in which it was recorded and which must be shown in order to make it competent, was not established. This is not the form or substance of the objection, and it therefore cannot be urged before us. But if it could, we are of the opinion that such fact was sufficiently shown by the defendant. The authority to make the deed, therefore, must be determined by the sufficiency of the recitals. The statement as to those is not very full or explicit, but enough appears to show it. If the recitals were insufficient, the plaintiff should have had them set out in the case, so that we might know fully what they are. The burden of showing error is upon him; for, in the absence of anything to the contrary, we presume that the ruling of the court was correct, and that the necessary facts to support it had been proved. It appears by fair and reasonable inference that the deed of the commissioner was made under a decree in a regularly constituted special proceeding for the sale of the land, in which the heirs of J. R. McLean were the defendants. If the proceeding was irregular, the proper remedy is not by attacking it collaterally, but by a motion in the original cause to have the same set aside. Rackley v. Roberts, 147 N. C. 201, 60 S. E. 975; Hargrove v. Wilson, 148 N. C. 439, 62 S. E. 520; Barefoot v. Musselwhite, supra; Pinnell v. Burroughs, 168 N. C. 320, 84 S. E. 364; Id., 172 N. C. 186, 90 S. E. 218.

[6] Second. The charge of the court was correct, as it appears to have been admitted that J. R. Grady was in possession of the land until his death on June 11, 1906, and plaintiff, therefore, could not have had adverse possession for so long a time as 7 years, because the defendant took possession about July 8, 1911, when the deed of D. H. McLean, commissioner, was executed to him. Besides, James R. Grady had but a life estate, and the remaindermen were not affected by the statute of limitations during the period of his life.

We do not overlook Gilchrist v. Middleton, 107 N. C. 663, 12 S. E. 85, cited and relied on by the defendant, but, while admitting the correctness of the rule, as to the sources of title, and the different kinds of title under which a party may claim, which is there stated to be that he may assert title by adverse possession under color for 7 years, where the state has been divested of its title by grant or adverse possession for 30 years, as well as by 20 years of such possession without color, the question at last is, not merely whether that can be done, but whether the plaintiff has brought his case within the rule. No kind of adverse possession will avail the plaintiff, unless it was continued long enough to ripen his title, as against this defendant, claiming a remainder after the life estate of J. R. Grady, for during his lifetime his children, from whom defendant derived his title, could not enter, as they had no right to do so, and consequently their right of entry could not be tolled by adverse possession of the plaintiff. It would not do to forbid one to enter upon land, and at the same time bar his right, because he did not enter and preserve his right against a trespasser, whose possession might have continued for 7 years with color, or 20 years without, and ripen his imperfect title into a good one. In this case, the plaintiff's proof has failed to come up to the standard, in the face of his admission that J. R. Grady continued to occupy the land in dispute until his death. Henley v. Wilson, 77 N. C. 216; Todd v. Zachary, 45 N. C. 286; Woodlief v. Webster, 136 N. C. 162, 48 S. E. 578; Joyner v. Futrell, 136 N. C. 301, 48 S. E. 649.

[7] The case of Logan v. Fitzgerald, 87 N. C. 308, cited by the plaintiff, is not applicable, as there the judge merely failed to correctly define adverse possession. If the plaintiff felt that he needed fuller instructions, he should have asked for them. Simmons v. Davenport, 140 N. C. 407, 53 S. E. 225.

It may be that all of the evidence is not set out in the record, or not distinctly so; but, as it now appears to us, the principles of law we have stated must govern the case, and when they are correctly applied, as was done by the court below, there can be no error upon the facts found by the jury.

No error.

PARRISH et ux. v. HODGES. (No. 107.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 1, 1919.)

DEEDS §127(2)—CONSTRUED TO CONVEY AN ESTATE IN FEE.

Under Revisal 1905, § 1578, converting estates tail into estates in fee simple, an habendum to the grantee "to have and to hold the aforesaid tract of land and all privileges and appurtenances thereto belonging, to her and the heirs of her body or issue to their only use and behoof forever," created an estate in fee, the words "or issue" being synonymous with "heirs of the body"; "issue" naturally meaning lineal descendants to the remotest generation (citing Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Heirs of the Body; Issue).

Appeal from Superior Court, Harnett County; Kerr, Judge.

Controversy without action by M. B. Parrish and his wife, Minnie V. Parrish, against M. F. Hodges. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The controversy involved the right of plaintiffs to collect the purchase money for a piece of land sold by plaintiffs to defendant, which the parties agreed should depend on whether plaintiff's deed conveyed a good title.

G. A. Martin, of Chapel Hill, for appellant.

James D. Parker, of Smithfield, for appellees.

HOKE, J. The facts affecting the validity of the title offered are as follows:

"The land in question was owned by J. A. Norris, and on June 4, 1901, said J. A. Norris and wife, Z. A. Norris, conveyed the same, reserving a life estate, to Hattie I. Norris (now Wade) habendum and warranty as follows: 'To have and to hold the aforesaid tract of land to Hattie I. Norris and heirs of her body or issue to their only use and behoof forever. And the said James A. Norris and wife Z. A. Norris covenant with said Hattie I. Norris, heirs of her body, that they are seized of said lands in fee simple; that the same are free and clear from all incumbrances and that they will warrant and defend the title to same against the claims of all persons whatsoever.'" That on November 25, 1912, the life tenants, James A. and Z. A. Norris, his wife, and also Hattie I. Wade, executed a deed in fee for said land to plaintiffs.

It thus appears that the question in controversy depends on the estate conveyed to Hattie I. Norris by the deed from J. A. Norris and wife, and on the facts presented we concur in the ruling of his honor that the deed conveyed an estate of absolute ownership in remainder. And the life tenants and Hattie I. and her husband, James, having joined in the deed conveying the land in fee to plaintiffs, the title offered is a good one, and defendant must comply with the contract of purchase.

Under our statute converting estates tail into estates in fee simple (Revisal, § 1578), this habendum to Hattie I. Norris, "to have and to hold the aforesaid tract of land and all privileges and appurtenances thereto belonging, to her and the heirs of her body or issue to their only use and behoof forever," created an estate in fee, it being clear that the words "or issue" were intended as synonymous with "heirs of the body," and to have the same significance as to the character of the estate conveyed. Revis v. Murphy, 172 N. C. 579, 90 S. E. 573; O'Neal v. Borders, 170 N. C. 483, 87 S. E. 340; Perrett v. Bird, 152 N. C. 220, 67 S. E. 501 and cases cited. This appears, not only from the language of the habendum, indicating that an estate of inheritance was intended for Hattie, but the interpretation is emphasized by the condition of the parties and the warranty clause, showing that an estate of absolute ownership was being presently conveyed, and Hattie, the grantee named, then unmarried and without children, being evidently the only one considered or who was then in a position to take and hold the interest.

In Ford v. McBrayer, 171 N. C. 420, 88 S. E. 736, to which we were referred by counsel in support of defendant's position, it is fully recognized that the word "issue" is not infrequently construed to mean lineal descendants and the equivalent of the "heirs of the body." And while it is said in that case that the courts rather lean to the position that the word should be considered as a word of purchase in the sense of children, etc, this was said in reference to an instrument involving an application of the rule in Shelley's Case, where in pursuance of a public policy prevalent at the time the rule was established a life estate, given in express terms to the first taker was entirely disregarded, and a rule which, as well stated in the opinion, the "courts were loath to extend." And in Puckett v. Morgan, 158 N. C. 344, 74 S. E. 15, another decision where an estate for life was given the first taker, the application of the rule in Shelley's Case was denied by reason of additional words appearing in the limitation in remainder to the "heirs of the body," and tending to show that these words were not used in the general sense of all takers by inheritance, the significance required for a proper application of the rule in Shelley's Case, and for that reason the estate for life was allowed to stand as written in the devise.

But in our case, while a life estate is reserved to the grantor, there is no life estate given to Hattie I. Norris, the first and only grantee in remainder, but the estate and interest is conveyed to said grantee "to have and to hold the aforesaid tract or parcel of land and all the privileges and appurtenances thereto belonging, to the said Hattie I. Norris, the heirs of her body or issue to their only use and behoof forever," and in such case we see no reason why this deed should not be held to cover an estate in fee according to its evident intent. Nor why the term "issue" appearing in this habendum should not be allowed its natural and primary significance of "lineal descendants to the remotest generation," and so the equivalent ordinarily of "heirs of the body." Nobles v. Nobles, 177 N. C. 243, 98 S. E. 715; White v. Goodwin, 174 N. C. 724, 94 S. E. 454; Revis v. Murphy, 172 N. C. 579, 90 S. E. 573; Gold Mining Co. v. Lumber Co., 170 N. C. 273, 87 S. E. 40; Shuford v. Brady, 169 N. C. 224, 85 S. E. 303;

Triplett v. Williams, 149 N. C. 394, 63 S. E. 79, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 514; 2 Bouvier's Law Dic. (3d Rev.) 1686, 1687; 2 Words and Phrases (Second Series) 1213-1214, citing, among other authorities, Perry v. Bulkley, 82 Conn. 158, 72 Atl. 1014; Coates v. Burton, 191 Mass. 180, 77 N. E. 311; Robeson v. Cochran, 255 Ill. 355, 99 N. E. 649; Dick v. Ricker, 222 Ill. 413, 78 N. E. 823, 113 Am. St. Rep. 426.

We are of opinion that the deed has been correctly construed, and the judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

McFARLAND v. HARRINGTON. (No. 115.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 1, 1919.)

1. TRUSTS  $\S$  35(2)—AGREEMENT TO HOLD FOR ANOTHER CREATES ENFORCEABLE TRUST.

If a sister agreed to accept title to land on trust to hold it for her brother as to his half-interest, and she obtained the deed to the land thereby, it created an enforceable trust in favor of the brother.

2. TRUSTS  $\S$  371(8)—IN SUIT TO ENFORCE NO VARIANCE SHOWN BETWEEN ALLEGATION AND PROOF.

In suit to enforce a trust in land, where the complaint alleged a parol trust by agreement with defendant in behalf of plaintiff, her brother, as to half of the land, which was all deeded to her, and there was proof to show such parol trust, there was no variance between the allegation and the proof.

3. TRUSTS  $\S$  44(2)—EVIDENCE SUFFICIENT TO SHOW PAROL TRUST IN LAND.

In a brother's suit to enforce against his sister her agreement to hold in trust for him a half interest in land to which she took title, evidence held sufficient to establish such agreement on her part.

4. TRUSTS  $\S$  41—BURDEN TO ESTABLISH PAROL TRUST IN LAND IS ON PLAINTIFF.

The burden was upon plaintiff, suing his sister, who had taken title to a tract of land, to prove her parol agreement to hold half in trust for him.

5. TRUSTS  $\S$  44(3)—CLEAR EVIDENCE NECESSARY TO ESTABLISH PAROL TRUST IN LAND.

A brother, suing his sister, who had taken title to a whole tract of land, to establish her agreement to hold half in trust for him, could make his case only by clear, strong, and convincing evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lee County; Connor, Judge.

Action by B. J. McFarland against Mrs. Flora Harrington. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. No error.

Some time before the institution of this action the plaintiff, two brothers, and three sisters, one of them the defendant, were tenants in common of a tract of land, which they inherited from their father, and the plaintiff, with the three sisters and their mother, were living on the land; he being a young man at the time. The plaintiff and his two brothers made a mortgage on their interest in the land to secure food and clothing for the defendant and other sisters, leaving the interest of the sisters unincumbered. The mother joined to bar dower, and has been dead for many years.

The plaintiff was unable to redeem his interest, and the one-half undivided interest (that of the three brothers) was sold under the mortgage and was acquired by J. A. McIver, through a third person who bought at the sale. The original interest of the defendant and her sisters is not in the controversy. Subsequently McIver brought a partition proceeding in the superior court of Lee county against the three sisters, including this defendant. The defendants in that proceeding denied the title of the petitioner, and the cotenancy, raising an issue of fact, and the cause was transferred to the civil issue docket for trial, where it remained for several years without any action being taken in it.

In 1918 the defendant, Mrs. Harrington, employed an attorney to bring the case to a hearing, so that she could get her interest, one-sixth, out of it, stating that they had been defending the proceeding so that her brother, Jones McFarland (this plaintiff) could recover something; that she was still willing to do all she could for him. Later the attorney and the plaintiff were brought together, through Mrs. Harrington, and represented them both. He immediately sought to have this plaintiff made a party to the partition proceeding; but, the petitioner resisting this, he failed. He then interviewed J. A. McIver, the petitioner, in the interest of McFarland, to secure a compromise, and McIver told him whatever his attorney did in the matter would be satisfactory. The attorney also testified that Mr. McIver told him he only wanted to come out without loss, get his money and interest back, and his attorney's fees, but wanted the original mortgagors, or such of them as desired, to get whatever advantage there was in it; that he searched for the mortgagors, found that the widow and one of the brothers were dead, and the other brother, Malcolm (who had not remained on the farm with the mother and sisters) wanted "Jones," the plaintiff, "to have it."

The cause came on for trial, and plaintiff's attorney unsuccessfully renewed his motion to have B. J. McFarland made a party. The jury returned a verdict for the petitioner, for his one-half interest in the land; it being agreed, however, that B. J. McFarland was to have McIver's interest upon payment of the stipulated amount. It was agreed between the attorneys of McIver and plaintiff (neither of counsel in this case), representing their clients, that, upon payment into court within a given time of this amount, McFarland should have title to the property, and that a judgment should be drawn securing this result; but McFarland was not a party, and it was therefore agreed that if Mrs. Harrington would consent to take title in her name, she being a party and sister of McFarland, the judgment should be so drawn, and she would reconvey to McFarland, this plaintiff. A draft of the judgment was made, and shown to the defendant and explained to her, and she agreed, as plaintiff's attorney testified, to take and hold the title for this plaintiff and reconvey to him. The judgment was then signed, and the attorney delivered to her a copy.

The defendant denied, in her testimony, that she made any agreement about it, but admitted that she saw the judgment after it was signed, and testified that she knew nothing about the transaction before. Both plaintiff and defendant deposited the money with the clerk, where the deed was deposited by McIver, in accordance with the terms of the judgment. The defendant got the deed, refused to convey to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff sued. The following issue was submitted to the jury:

"Did the defendant, Mrs. Flora Harrington, agree to take the title to the land described in the pleadings for the benefit of the plaintiff, B. J. McFarland, and to reconvey the same to him?"

It was answered: "Yes." Judgment for the plaintiff upon the verdict, and defendant appealed.

Williams & Williams, of Sanford, for appellant.

Seawell & Milliken, of Sanford, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The only question of importance in this case is whether the defendant, Mrs. Harrington, at the time the judgment was drawn, and before or at the time the legal title passed to her, promised and agreed that she would accept the title upon the trust to hold it for her brother (as to the half interest in the land) until he could pay the stipulated amount of money to fully reimburse Mr. McIver, and then convey the half interest to the plaintiff. There was evidence to support the plaintiff's allegation of a trust, such as is above set forth, and it was fairly and correctly submitted to the jury. If such an agreement was made, and she obtained the deed thereby, it created an enforceable trust in favor of the plaintiff. Avery v. Stewart, 136 N. C. 426, 48 S. E.

775, 68 L. R. A. 776. She would not have acquired the legal title, except for the confidence reposed in her by the other parties that she would perform her part of the agreement, and the law declares it inequitable that she should be permitted longer to hold it in violation of her promise. She will not be allowed to keep the title and repudiate the promise. Sykes v. Boone, 132 N. C. 199, 43 S. E. 645, 95 Am. St. Rep. 619; Jones v. Jones, 164 N. C. 320, 80 S. E. 430; Allen v. Gooding, 173 N. C. 93, 91 S. E. 694. In the last-cited case the Chief Justice thus states the law, quoting from the authorities mentioned:

"Where one party has, by his promise to buy, hold, or dispose of real property for the benefit of another, induced action or forbearance by reliance upon such promise, it would be a fraud that the promise should not be enforced." Bispham's Eq. § 218. * * * "When a party acquires property by conveyance or devise, secured to himself under assurance that he will transfer the property to or hold and appropriate it for the use and benefit of another, a trust for the benefit of such other person is charged upon the property, not by reason merely of the oral promise, but because of the fact that by means of such promise he had induced the transfer of the property to himself"—citing Glass v. Hulbert, 102 Mass. 39, 3 Am. Rep. 418.

This doctrine has been frequently affirmed by this court before and since Avery v. Stewart, supra, was decided. Recent cases are Rush v. McPherson, 176 N. C. 562, 97 S. E. 613, citing Cohn v. Chapman, 62 N. C. 92, 93 Am. Dec. 600; Boone v. Lee, 175 N. C. 383, at page 386, 95 S. E. 659, at page 660, where it was said:

"In one aspect of our case, this is a parol express trust, not enforceable under the statute of frauds; but, as it is a solemn declaration of one party that if the legal estate is conveyed to him he will hold it in trust for another, it would be fraudulent and unconscionable for him to acquire the legal title by this engagement to hold it for another, and not comply with his promise, and therefore equity will enforce the trust, as the statute of frauds does not apply to such cases on account of the fraud, and the trust created thereby"—citing Sykes v. Boone, supra; Avery v. Stewart, supra.

[2, 3] There was not only evidence to establish this trust, but Mr. McIver afterwards expressly ratified what was done by his attorney, and was perfectly willing that the plaintiff should have the full benefit of the transaction. The evidence shows that he did not intend that the defendant should have the half of the land he had acquired through the purchaser at the sale, but that it should go either to all of the former owners of the half in controversy, or to any one of them who desired it. That was the view he took of it, but the material question is what the defendant agreed to do, and the jury, upon full evidence, have so found against her as to fasten a trust on the title she holds for the benefit of the plaintiff. This seems to us very plain from the record as we have construed it. There was no variance between the allegation and the proof. The complaint alleged a parol trust by agreement with Mrs. Harrington, in behalf of the plaintiff, as to the half of the land, and there is proof to show it. Mr. McIver wanted his money, the whole of it, and was willing that the plaintiff, as one of the original owners and mortgagors, should have the land. He left the matter entirely to his attorney, who made such an agreement, through the plaintiff's attorney, with Mrs. Harrington, and it appears that Mr. McIver afterwards expressed his satisfaction with what had been done by the attorneys. The plaintiff's attorney stated to this defendant that he could get Mr. McIver's half interest for his client, the plaintiff, who was defendant's brother, and it had been suggested to him that he see her and ascertain if this was agreeable to her. She replied, "That is all right; anything on earth that is reasonable; let my brother get his interest in it;" and after telling her that she would have to make a transfer or deed to him, she said, "I will fix that at any time." She denied that she had assented to any such arrangement, or that she had promised to convey the McIver one-half to her brother; but the jury have settled the facts, so it has been found that there was an agreement of all the parties to the settlement of the matter.

Some objections have been urged to the authority of the attorneys, but there is ample evidence of it, and that they kept within the limit of it. This authority was an express one, and not to be implied merely from the fact of the attorneyship, as in the cases cited to us.

[4, 5] The remaining exceptions relate to prayers for instructions tendered by the defendant as to the authority of the attorneys, the burden of proof, and the quantum thereof. We have disposed of the question as to the attorneys' authority, and the judge charged fully and correctly as to the burden of proof, placing it squarely upon the plaintiff, and also as to the quantum of the evidence required to be adduced by him, when he told the jury that it must be clear, strong, and convincing. The charge was singularly clear and comprehensive, and was exceedingly fair to the defendant.

We have searched the record diligently, and no error is to be found therein.

No error.

Appeal from Superior Court; Vance County; Connor, Judge.

Controversy submitted without action upon facts agreed for the construction of the will of Missouri A. Parham. From judgment rendered Luther Parham appeals. Affirmed.

This is a controversy submitted without action upon facts agreed for the construction of the will of Missouri A. Parham. She executed the will on April 28, 1902, and the next day wrote to the draftsman of the will the following letter:

"April 29, 1902.

Captain Shaw: I do not recollect hearing you read it in the will, about the house. I want Locket and Luther to have my house and let them divide it as they please. I want you to put it in the will for Locket's wife to have his part her lifetime if they do not have any children. I was afraid that you did not put it in the will about the house, and I could not go to sleep. Please send me receipt for the five dollars. I will pay you the other.

"Yours respectfully

"Missouri A. Parham."

And later, the following undated letter.

"Captain: I could not get down there last summer. Let the will stand until I come down. If I die before I get there, give my house to Luther; it is too small to divide.

"Missouri A. Parham."

Both letters were produced before the clerk by Capt. Shaw, proofs taken, and probate made as below, and the will and letters were recorded by the clerk on March 17, 1903, promptly after the death of the testatrix, and Locket Parham qualified as executor thereof, and settled up the estate, and the land was divided up agreeably to the terms of the will as modified by the provisions in the said two letters probated as codicils. Luther Parham received the dwelling as part of his share according to the second codicil, modifying the first codicil.

On January 13, 1919, the widow of Locket Parham filed a petition before the clerk, reciting:

"It appears from an inspection of the said will and codicils, together with the probate of the same, that the affidavits of the witnesses to the codicils are incorporated in the probate, but that the codicils are not expressly referred to in the adjudication of probate by the clerk, which petitioner believes was an oversight, since the proofs and codicils are recorded. Yet it is contended that said codicils have not been probated. Your petitioner, by the death of her husband, derived an interest under the said codicils for the term of her life in that portion of the lands devised by the said will and codicils to her said husband, P. L. Parham"

—and asked the court to correct and formally adjudicate the probate of the said codicils.

On this motion, after the notice to Luther Parham, the clerk adjudged that—

"Due proof of the execution of both said letters was taken on March 17, 1903, and that the same were admitted to record as parts of the will of said testatrix. The court doth now, for then, adjudge that they were duly proven, and doth admit them to probate."

The following were the proceedings and decree on said probate:

Original Probate.

State of North Carolina, Vance County—ss.:

In the Superior Court. A paper writing, purporting to be the last will and testament of Missouri A. Parham, deceased, is exhibited before me, the undersigned clerk of the superior court for said county, by Locket Parham, the executor therein mentioned, and the due execution thereof by the said Missouri A. Parham is proved by the oath and examination of J. T. Harris, W. B. Shaw, the subscribing witnesses thereto, who, being duly sworn, doth depose and say, and each for himself deposeth and saith, that he is a subscribing witness to the paper writing now shown him purporting to be the last will and testament of Missouri A. Parham; that the said Missouri A. Parham, in the presence of this deponent, subscribed her name at the end of said paper writing, now shown as aforesaid, and which bears date of the 28th day of April, 1902.

And the deponent further saith that the said Missouri A. Parham, the testator aforesaid, did, at the time of subscribing her name as aforesaid, declare the said paper writing so subscribed by her and exhibited, to be her last will and testament, and this deponent did thereupon subscribe his name at the end of said will as an attesting witness thereto, and at the request and in the presence of the said testator. And this deponent further saith that at the time when the said testator subscribed her name to the said will as aforesaid, and at the time of deponent's subscribing his name as an attesting witness thereto, as aforesaid, the said Missouri A. Parham was of sound mind and memory, of full age to execute a will, and was not under any restraint to the knowledge, information or belief of this deponent. And further these deponents say not.

W. B. Shaw. [Seal.]

J. T. Harris. [Seal.]

Severally sworn and subscribed, this 17th day of March, 1903, before me.

Henry Perry, Clerk Superior Court.

Also two letters, one bearing date the 29th day of April, 1902, the other without date, both addressed to W. B. Shaw, who was the draftsman of her will and at her request the custodian thereof. Said letters speak of changes in said will, and purport to be codicils to the same will of M. A. Parham, deceased, which said will is also exhibited in open court by Locket Parham, the executor therein named. And it is thereupon proved by the oath and examination of W. B. Shaw that he drew the said will and subsequent thereto the said letters were received by him in sealed envelopes from the said Missouri A. Parham through a messenger, and the same were at once deposited and kept in his safe in the same package with the said will until offered in court with the said will; that when he drew the will the testatrix requested him to keep the said will until her death, which he did as aforesaid; that said will and letters were filed in his safe in an envelope, marked "The will of Missouri A. Parham."

And it is further proved by the oath and examination of three competent and credible witnesses, to wit, J. A. Kelly, J. E. Burroughs, and L. W. Burroughs, that they were acquainted with the handwriting of the said Missouri A. Parham, and verily believe that the name of Missouri A. Parham subscribed to the said letters, and the said letters, and every part thereof, is in the handwriting of the said Missouri A. Parham.

W. B. Shaw.

J. A. Kelly.

J. E. Burroughs.

L. W. Burroughs.

Sworn and subscribed to before me, this the 17th day of March, 1903.

Order for Probate of Will.

State of North Carolina, Vance County.

In the Superior Court—Before Henry Perry, Clerk. In re Estate of Missouri A. Parham, Deceased. A paper writing purporting to be the last will and testament of Missouri A. Parham, deceased, is exhibited in open court for probate by Locket Parham, executor therein named; and the due execution thereof by the said Missouri A. Parham, deceased, is duly proved by the oath and examination of W. B. Shaw, J. T. Harris, J. A. Kelly, J. E. Burroughs, and L. W. Burroughs, subscribing witnesses thereto, and it is further shown to the satisfaction of the court by said witnesses that the said Missouri A. Parham was, at the time of making said will of sound mind and memory, of full age to execute a will, and under no restraint to their knowledge, information or belief.

It is thereupon considered, adjudged, and decreed that said proof is sufficient and according to law, and that said paper writing is and contains the last will and testament of Missouri A. Parham, deceased. And on motion it is ordered that said will be admitted to probate and recorded in the Book of Wills of Vance County, and as such filed as provided by law in the office of the clerk of superior court of said county.

It is further ordered that said Locket Parham be allowed to qualify as executor as provided by law and enter upon the discharge of the duties imposed by said trust.

Dated this the 17th day of March, 1903.

Henry Perry, Clerk of Superior Court.

On appeal the judge approved and affirmed the order, and Luther E. Parham appealed on the ground: First, that the clerk was without authority to probate said codicils now because the same and all the proofs were before the court at the time the will was admitted to probate in 1903, and the judgment then admitting the will to probate exhausted the jurisdiction of the clerk, and pleaded the statute of limitations of one year, within which a judgment can be corrected for mistake or excusable neglect and the general bar of the statute of ten years; second, that the proofs which appear in the record did not warrant a finding and adjudication that the letters were codicils to said will; third, that the second codicil revokes the first.

Andrew J. Harris and Thomas M. Pittman, both of Henderson, for appellant.

T. T. Hicks, of Henderson, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. Upon examination of the probate made March 17, 1903, we think the clerk and the judge below were correct in their adjudication that—

"Due proof of the execution of both said letters was taken March 17, 1903, and that the same were admitted to the record as parts of the will of said testatrix."

It is therefore unnecessary to discuss the first exception as to whether they could have been admitted to probate nunc pro tunc.

When the will and two letters were produced before the clerk on March 17, 1903, he took proofs of the execution of the will and separately proofs of the two codicils, and adjudged that they constituted the will, and recorded all three together in the book of wills, and the lands were divided on petition of the parties, Luther taking the house according to the second codicil, and an equal number of the acres of land, though section 6 of the will proper gave the house to Locket and Luther jointly.

At the death of Locket Parham January 26, 1918, his wife claimed her life estate under the codicil, he having no children. Luther claimed that the letters were no part of the will, and had not been probated as such, and that the land became his, while Locket's wife contended that the letters had been probated and recorded and treated and acted upon as parts of the will, and she began this proceeding because of Luther's contention that the probate did not refer to the codicil. We think that her prayer that the clerk should "amend the probate and make it refer to the codicil" was unnecessary, but the judgment rendered was proper "on the facts proven or admitted," Elliott v. Brady, 172 N. C. 830, 90 S. E. 951.

[1] The clerk's adjudication March 17, 1903, says "will." He adjudicates that the execution thereof is duly proved by the oath and examination of W. B. Shaw, J. T. Harris (witnesses to the will proper), and J. A. Kelly, J. E. Burroughs, and L. W. Burroughs (witnesses to the codicils). This was a sufficient recognition of the codicils and a probate thereof (In re Will of Deyton, 177 N. C. 495, 99 S. E. 424), and they were then recorded by the clerk with the will. The words "duly proven" carry with them a legal presumption that everything was properly done. Lumber Co. v. Branch, 158 N. C. 255, 73 S. E. 164.

The clerk's adjudication of January 28, 1919, that they were part of the will was saying no more than had been said on March 17, 1903.

[2] It is not necessary therefore to discuss the jurisdiction of the clerk to amend the probate or to probate the codicils nunc pro tunc. We do not think the exception that the second codicil revoked the first requires discussion. The second codicil, written several months after the first, was a request to "let the will stand" as modified by the first codicil, for she makes no reference to the first letter or codicil, except that she modifies it in the second letter by giving the whole of the house to Luther Parham, which indicates the extent to which she wished to modify her previous disposition of her property.

[3] It was not open to the respondent to caveat the codicils, if duly proven in 1903, for he has not only filed no caveat to the will or the codicils, but more than seven years have elapsed since they were probated. Revisal, § 3135; In re Dupree's Will, 163 N. C. 256, 79 S. E. 611. The word "will" in the clerk's probate includes codicils. Revisal, § 2831, subsec. 9. It is there referable to the word when used in a statute, but it therefore applies to legal proceedings and in all cases where a contrary intent does not appear.

We concur in the judgment of his honor that the letters set out in the record have been duly probated and recorded as codicils to the last will and testament of Missouri A. Parham, and that "by virtue of the codicil dated April 29, 1902, the said Rosa E. Parham is the owner of the tract of land described as the share of Locket Parham in the lands of Missouri Parham for the term of her natural life, and to the rents arising therefrom since the death of Locket Parham."

Affirmed.

DIXON v. GREEN. (No. 226.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 1, 1919.)

1. PLEADING $\S$ 34(3)—STATING CAUSE OF ACTION SUFFICIENT THOUGH INARTIFICIALLY DRAWN.

Under Revisal 1905, § 495, requiring liberal construction of a pleading, if in any portion of the pleading or to any extent it presents facts constituting a cause of action, or if sufficient facts can be fairly gathered from it, the pleading will stand, however inartificially drawn, or however uncertain and redundant its statements; every presumption being in favor of the pleader.

2. PLEADING $\S$ 9 — ALLEGATION OF FACTS FROM WHICH FRAUD MAY ABISE SUFFICIENT.

An allegation of facts from which the conclusion of fraud or undue influence may result is sufficient in pleading.

3. DEEDS $\S$ 72(1)—GRANTOR IMPOSED ON BY FRAUD AND UNDUE INFLUENCE MAY OBTAIN RELIEF.

If defendant's mind was so weak she was unable to guard herself against imposition, or to resist importunity or the use of undue influence, equity will grant her relief against plaintiff, her grantee, if she was in fact imposed on, either by fraud or undue influence, though mere weakness or inadequate consideration is insufficient.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR $\S$ 925(2)—ON REVIEW OF REFUSAL TO SUBMIT ISSUES OF FRAUD, SUPREME COURT MUST ASSUME ALLEGATIONS TRUE.

On defendant's appeal, the trial court having refused to submit issues tendered by her as to fraud and undue influence in plaintiff's procuration of a deed from her, the Supreme Court must assume defendant's allegations to be true in determining whether the issues were properly refused to be submitted.

5. DEEDS $\S$ 190—ANSWER IN SUIT TO RECOVER LOT SUFFICIENT TO RAISE ISSUES OF FRAUD AND UNDUE INFLUENCE.

In suit to recover a lot in a city, defendant's answer setting up that she was aged, weak, and infirm, and that she had intended only to lease to plaintiff, instead of to convey to him, etc., held to raise the issues of fraud and undue influence.

6. PLEADING $\Rightarrow$ 93(1)—INCONSISTENT OR CONTRADICTION DEFENSES.

In suit to recover a lot, defendant could plead double, and set up inconsistent and contradictory defenses.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lenoir County; Gulon, Judge.

Action by David L. Dixon against Clara Green. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. New trial.

The plaintiff sued for the recovery of a lot in Kinston. He alleged ownership and right of possession, and the defendant's unlawful withholding of the possession from him. The defendant denied plaintiff's allegations, except as to her possession, and the plaintiff's demand for the possession, and further denied that she executed to the plaintiff the deed under which he claims the land, and averred that, if she did execute it, she did not, at the time, have sufficient mental capacity to do so, being then very old, about 78 years of age, and greatly enfeebled in mind and body, and very decrepit, and her mental faculties impaired by the infirmities of old age and by "wretched physical health"; that her daughter had advised her to come to New York, where she resided, presumably so that she might care for her. We will state the remainder of her averments in her own language. While in this enfeebled mental and physical condition, as above described—

"the question arose as to what would be done with her interest in said lot. She talked the matter over with the plaintiff, who was her next door neighbor, and in whom she had implicit confidence, and she did state to said plaintiff, upon his suggestion that he would take the land while she was away, that she would be willing to let him have it, if she went to New York, at the rate of $25 per year, and at the same time she expressly stated to the plaintiff that it was her dower right and her only home, and that she had refused many times to sell it for large and valuable considerations, and that under no conditions would she part with her home, so that she could not return to it. That she does remember agreeing that the said plaintiff might have the use of the lot of land during her absence at the rate of $25 per year, with the understanding that she in no way released her life estate therein, and should have her home returned to her when she returned to Kinston, but she denies that she ever agreed to anything else and she has no knowledge of any other understanding. And furthermore this defendant alleges that the plaintiff expressly stated and promised her in his conversation on the subject that she should not be disturbed in her home, and that the transaction that he referred to was for her protection, and that he was only to have the land during her absence from Kinston, and at the same time he proffered and offered his help in getting away from Kinston, and promised that, if necessary, he would help her in returning to her home when she desired to return, and that in all these promises and conditions this defendant absolutely and implicitly relied upon the plaintiff to carry same out as same were understood by her and stated to her. That the plaintiff well knew and understood the weak and decrepit physical and mental condition of this defendant at the time hereinbefore mentioned, and well knew that she was a very aged colored woman, and had no knowledge of business transactions, and further well knew that she relied upon him to protect her, and the promises, statements, and representations herein made were made with such knowledge on the part of the plaintiff, were relied upon by the defendant, and served as an inducement upon which she acted; whatever action she took at the time, and the only action which she knows of or understood, however, being the verbal agreement herein referred to. That the said lot of land is a valuable lot in the city of Kinston, on McIlwean street, being one of the principal residential streets of the city, and being in a section where many of the most desirable citizens of Kinston reside, and constituting one of the most desirable residential sections of said city. That the said lot is in dimensions 80 feet front on McIlwean street by 169 feet deep, and that its rental value with the small house upon it in which this defendant resides would be at least $100 per year. That the consideration appearing in the purported paper writing under which plaintiff claims is so grossly inadequate, and especially considering the conditions hereinbefore set forth, and the difference in station, ability, and standing of the parties, that this defendant is informed, believes, and avers that in equity the said consideration would necessarily shock the conscience of the court, and would not support an absolute deed to the life estate of the defendant to the said lot, even if such deed has been executed, which latter matter of the execution of the said deed is expressly denied. That the defendant is informed, believes, and avers that upon all the facts herein alleged the court of equity will not permit the plaintiff to recover possession of the lot of land by virtue of the purported paper writing herein referred to, and that said paper writing is a cloud upon defendant's life estate, which she is entitled to have removed, and that said paper writing is absolutely invalid and void. That further this defendant, now being 80 years of age, and in weakened physical condition, unable most of the time to leave her bed, has no other property whatever, except her interest in the lot herein set forth. That she is absolutely without any other home, and that if the court should sustain the alleged paper writing, under which the plaintiff claims in this case, it would result in taking from the defendant her home and leave her without any place of abode whatsoever."

There is a prayer for the proper relief. The court refused to submit issues tendered by the defendant as to fraud or undue influence, or to hear evidence offered by the defendant upon any such issues, as defendant has denied the execution of the deed. Defendant excepted. The court then submitted issues as to the execution of the deed, defendant's mental capacity, and plaintiff's ownership of the land, which the jury answered in favor of plaintiff. Judgment upon the verdict, and defendant appealed.

Cowper, Whitaker & Allen and J. L. Hamme, all of Kinston, for appellant.

Rouse & Rouse, of Kinston, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The only question before us is the sufficiency of the answer to raise the issues tendered by the defendant regarding fraud and undue influence. We are required by the statute (Revisal, § 495) to construe a pleading liberally, and in enforcing this provision we have adopted this rule: That if in any portion of it, or to any extent, it presents facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, or if facts sufficient for that purpose can be fairly gathered from it, the pleading will stand, however inartificially it may have been drawn, or however uncertain, defective, and redundant may be its statements, for, contrary to the common-law rule, every reasonable intendment and presumption must be made in favor of the pleader. This is what we held in Blackmore v. Winders, 144 N. C. 212, 56 S. E. 874, and more recently in Brewer v. Wynne, 154 N. C. 467, 70 S. E. 947, Renn v. Railroad Co., 170 N. C. 128, 136, 86 S. E. 964, and Lee v. Thornton, 171 N. C. 209, 88 S. E. 232.

[2] There is no magic in using the word "fraud," as a term, in order properly to plead fraud, nor is it necessary to state "undue influence" in those words, in order to rely upon such a plea. It is sufficient to state the facts from which fraud and undue influence arise. While this has been held in numerous cases, there is a good statement of the doctrine in 12 R. C. L. at page 417, § 164, to this effect. While fraud must be clearly charged, it is not necessary to allege it in terms, if the facts alleged are such as in themselves constitute fraud, or if so alleged that fraud be inferred or presumed, for the acts charged are not less fraudulent because the word "fraud" or "fraudulent" is not employed by the pleader in characterizing them. In other words, an allegation of facts from which the conclusion of fraud may result is sufficient.

[3] Now as to what is sufficient to constitute fraud or undue influence: Although the plaintiff be not a lunatic or insane, yet, if her mind was so weak that she was unable to guard herself against imposition, or to resist importunity, or the use of undue influence, equity will grant her the relief she seeks, provided it be shown that she has been imposed upon by the use of either of the means enumerated. Mere weakness, or inadequate consideration, however, will not be sufficient. A court of equity cannot measure the understandings or capacities of individuals. Where there is a legal capacity, there cannot be an equitable incapacity, apart from fraud. 1 Fonbl. Eq. B. 1, M. 2, S. 3. If she be of sane mind she has a right to dispose of her property, and her will stands in place of a reason, provided the contract or act justifies the conclusion that she has exercised a deliberate judgment, such as it is, and has not been circumvented, or imposed on by cunning, artifice, or undue influence, means abhorrent to equity, and constituting fraud. Rippy v. Gant, 39 N. C. 445.

"The mere fact that a man is of weak understanding, or is below the average of mankind in intellectual capacity, is not of itself an adequate ground to defeat the enforcement of an executory contract, or to set aside an executed agreement of conveyance. But where mental weakness is accompanied by other inequitable incidents—such as undue influence, great ignorance, and want of advice, and inadequacy of consideration—equity will interfere and grant either affirmative or defensive relief." Eaton on Equity, p. 317; Sprinkle v. Wellborn, 140 N. C. 173, 174, 52 S. E. 666, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 174, 111 Am. St. Rep. 827.

Lord Hardwicke, in Earl of Chesterfield v. Janssen, 2 Vesey, Sr., 125, said there is a third kind of fraud, in his classification which has been generally adopted, which may be presumed from the circumstances and conditions of the parties contracting, and this goes further than the rule of law, which is that it must be proved, and not presumed; but it is wisely established in this court, to prevent taking surreptitious advantage of the weakness or necessity of another, which knowingly to do is equally against conscience as to take advantage of his ignorance. The subject is fully discussed in Sprinkle v. Wellborn, supra, in Pritchard v. Smith, 160 N. C. 79, 75 S. E. 803, and in Hodges v. Wilson, 165 N. C. 323, 81 S. E. 340, where the cases are collected and the limitation of the doctrine with respect of fraud in conveyances is properly limited. See, also, the following other cases decided by this court: Smith v. Beatty, 37 N. C. 456, 40 Am. Dec. 435; Suttles v. Hay, 41 N. C. 124; Mullins v. McCannless, 57 N. C. 425; Hartly v. Estis, 62 N. C. 167; Myatt v. Myatt, 149 N. C. 137, 62 S. E. 887; Bellamy v. Andrews, 151 N. C. 256, 65 S. E. 963; Braddy v. Elliott, 146 N. C. 578, 60 S. E. 507, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1121, 125 Am. St. Rep. 523; Buffalow v. Buffalow, 22 N. C. 241, Futrill v. Futrill, 58 N. C. 61; Id., 59 N. C. 337. The last case, while slightly different in its facts, and in some respects not so very material, lays down the rule which should govern in cases where there is no technical or well-defined confidential relation, but where there was professed friendship for the grantee, and acquired influence over him, and circumstances of imposition, oppression, and deceit, the grantor having become enfeebled in mind and body, and the deed having been procured when the grantor was in no condition to understand it, and did not know its contents, and had no sufficient opportunity to obtain the counsel and advice of a disinterested friend, relying upon the trust and confidence he placed in the grantor instead.

[4, 5] With these authorities before us, let us briefly review the facts as alleged in the answer; for the action of the judge in disregarding them as not pertinent, and his refusal to submit issues upon them, were the same as if the plaintiff had demurred to the defense so set up. We must assume these allegations to be true upon this appeal, although it may hereafter so happen that the proof will not substantiate the charge. The defendant was, at the time of this transaction, very old (now 80 years of age) and decrepit, in wretched physical health, unable most of the time to leave her bed, and without such mental capacity as would enable her to execute a deed understandingly. She was going to New York to spend a while with her daughter, and wished to lease her home while she was absent. She had been offered many times a large price for it, and had refused to sell. In this situation she thought of the plaintiff, as being her neighbor who lived next door to her, and who had ostensibly been a friend, in whom she had placed "implicit confidence." She turned to him for succor, and upon his suggestion that he would take the land while she was gone she stated to him that she would take $25 per year, if she did go to New York, remarking at the time that it was her dower and her only home, and that under no condition would she part with this home, so that she could not return to it, and it was agreed that it should be returned to her when she came back to Kinston, so that she should not be disturbed in her home; that this was the only understanding; that he promised to help her go to New York and return to her home, and she relied upon all those promises when she signed the paper; that the plaintiff well knew of her weak and decrepit condition and of her age, and also that she relied upon him to protect her, and his promises, and his attitude towards her, were the inducements to sign the paper. The said lot is a valuable one, being situated on one of the principal residential streets, and is one of the most desirable lots in the city of Kinston, it being 80 feet in width by 169 feet in length, and its rental value is at least $100 per year; that the consideration stated in the deed held by the plaintiff is a grossly inadequate one (being only $25 annually so long as the grantor lives), so gross that it would "shock the conscience and moral sense of the court"; that the difference in the station, ability, and standing of the parties is very great, defendant being the weaker of the two; that if the lot is taken from her she will be left without any place of abode. Upon the allegations, and in accordance with the precedents, we are of the opinion that the case should be submitted to the jury upon both issues, fraud and undue influence. The latter, while generally classed under the title of fraud, is not necessarily a fraudulent influence, though it frequently is so. It is a controlling influence when the weaker succumbs to the stronger and the latter's will is substituted for that of the former. It is a paramount influence and when it is used for the benefit or advantage of him who exercises it for such a selfish purpose, it may well be called "fraudulent," and the law so regards it; but there may be cases where it is not actually fraudulent, but in a moral sense innocent, though not harmless.

In this case we have allegations sufficient to show fraud and undue influence, viz. mental and physical weakness and imbecility, extreme old age, grossly inadequate consideration, greater superiority of the one over the other, the relation of friend and adviser, and consequent full confidence of the weaker in the stronger and reliance on him, the necessary condition of the defendant, and finally an allegation of a virtual misrepresentation as to the contents of the deed, which is an absolute conveyance of the land, and not a lease, founded upon a small consideration.

[6] The defendant could plead double, and set up inconsistent or contradictory defenses. McLamb v. McPhail, 126 N. C. 218, 35 S. E. 426; Williams v. Hutton, 164 N. C. 216, 80 S. E. 257; Clark's Code (3d Ed.) § 245; 1 Pell's Revisal, p. 226, § 482, and note, with cases. It may be that, in the development of the case, the defendant's proof may not sustain her allegations of fraud and undue influence; but what she has charged is sufficient in law, and entitles her to be heard before the jury.

As the issues will be somewhat interdependent, and injustice may be done by allowing them as now answered to stand, we direct that they be set aside, and that the whole case be tried again upon all of the issues which are raised by the pleadings; and it will be so certified.

New trial.

(No. 173.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 1, 1919.)

1. INSURANCE ¶668(12) — CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES BEING INVOLVED, SUICIDE OF INSURED QUESTION FOR JURY.

The credibility of witnesses being involved, the question on the affirmative defense of suicide of insured is for the jury.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶1001(1)—FINDINGS OF FACT NOT REVIEWABLE.

There being evidence to go to the jury that insured's death was accidental, their finding against suicide is not reviewable.

3. INSURANCE ¶665(6)—EVIDENCE OF NEGLIGENCE OF PASSENGER NOT PROOF OF INTENT TO COMMIT SUICIDE.

Evidence that insured, killed by a train, was guilty of negligence, does not of itself prove an intent to commit suicide.

4. INSURANCE ¶646(7)—BURDEN OF PROOF ON PARTY ALLEGING SUICIDE.

There is a presumption of law against insured having committed suicide, so that the burden of proof is on the party asserting suicide.

5. INSURANCE ¶527—INSURED "TRAVELING AS PASSENGER," WITHIN POLICY, WHEN KILLED AT INTERMEDIATE STATION.

Death of insured was caused by accident while he was "traveling as a passenger," within a life policy providing, in such case, for recovery of double the face of the policy, though he had got off at an intermediate station for a legitimate purpose, while the train was waiting, and was killed in attempting to reboard it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pamlico County; Daniels, Judge.

Action by Lovie T. Wharton, administratrix, against the New York Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. No error.

This was an action on a $5,000 insurance policy on the life of Raymond M. Wharton, with the following additional provision:

"Or double the face of this policy upon receipt of due proof that the death of the insured was caused directly by accident while traveling as a passenger on a street car, railway train, steamboat, licensed for transportation of passengers, or other public conveyance operated by a common carrier."

And with the further provision:

"In event of self-destruction during the first two years, whether the insured be sane or insane, the insurance under this policy shall be a sum equal to the premium thereon, which has been paid to and received by the company, and no more."

The defendant set up the defense that—

"The death of plaintiff's intestate was caused by his own act of self-destruction."

The jury found the issues as follows:

(1) "Was the death of the said Raymond M. Wharton caused directly by accident while traveling as a passenger on a railroad train operated by a common carrier? Answer: Yes.

(2) "Was Raymond M. Wharton's death due to self-destruction? Answer: No.

(3) "In what amount, if any, is defendant indebted to the plaintiff? Answer: $10,000, with interest from the 20th day of June, 1917, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum until paid."

Judgment accordingly. Appeal by defendant.

James H. McIntosh, of New York City, Moore & Dunn, of Newbern, and James H. Pou, of Raleigh, for appellant.

Z. V. Rawls, of Bayboro, and D. L. Ward and Ward & Ward, all of Newbern, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. It is admitted that the plaintiff's intestate, R. M. Wharton, on June 3, 1917, boarded a train at Greensboro, with ticket to Goldsboro, which train was due to arrive in Raleigh at 4:20 a. m. It was also in proof that the deceased bought a 1000-mile book at Greensboro, and exchanged 189 miles of it for a ticket to Newbern, and rode in the white day coach from Greensboro to Raleigh, and was killed by the same coach as the train was backing out of the Raleigh station about 4:35 a. m., and that he had on his person the mileage book and coupon from Greensboro to Newbern, and was on his way to his farm and home in Pamlico county. It was also in evidence that his family was in Greensboro for the purpose of educating his children, and that he had a small grocery store there. It was also in evidence that he stepped off the coach at Raleigh, but remained in the station, and was walking up and down on the concrete pavement between the tracks, and was some 10 feet from the track when "All aboard!" was called; that he was then either standing or sitting on a box, and started towards the backing train; that in some way he got on the track between the Pullman and the day coach, and was run over and killed.

The defendant offered evidence which it contended should have satisfied the jury that he deliberately crawled under the backing train for the purpose of being run over. The plaintiff offered evidence, that it contended should satisfy the jury, that the deceased ran to get on the day coach, and, the door of the vestibule to that and to the Pullman being closed, he stumbled or fell, and was caught on the track between that and the Pullman, and was run over and killed. They also offered evidence tending to show that the deceased had no motive to commit suicide, and that his death was entirely accidental.

[1, 2] This evidence was earnestly discussed here, and doubtless before the jury. The jury, however, found that the death of the deceased was caused by an accident, and not as an act of self-destruction. It can serve no purpose to elaborate the testimony, for there was evidence tending to sustain the theory that the death was caused by an accident, and the burden of proof was upon the defendant to establish its allegation that the death was deliberate self-destruction. The function of the jury was to determine the fact. The burden of proof being on the defendant to prove its defense, the court could not adjudge that an affirmative defense is proven, for that involves the credibility of the witnesses, which is a matter for the jury. Spruill v. Insurance Co., 120 N. C. 141, and numerous citations thereto in the Anno. Ed., 27 S. E. 39. Besides, there was evidence to go to the jury that the death of the deceased was accidental.

[3, 4] This is not a question whether the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence, for, if it were conceded that he was, this does not of itself prove an intent to commit suicide. The presumption of law also is against self-destruction, and the burden is on the party who is asserting it. The court properly charged the jury that the burden was on the defendant to satisfy the jury by the greater weight of the evidence that the deceased got in the way of the train with the intent to destroy himself, and unless the jury so found to answer the second issue "No."

[5] The court also charged the jury:

"If you find from the greater weight of the evidence that Raymond M. Wharton, the deceased, purchased the ticket from Greensboro to Newbern, and was proceeding on the journey on the train that killed him, and on the arrival of the train at Raleigh, where it had a stop for some little time prior to its proceeding to Goldsboro, and he got off the train for the purpose of getting a cup of coffee, or some breakfast, or for any other legitimate purpose, and with the intent to take the same train at the time of its departure, and continue his journey, and that at the time the conductor or porter cried 'All aboard!' for the departure of the train he was waiting, and undertook to get aboard the cars to continue his journey, and in the effort to get aboard he accidentally fell on the track, and was thus accidentally injured, and died the same day from the effect of the injury so received, you should answer the first issue 'Yes.'"

The defendant also excepted to this, but it is correctly stated.

The defendant further contends that, as the policy provides liability "when the death of the insured was caused directly by accident while traveling as a passenger," the deceased having gotten off the train while it was standing in Raleigh, he was not traveling as a passenger at the time. He cites certain cases where it was so held when the accident occurred under a policy which provided that the injury must occur while the passenger is "riding on the train." It is not necessary to consider whether this is not too technical (and in fact it has been overruled), for here the language of the policy was altered, perhaps intentionally, on account of those decisions, and provides, "while the insured is traveling as a passenger."

These words have been construed by this court in Wallace v. Railroad, 174 N. C. 171, 93 S. E. 731, which held:

"One who has purchased his ticket to his destination on a passenger train does not relieve the railroad of its duty to him as such passenger by getting off the train during its stop at an intermediate station, without notice to its employees or objection from them, to see some person there on business."

In that case there is a full and well-considered opinion by Allen, J., who held, with citation of authorities, that while there is some conflict—

"The better rule, and one supported by the weight of authority, is that a passenger does not lose his rights as such by leaving the train temporarily at an intermediate station for a lawful purpose. 10 C. J. 624; 4 R. C. L. 1040; Railroad v. Sattler, 64 Neb. 636 [90 N. W. 649, 57 L. R. A. 890, 97 Am. St. Rep. 666]; Dodge v. Railroad, 148 Mass. 207 [19 N. E. 373, 2 L. R. A. 83, 12 Am. St. Rep. 541]; Parsons v. Railroad, 113 N. Y. 355 [21 N. E. 145, 3 L. R. A. 683, 10 Am. St. Rep. 450]; Railroad v. Coggins [88 Fed. 455] 32 C. C. A. 1, and other authorities in the note to the citation from Corpus Juris and Ruling Case Law, supra."

He becomes a passenger when he goes on the premises for that purpose, and this relation continues till the termination of the contract of carriage. Daniel v. Railroad, 117 N. C. 592, and citation thereto in the Anno. Ed., 23 S. E. 327, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 485.

[6] The defendant also contends that there is a defect in jurisdiction, in that letters of administration were taken out in Pamlico county. The plaintiff testified that at the time of the accident she had two homes; that she had been living in Greensboro nearly a year, but that her sojourn there was temporary, and for the purpose of educating her children; that her house and home were in Pamlico, and she had returned there soon after the death of her husband. The probate court, having found that the plaintiff's home, and the residence of the deceased, was still in Pamlico at the time of his death, issued letters of administration there, and they cannot be impeached collaterally. The defendant should have moved in that court to cancel her letters in Pamlico, if it had sufficient proof. Reynolds v. Cotton Mills, 177 N. C. 412, 99 S. E. 240.

This point was not made on the trial, nor is it presented by any assignments of error. The defendant attempted to raise it here for the first time on his general exception to the refusal of the motion to nonsuit. Had it been pleaded, or even had exception been taken on the trial, the plaintiff would have had opportunity to put on fuller testimony. The objection cannot be raised collaterally when it is not pleaded, as a defense. It is not seen that the defendant has been prejudiced in any wise by the action having been brought in Pamlico, instead of Guilford.

No error.

LEE v. L. J. UPTON & CO. (No. 171.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 1, 1919.)

1. CONTRACTS §280(1)—RIGHT TO RECOVER AS FOR BREACH OF AGREEMENT TO FURNISH BARRELS.

Plaintiff cannot recover damages as for defendant's failure to deliver barrels for crop of potatoes, so that the crop could be delivered by plaintiff between the 1st and 5th of June, where he was not ready to dig the potatoes until the 5th of June, at which time he had 750 barrels on hand from defendant, and did not begin digging until June 11th, and completed delivery of the crop of 1,500 barrels by June 20th.

2. PLEADING §380 — EVIDENCE NOT SUPPORTED IN PLEADING INADMISSIBLE.

Evidence unsupported by allegations in the pleadings was properly excluded.

3. DAMAGES §28—FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT NOT CONTEMPLATED BY PARTIES NOT RECOVERABLE.

Damage from a breach of contract not reasonably within the contemplation of the parties is not recoverable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pamlico County; Daniels, Judge.

Action by R. H. Lee against L. J. Upton & Co. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This is an action for the recovery of $2,000 for breach of contract. The contract which was entered into by the plaintiff and defendant and offered in evidence provides that the defendant was to furnish fertilizer and 100 bags of Irish cobbler seed potatoes at a price to be paid by plaintiff to defendant. The defendant was also to furnish and deliver to plaintiff, f. o. b. Oriental, N. C., one-half of the empty barrels and covers necessary for harvesting said crop of potatoes. The defendant was also to furnish to plaintiff all the empty barrels and covers necessary for harvesting all of his half of said potatoes. The plaintiff was to furnish the land, properly prepare same for crop of early potatoes, plant, cultivate, and harvest said potatoes under the supervision, direction, and control of defendant, and to deliver same f. o. b. cars at the railroad station at Oriental, where they were to be divided equally by the plaintiff and defendant. The plaintiff was to sell to the defendant his half of his said crop of potatoes for $2.50 per barrel. The seventh paragraph of the contract is as follows:

"7. The said second party hereby agrees to sell to the said first party, and the said first party hereby agrees to purchase from the said second party, all of the said second party's one-half part, or share, of all strictly No. 1 potatoes and all strictly No. 2 potatoes, which shall be grown from the said crop of Irish potatoes, at the price of $2.50 per barrel for No. 1's, and $2.50 per barrel for No. 2's, put up in new standard barrels, filled full and well-rounded, and properly graded, and delivered to the said first party, or its agent, free on board cars at Oriental railroad station, in such quantities from day to day, or from time to time, between June 1 and June 5, 1917, as the said first party, or its agent, may direct. From the purchase price of said second party's one-half share of said potatoes so delivered to the first party the first party shall deduct whatever amount the second party may owe it, and shall pay the balance, if any, to the said second party, promptly after deliveries."

In the complaint the plaintiff alleges a breach of contract, in that the defendant did not furnish him barrels in time for him to deliver the Irish potatoes between June 1st and June 5th, and upon the trial he offered evidence that he intended planting sweet potatoes where he had the Irish potatoes, and that by reason of the delay his sweet potato crop was later and damaged. This evidence was excluded, and the plaintiff excepted. At the conclusion of the evidence his honor held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover damages for breach of contract, and upon payment into court of the amount due the plaintiff for his part of the potatoes according to the contract entered judgment of nonsuit.

Z. V. Rawls, of Bayboro, and D. L. Ward, of Newbern, for appellant.

Moore & Dunn, of Newbern, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. Conceding that the contract required the defendant to furnish barrels, so the plaintiff could deliver the potatoes between the 1st and the 5th of June, the evidence of the plaintiff shows that the failure to do so was not the cause of the delay, and that the defendant was not damaged because he did not get the barrels in time. The plaintiff testified in his own behalf:

"I sent word to the defendant that my potatoes were ready for digging, and I wanted to start on the 5th of June. I sent this message on the 4th of June."

He also admitted that he had over 700 empty barrels at his house on the 5th of June, and his brother, M. D. Lee, who was a witness for the plaintiff, testified that he got for the plaintiff from the defendant 500 barrels in one load and 250 barrels in another before June 4th.

[1] If, therefore, the plaintiff was not ready to dig his potatoes until the 5th of June, and he then had 750 barrels, it is difficult to see upon what theory he can hope to recover damages for failure to furnish barrels to enable him to make delivery between the 1st and the 5th of June. The evidence shows also that the plaintiff did not begin digging until June 11th, and that he completed the delivery of his crop of 1,502 barrels by June 20th.

[2, 3] The evidence as to the sweet potato crop is immaterial, as the plaintiff is not entitled to recover damages; but it was also properly excluded upon the ground that there was no allegation to support it, and because there is nothing to prove that such damage was reasonably within the contemplation of the parties.

Affirmed.

8. DIVORCE §322 — DIVORCE DECREE CHANGES ESTATE BY ENTIRETIES INTO ONE IN COMMON.

9. BANKS AND BANKING §134(9) — ON SALE OF ESTATE IN ENTIRETY, ONE-HALF DEPOSITED IN BANK FOR HUSBAND IS SUBJECT TO EXECUTION.

Where a husband and wife, owners of an estate by the entireties, sold it, agreeing to sever the unity existing between them, and deposited half the proceeds in bank for the wife, and the other half in another bank in her name for the secret benefit of her husband, who was in failing circumstances, such other bank, to which the husband was liable as a surety on his firm's note, was entitled to charge the deposit in it with the amount of his debt to it.

10. BANKS AND BANKING §154(9) — WHETHER BANK DEPOSIT IN NAME OF WIFE WAS FRAUDULENT AS TO CREDITORS FOR THE JURY.

In a wife's suit against a bank to recover a deposit, consisting of half the proceeds of sale of a lot held by her and her husband as tenants by the entireties, the husband's share having been deposited in her name, he being in failing circumstances, whether the money was deposited with defendant bank and another, half in each of them, for their accommodation, or was put in under a false designation of the depositor as the wife to defraud defendant bank, the husband's creditor, held for the jury under the evidence.

11. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⇨14(2)—WHETHER, ON SALE OF ESTATE BY ENTIRETIES, PROCEEDS WERE TO BE HELD IN SEVERALTY FOR THE JURY.

In a wife's suit against a bank to recover a deposit, consisting of half the proceeds of sale of a lot held by her and her husband as tenants by the entireties, the husband's share having been deposited in her name, he being in failing circumstances, the question whether plaintiff wife expressly or inferentially agreed that any estate by the entireties in the lot should be changed into an estate in severalty in the proceeds of its sale, held a question for the jury.

12. BANKS AND BANKING ⇨134(9)—BANK MAY SET OFF AGAINST FRAUDULENT DEPOSIT IN WIFE'S NAME HUSBAND'S DEBT.

A bank may set off against a deposit standing in a wife's name a debt due it from her husband, where the deposit was of the husband's funds, and was made in the wife's name to defraud creditors; Revisal 1905, §§ 960-962, invalidating fraudulent transfers.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Guion, Judge.

Action by Mrs. M. S. Moore against the Greenville Banking & Trust Company. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. No error.

The action was brought by the feme plaintiff against the defendant to recover of it an alleged deposit of $2,090.56, and to recover damages for refusal of defendant to honor plaintiff's check. (This last cause of action, however, has been abandoned.) The facts out of which this controversy arose may be briefly stated as follows:

Prior to the fall of 1915, plaintiff's husband, who is a party to this action, and W. L. Hall, were doing a partnership business in the town of Greenville, and engaged in buying and selling farm products. The firm carried a banking account with defendant, and for the purpose of securing overdrafts executed to defendant company their note for $2,000, appearing in the record. W. M. Moore signed this note as surety. Thereafter said firm and the said W. M. Moore, as surety, became indebted to defendant bank in the sum of $2,090.56. The firm became financially distressed, failed, and refused to pay the note. Hall was absolutely insolvent. Moore refused to pay, stating "that all of his property was in his wife's name, and the bank could whistle for its money." Thereupon, the credit of the firm having been given upon the bona fide belief of the bank in Moore's solvency, the bank investigated Moore's financial condition. This investigation disclosed that Moore had had considerable property, the title to all of which had become vested in his wife, the plaintiff. It found that plaintiff and her husband were the joint owners of a valuable residential lot in the town of Greenville, which they had purchased in 1908, and which they sold in the fall of 1915 for $12,000 cash, $6,000 of which was deposited by W. M. Moore in the National Bank of Greenville in the name of the plaintiff, and the other $6,000 was deposited in the defendant bank by said W. M. Moore in the name of the plaintiff.

The bank finding that Moore did not intend to pay his obligation as surety, and otherwise, sought advice as to how it might protect itself from loss, and was advised that, upon the voluntary conversion of said real estate into cash, the estate by entirety was dissolved; that its common-law incidents no longer applied; that one-half of the purchase price received for said lot, to wit, $6,000, became the sole property of W. M. Moore, and liable for his debts; that Moore had no legal right to give the plaintiff all of the said purchase price, and thereby defeat the payment of his joint and individual liability to the bank. Thereupon the bank, under date of February 1, 1916, notified the plaintiff of her status at the bank, and of the indebtedness of her husband, and of his refusal to meet his obligation, and further notified her that in order to protect itself from loss it would charge her account with an amount sufficient to pay the indebtedness due by said W. M. Moore; the bank contending that the plaintiff knowingly permitted Moore to perpetrate a fraud upon the bank, and was a party thereto in so far as she accepted all of said purchase price received for said lot in furtherance of the plan of W. M. Moore to defeat his liability to the bank, and thereupon the bank charged the amount of said note and interest to said fund received by virtue of the sale of said lot as aforesaid, and the plaintiff was duly notified that the bank would not honor any check drawn on said account, which reduced the amount of said account below the sum of $2,090.56. Upon receipt of this notice the plaintiff drew a check on defendant bank, which it refused to pay, and which if it had paid, would have reduced the balance in her name below the amount of defendant's claim, and thereupon the feme plaintiff brought this action to recover said deposit of the bank. Thereafter W. M. Moore, her husband, was made a party, as appears in the record.

When the case was first heard, there was a mistrial, and thereafter the trial judge rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff upon the pleadings, from which judgment the defendant appealed. This court, on the appeal, granted a new trial, and the case upon the second hearing, having been heard upon its merits, the result was that the jury answered all of the issues against the plaintiff, finding by its verdict that the money in defendant bank was the sole property of W. M. Moore, and placed by him in plaintiff's name for the purpose of defrauding the bank. Plaintiff appealed.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). The case was before this court at the spring term, 1917, and the decision below was reversed. It is reported in 173 N. C. at page 180, 91 S. E. 793. A careful review of that opinion clearly shows that the governing principles of law involved in this litigation have already been passed upon by the court favorably to the defendant. Especially is this so when we take into consideration the full force of the following excerpt from our opinion found on the bottom of page 183 of 173 N. C., on page 795 of 91 S. E.:

"In the present instance, as we have seen, the claim of the defendant bank is against both the partnership and the individual members, who indorsed its note as sureties, and, under the doctrine recognized and approved by these and like authorities [supra] on the subject, if the facts should be established as alleged and contended for by defendant bank, the right of appropriation, to the extent required to satisfy the claim, would arise to the bank and the defendant is therefore entitled, as stated, to have the questions determined on proper issues. And the principle is in no way affected by the fact that the deposit now stands in the name of the plaintiff, the bank having taken it in ignorance of the true conditions affecting its rights. If, as defendant avers, it was in fact and truth the husband's property, and placed in the wife's name with intent to defraud creditors and the husband being insolvent, she was a volunteer, or if she participated in the fraudulent purpose, in such case the attempted appropriation is avoided by our statute to prevent fraudulent gifts and conveyances (Revisal, §§ 960-962), and the question can, for the purposes of this defense, be considered and dealt with as if the deposit stood in the name of the husband, a course pursued with approval in Citizens' Bank v. Garnett, 21 Kan. 354, an apt authority for the disposition we make of the present appeal."

On the new trial below, issues submitted, with the annexed answers thereto of the jury, were as follows:

"(1) Is the defendant, W. M. Moore, indebted to the Greenville Banking & Trust Company, and, if so, in what amount? Answer: Yes, $1,748.

"(2) Was the property purchased of T. E. Hooker paid for with the individual funds of Mrs. M. S. Moore? Answer: No.

"(3) Was W. M. Moore the owner of the money deposited in the defendant bank? Answer: Yes.

"(4) Were the proceeds of the property sold to W. H. Long deposited in the Greenville Banking & Trust Co., in the name of M. S. Moore for the fraudulent purpose of preventing the Greenville Banking & Trust Co. from collecting the amount due and owing it by W. M. Moore? Answer: Yes."

These issues seem to cover the questions, which this court directed to be submitted to the jury, and the answers thereto all seem to have been in favor of the defendant bank. Whether the deed from Hooker and wife to Moore and wife creates a tenancy in common or an estate by the entirety, it would seem, under the facts, that a conversion of the estate took place, as it was intended that it should do so, upon the execution of the deed to Long. That there was an intention to convert the estate by the entirety into an estate in severalty is evidenced by the fact that the husband attempted to give all of his interest therein to the plaintiff, his wife.

We do not deem it necessary to consider, or to decide, whether the voluntary conversion of the land into money by the sale to W. H. Long, nothing more appearing, divested the proceeds of every attribute of an estate by the entirety, simply by the conversion itself, because we are of the opinion that, by the very conduct of the parties, such a conversion and divestiture resulted, and it was manifestly so intended, as we will show, when the fund was divided into halves and deposited by the mutual consent of the parties, one half thereof in the defendant bank and the other half in the National Bank of Greenville. Mrs. Moore asserts that the deed for the Hooker lot was bought with her own money, which was derived from other property owned by her in Grimesland. We will state this matter more at large and in substantially her own way. She admits, in her reply to the answer of the defendant, that for several years prior to October 22, 1915, the Hooker lot was held in the name of the plaintiff and her husband, W. M. Moore, "by deed in the entirety," but that, in fact, it was bought and paid for with her individual money, and that, when the deed was written, it was by inadvertence of the draftsman conveyed to both husband and wife by the entirety, and that after the discovery of the same she and her husband agreed that it might be so held, as appears in said deed, but for the real use and benefit of the plaintiff; that she sold the property to W. H. Long on October 22, 1915, and that with her husband she joined in a deed conveying the same for $12,000 to him. She further admits that in payment for the said lot the purchaser, W. H. Long, did draw two checks, made payable to the order of the plaintiff, one in the sum of $6,000, which was deposited in the National Bank of Greenville, in the name of, and to the credit of, the plaintiff, and another check in the sum of $6,000, made payable to her order and deposited in the name of, and to the credit of, the plaintiff in the defendant bank, and that the reason for so doing was to divide said deposit between the two banks, in order that both might share in the benefit of the deposit of said fund equally, which was done at the request of one of the banks.

Now, if it was the purpose to convert the land into money, which should be the sole property of Mrs. Moore, this would destroy the estate by the entirety, and it would thereby become an estate in severalty, or, if this was to be so in form merely, but not in fact, and the intention was that, while the apparent title to the fund stood in the name of Mrs. Moore, the real title was to be in them severally, one-half to belong to each, this was a conversion also into an interest in severalty in the money, or, in other words, a conversion of the land into money and a division into equal shares of the fund. If the latter was the agreement, and such a conversion could be accomplished by their consent, the husband's title to the half deposited in the defendant bank could not be concealed and covered up to defraud his creditors; he being then insolvent and not having other property sufficient and available to pay his then existing creditors. It seems to us that the jury have found this to be the truth of the matter, and the real transaction, though in form it appears to be otherwise, and that Mrs. Moore owned the entire fund; and for the sake of discussion we may concede, without deciding, that when the conversion into money was made they could enter into an arrangement, in defiance of the husband's creditors, by which she should have it all.

Let us see, then, if the jury have sufficiently and conclusively decided that, while Mrs. Moore was to take it all in form, the other was the real purpose, and that her husband was to be the beneficial owner of the half which was deposited in the defendant bank, subject to his check, and that the deposit in her name was a mere shift to deceive, circumvent, and defraud creditors. They have said that the Hooker lot was not bought with the individual funds of Mrs. Moore, and that W. M. Moore was the owner of the funds deposited in the defendant bank, and not only is that true, they further say, but that the deposit was made in the name of his wife for the fraudulent purpose of preventing the defendant bank from collecting the amount of Moore's indebtedness to it. This effectually disposes of the idea that there could have been any "estate by the entirety" in the fund realized by the sale of the Hooker lot in Greenville, and, on the contrary, the jury find as a fact that the former estate by the entirety in the lot had, by the express agreement between the apparent owners thereof, been converted into an estate in severalty, as the idea is excluded thereby, that it was understood that Mrs. Moore should be the sole owner of the fund.

[1-4] The characteristics of the anomalous estate, which is denominated as one by the entirety, are well understood. Blackstone (book 2, p. 182) defines this estate by these words:

"If an estate in fee be given to a man and his wife, they are neither properly joint tenants nor tenants in common; for, husband and wife being considered one person in law, they cannot take the estate by moieties, but both are seized of the entirety, per tout et non per my, the consequence of which is that neither the husband nor the wife can dispose of any part without the assent of the other, but the whole must remain in the survivor." Mordecai's Law Lectures (1907) p. 559.

This court has held that the husband is entitled to the income, increase, or usufruct of the property. Long v. Barnes, 87 N. C. 329; Simonton v. Cornelius, 98 N. C. 437, 4 S. E. 38; Bruce v. Nicholson, 109 N. C. 202, 13 S. E. 790, 28 Am. St. Rep. 562; Bank v. Gornto, 161 N. C. 841, 77 S. E. 222; West v. Railroad Co., 140 N. C. 620, 53 S. E. 477, 6 Ann. Cas. 360. The estate was predicated upon the fact that, in law, the husband and wife, though twain, are regarded as one—there being, in other words, a unity of person, which has been called the fifth unity of this estate, the others being of time, title, interest, and possession, which also belonged to an estate by joint tenancy. When land is conveyed or devised to husband and wife, nothing else appearing, they take by the entirety, and upon the death of either the other takes the whole by the right of survivorship. 2 Bl. 182; Topping v. Sadler, 50 N. C. 357; Freeman on Cotenancy and Partition, § 64; Harrison v. Ray, 108 N. C. 215, 12 S. E. 993, 11 L. R. A. 722, 23 Am. St. Rep. 57, and the cases supra, beginning with Long v. Barnes. The statute (Laws 1784, c. 204, § 6; Revisal of 1905, § 1579) abolishing the right of survivorship in joint tenancies does not apply to this estate. Motley v. Whitmore, 19 N. C. 537; Todd v. Zachary, 45 N. C. 286; Woodford v. Higly, 60 N. C. 237. One peculiarity incident to this estate is that, if an estate be given to A., B., and C., and A. and B. are man and wife, they, being one person, will take a half interest, and C. will take the other half. This ancient absurdity seems to be the law in this state now. Hampton v. Wheeler, 99 N. C. 222, 6 S. E. 236. Another peculiarity of this estate is that neither husband nor wife can dispose of their interest, or any part thereof, without the assent of the other. The deed of either without the joinder of the other is void. Gray v. Bailey, 117 N. C. 439, 23 S. E. 318;

2 Blk., 182; Ray v. Long, 132 N. C. 891, 44 S. E. 652. Neither can such land be sold under execution, nor can the interest of either husband or wife be thus sold. Bruce v. Nicholson, 109 N. C. 202, 13 S. E. 790, 26 Am. St. Rep. 562; Gray v. Bailey, supra; Ray v. Long, supra. Nor can one be barred by the statute of limitations unless the other be barred also. Johnson v. Edwards, 109 N. C. 466, 14 S. E. 91, 26 Am. St. Rep. 580. The above rules apply to devises to man and wife (Simonton v. Cornelius, supra), and also to contracts to convey land to man and wife (Stamper v. Stamper, 121 N. C. 251, 28 S. E. 20). They likewise apply to a gift or devise to a man and his wife "during their natural lives." Simonton v. Cornelius, supra; Mordecai's Law Lectures (1907) pp. 559, 560.

In Hairston v. Glenn, 120 N. C. 341, 27 S. E. 32, where money, the separate earnings of husband and wife, was deposited in a bank in their joint names, the husband stating to the cashier, in the presence and hearing of his wife, that it was their joint earnings and that he desired a certificate made out for the whole amount ($1,500) in their joint names, which was done, and the certificate delivered to the husband, the latter having stated that, when either died, he wanted the survivor of them to have the entire fund, the husband then died, and his widow claimed but half of the fund, it was held that she was entitled to it; the question of survivorship, and her right to the whole of the fund, not being before the court. That case, while very close to the question raised in this one, does not decide it, for the reason stated that she did not claim the whole of the fund. The interest and control of the husband during the existence of the joint estate, or the joint lives of the two parties, is well illustrated in the recent decision of Dorsey v. Kirkland, 177 N. C. 520, 99 S. E. 407, known as "the flume case." Jones v. Smith, 149 N. C. 318, 62 S. E. 1092, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1037, 128 Am. St. Rep. 661, and Bank v. McEwen, 160 N. C. 414, 76 S. E. 222, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 542, where the question of the respective interests and rights of the two parties is fully considered. In the flume case, it is said, citing and quoting from Bynum v. Wicker, 141 N. C. 96, 53 S. E. 478, 115 Am. St. Rep. 675:

"This estate by entirety is an anomaly, and it is perhaps an oversight that the Legislature has not changed it into a cotenancy, as has been done in so many states. This not having been done, it still possesses here the same properties and incidents as at common law * * * [under which] 'the fruits accruing during their joint lives would belong to the husband;' * * * hence the husband could mortgage or convey it during the term of their joint lives, that is, the right to receive the rents and profits, but neither could incumber it so as to destroy the right of the other, if survivor, to receive the land itself unimpaired."

And in Bank of Greenville v. Gornto, 161 N. C. 342, 77 S. E. 222, a lease for ten years made by the husband was held to be valid, and the court said concerning the nature of the estate and the rights and powers of the husband during the life of the wife:

"As Brady and his wife held, not as tenants in common or joint tenants, but by entireties, their rights must be determined by the rules of the common law, according to which the possession of the property during their joint lives vests in the husband, as it does when the wife is sole seized. Neither can convey during their joint lives, so as to bind the other, or defeat the right of the survivor to the whole estate. Subject to the limitation above named, the husband has the same rights in it which are incident to his own property. By the overwhelming weight of authority the husband has the right to lease the property so conveyed to him and his wife, which lease will be good against the wife during coverture, and will fail only in the event of her surviving him." Bynum v. Wicker, supra; Long v. Barnes, supra; Simonton v. Cornelius, supra; Bank of Greenville v. Gornto, supra.

An interesting discussion of this "unity of person," as pertaining to the relation of husband and wife, by Justice Allen, will be found in Freeman v. Belfer, 173 N. C. 581, 92 S. E. 486, L. R. A. 1917E, 886, where the authorities are collected and reviewed.

[5-8] But this unity, or entirety of the estate, may be destroyed or dissolved by the joint acts of the parties, and the estate which was entire turned into a tenancy in common, or into one in severalty; each taking separately a share thereof to be determined by them. The transaction may be of such a nature, and the conveyance so worded, that they will be decreed to hold as tenants in common, and not by the entirety. Eason v. Eason, 159 N. C. 539, 75 S. E. 797; Highsmith v. Page, 158 N. C. 226, 73 S. E. 998; Stalcup v. Stalcup, 137 N. C. 305, 49 S. E. 210; Speas v. Woodhouse, 162 N. C. 66, 77 S. E. 1000; Isley v. Sellers, 153 N. C. 374, 69 S. E. 279. Where it appears that no such estate as that by the entirety was intended, but it was the purpose that they should hold as tenants in common, it will be so adjudged, and, in proper cases, the instrument will be reformed to carry out the intention. Highsmith v. Page, supra. The intention appearing, a conveyance may be made to husband and wife as tenants in common; but otherwise they will take by the entirety, with right of survivorship. Holloway v. Green, 167 N. C. 91, 83 S. E. 243. A divorce a vinculo, as it destroys the unity, will convert the estate by entirety into one in common. McKinnon v. Caulk, 167 N. C. 411, 83 S. E. 559, L. R. A. 1915C, 396.

[9] In this case it appears from the verdict of the jury that the parties had agreed to sever the unity existing between them as to the estate in this land when it was sold, and in pursuance of that understanding $6,000 of the fund, or one half thereof, was deposited in a bank for the plaintiff, and in her name, and the other half in the defendant bank, also in her name, but really for the secret benefit of her husband, so that he could hold off the defendant, as his creditor, and hinder the recovery of its claim; he being then in failing and embarrassed circumstances. There was ample evidence of this fact so found by the jury, for the husband checked upon the deposit and treated it as his own with the knowledge and consent of his wife, and while the cashier, Mr. C. S. Carr, was trying to effect a settlement or adjustment of Moore's account with the defendant bank, Mr. Moore, after manifesting some indifference, finally turned to him and said:

"All my property stands in my wife's name, and the bank will have to whistle for its money."

His indebtedness at that time was $2,000, with interest. The jury have found that the debt is $1,748, that the property purchased from T. E. Hooker was not paid for with the individual funds of Mrs. Moore, that Mr. Moore was the actual owner of the fund deposited in the defendant bank, and that the deposit was made in the name of Mrs. Moore with the fraudulent purpose of preventing the defendant from recovering upon the note held by it against Mr. Moore. If there was evidence to support this verdict, and there is no error in the charge of the court, or elsewhere in the case, we do not see why the defendant is not entitled to the judgment now being reviewed.

We will now consider briefly if there was any error in the charge or the rulings of the court at the trial. The charge was as clear-cut and as free from any error as it could possibly be, and the jury have found, evidently, when we read the verdict in the light of the evidence and the charge, as we should do, that the parties contributed equally to the purchase of the Hooker property, and that they agreed to divide the proceeds of its sale equally between them; the fund deposited with the defendant being Mr. Moore's half, though not credited on the books of the bank in his name. This was a transaction between husband and wife and a third person, the defendant, who was a creditor of the insolvent husband. There is evidence of facts and circumstances, which give rise to a grave suspicion of fraud, if they were established, and the jury have found upon them that there was an actual intent to defraud the defendant, and there is, therefore, nothing left in the case, that we can see, to defeat the defendant's recovery.

[10-12] On the motion of the defendant, we have excluded exceptions Nos. 13 to 27, both inclusive, because the alleged errors are not properly assigned under the rule of this court. There is no real merit in the remaining assignments. The documentary evidence was plainly competent. As to how the husband intended to hold the property was immaterial, as the deed spoke for itself, and there was no equity for reformation set up. The business transactions of Hall & Moore were irrelevant to the inquiry, as also was the question whether Hall had assumed this debt, without the assent of defendant. This did not discharge W. M. Moore as debtor. Nor did Moore's reason for not paying the note have any proper bearing upon the case. He did not pay, but still owed it to the bank. This was enough, and was embraced by the issues, and it was equally immaterial whether Moore had disposed of his interest in the firm of Hall & Moore. We do not understand how any of these matters, if found for the plaintiffs, could affect the result. The excluded assignments relate to the charge of the court. Although they have been put out of the case, we have carefully examined them, in connection with the instructions of the court, and discover no real merit, or ground for reversal, in any of them. Whether the money was deposited with the banks, half of it in each of them, for their accommodation, or was put there under a false designation of the depositor to defraud the defendant, as Mr. Moore's creditor, was for the jury to decide upon the evidence. The vital and pivotal question was, besides the one just stated, whether the plaintiff agreed, either expressly or by inference from their acts and conduct, that any estate by the entirety, theretofore existing, should be changed into an estate in severalty, one-half of the purchase money paid for the Hooker lot to be the property of each of them, was also a question for the jury. They were not to have one-half of each deposit, but one was to have the whole deposit in the National Bank of Greenville, and the other, Mr. Moore, the whole deposit in the defendant bank. This is what the jury have found to be the fact, upon sufficient evidence, as we think. The last question, whether the defendant may set off the debt due to it by Mr. Moore against his deposit, was decided by the court when the case was here before (173 N. C. 180, 91 S. E. 793), and it was further said that, if in the strictness of law this cannot be done, the defense here pleaded will be treated as a bill, or action, in the nature of an equitable fi. fa., as the property is not available to creditors by the ordinary legal process. Numerous authorities are cited in defendant's brief to sustain the right to set-off in such a case. As the question is an important one, we will cite a few of them: Hodgin v. Bank, 124 N. C. 541, 32 S. E. 887, reversed on rehearing, but on a point not material here; Bank v.

Armstrong, 15 N. C. 519; Clark v. Bank, 160 Mass. 26, 35 N. E. 108; Coates v. Preston, 105 Ill. 470; Bank v. Bank, 48 N. Y. 82, 7 Am. Rep. 314; Garrison v. Trust Co., 139 Mich. 392, 102 N. W. 978, 70 L. R. A. 615, 111 Am. St. Rep. 407, 5 Ann. Cas. 813; Knapp v. Cowell, 77 Iowa, 528, 42 N. W. 434; Reynes v. Dumont, 130 U. S. 354, 9 Sup. Ct. 486, 32 L. Ed. 934; Gibbons v. Bank, 84 N. Y. 145.

After a careful review of the entire record, we have not been able to discover that any error was committed by the court at the second trial.

No error.

CLARK, C. J., concurs in all that is so clearly and convincingly stated in the opinion of WALKER, J., and for the additional reason that when the land was converted into money the estate by entireties ceased, for in England, whence was derived this anomalous estate, there was never any estate by entireties in personality. Gooch v. Bank, 176 N. C. 216, 97 S. E. 53. The estate by entireties was not created by statute, either in England or in this state, but was a judicial creation in England, and we adopted it only to the extent that it obtained there. Gaston, J., in Motley v. Whitmore, 19 N. C. 537, says:

"When lands are conveyed to husband and wife, they have not a joint estate, but they hold by entireties. Being in law but one person, they have each the whole estate as one person; and on the death of either of them, the whole estate continues in the survivor."

This was quoted by Hoke, J., in McKinnon v. Caulk, 167 N. C. 412, 83 S. E. 559, L. R. A. 1915C, 396. It was also recognized that entireties did not apply to personality in Hairston v. Glenn, 120 N. C. 341, 27 S. E. 32, where money was deposited in bank in the joint names of husband and wife, and a joint certificate made out for the amount, which was delivered to the husband, but on his death the wife was held entitled to recover one-half of it. While the point was not expressly raised, it is clear that the counsel in that case and the court were aware that there was no estate by entireties in personality.

There was this very good reason for this distinction, for in England, until about 1880, all personality of the wife, whether acquired before or after marriage, became the absolute property of the husband, and there was no occasion for any estate by entireties; and such was the case in this state until the Constitution of 1868, which allowed a wife to retain her property, whether acquired before or after marriage.

As to realty, in England (as in this state till 1868) the realty of the wife became the property of the husband during his lifetime, and therefore for feudal reasons at her death, if he were the longer liver, it went absolutely to him, instead of to her heirs, as the land was burdened with the duty of furnishing a soldier for 40 days each year, if called for in the wars, for there was no standing army. If, however, the wife were the longer liver, it went to her absolutely instead of to his heirs who might be minors. This is the origin of the "antiquated absurdity" of this estate, as Justice WALKER appropriately styles it, but for which there was a good reason as to realty when it was created.

Even as to estates in entireties in realty, they have been abolished in England by the Married Woman's Act of 1882. Thornley v. Thornley, [1893] 2 Ch. Div. 229. It would logically seem that such estate was abolished here by our statute of 1784 (now Rev. § 1579), which converted all joint estates into tenancies in common, and still more conclusively by our Constitution of 1868, which, like the English Married Women's Act, vested a wife with her property, real or personal.

This court, however, held differently, and, though it has often recommended to the Legislature the abolition of this anomaly, it has not been done.

POLLOCK et al. v. HOUSE & HERMANN.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 9, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CONTRACTS ⇨182(2) — PARTIES ⇨15
—JOINT CONTRACT—RIGHT OF ACTION.

At common law the right of action on a contract made with several persons jointly passes on the death of each to the surviving co-obligees. Therefore an action on such a contract must be brought in the name of the survivor or survivors alone; it being error to join as plaintiff with them the personal representative of a deceased co-obligee.

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⇨228 — JOINT
LEASE—ACTION FOR RENT—PARTIES.

The proper parties plaintiff to an action to recover rent due under a demise of real estate, and unpaid, are the joint lessors, if living, and the survivor or survivors of them, if any have in the meantime died, whether before the institution of the action or while it is pending.

3. TRUSTS ⇨249 — SUCCESSIVE TRUSTEES
—JOINT LEASE—ACTION FOR RENT.

But where at the date of the contract one of the joint lessors was acting in a representative capacity as trustee, and later died, and a new trustee was appointed in his stead, and clothed with all the "rights, powers, duties, and responsibilities" of his predecessor, such substituted trustee possesses legal capacity to sue, and may properly unite as plaintiff with the surviving colessors, not because he was lessor eo nomine, but because he is representative of an estate which was party to the original lease in the name of the former trustee, and which continued in existence, despite the nominal change in the representation.

4. TRUSTS ¶169(1) — SUBSTITUTION OF TRUSTEE—POWERS.

Equity will not suffer a trust to fail because of a vacancy in the trusteeship, however occasioned, whether by death, resignation, or otherwise, but will substitute a trustee to execute the trust, with or without authorization by the instrument creating it, especially where, as in this state, a statute authorizes such substitution.

5. LANDLORD AND TENANT ¶228 — JOINT LEASE—ACTION FOR RENT—PARTIES.

Where one of two owners of real estate dies testate, and by his will devises his moiety thereof to his cotenant as trustee for the use and benefit of the testator's wife, while she lives, and others, during the minority of the youngest cestui que trust, a condition which still remains, and the cotenant in his own right and as such trustee and his wife unite in a demise of the real estate for a term of years to begin at a later date, and the trustee dies before such date, his wife surviving him, she and the trustee substituted in lieu of such deceased trustee may, as survivors, unite in the prosecution of an action to recover of and from the lessee arrearages of rent accruing within the term.

Case Certified from Circuit Court, Ohio County.

Action by Thomas Harvey Pollock and others against House & Hermann. Demurrer to declaration sustained, and question as to correctness of the ruling certified. Judgment reversed, and case remanded.

Frank W. Nesbitt and Russell B. Goodwin, both of Wheeling, for plaintiffs.

LYNCH, J. The defendant, House & Hermann, a corporation, having, for some cause not disclosed, refused to pay rent for the use and enjoyment of real estate, due, according to allegations of the declaration, by the express stipulation of a written contract, plaintiffs brought this action to compel payment, and to their declaration defendant demurred assigning as the only ground of objection misjoinder of plaintiffs. Deeming the challenge sufficient, the circuit court sustained the demurrer and certified the case here, to test the correctness of the ruling.

The plaintiffs are Thomas Harvey Pollock and Julius Pollock, Jr., trustees under and executors of the will of Julius Pollock, deceased, Mary A. Pollock, widow of the deceased, Julius, and C. H. Merkel, trustee appointed by the circuit court of Ohio county in lieu of Julius Pollock, deceased, to execute the trust created by the will of Mortimer Pollock, each of which wills was duly probated and admitted to record, and the persons named as executors therein properly qualified to administer the estates thereby committed to them and to execute the trusts thereby imposed in them.

Mortimer Pollock and Julius Pollock, according to the allegations of the declaration, jointly owned certain real estate located in the city of Wheeling. Mortimer Pollock died testate early in February, 1904. Surviving him were a widow, a daughter, and grandchildren, and by his will he devised his moiety interest in the real estate to Julius Pollock, in trust during the life of the widow of Mortimer Pollock and the life of his daughter, and until the youngest grandchild shall attain the age of 21 years. Such grandchild still remains a minor. He also appointed Julius Pollock to execute the will.

Julius Pollock, as such representative of Mortimer and in his own right, and Mary A. Pollock, his wife, parties of the first part, demised the real estate to defendant for a term of 5 years from and after the 1st day of April, 1915, in consideration of the payment to the lessors of $50,000, payable in equal quarterly installments, or $2,500 for each succeeding quarter of the term. Defendant entered upon, used, and occupied the premises as contemplated by the parties to the contract, and for each quarter faithfully performed the covenant respecting the payment of rentals until March 31, 1918; and to recover for the default as of that date, and for a like default as of June 30 of the same year, plaintiffs brought this action.

Before the date fixed for the beginning of the term, Julius Pollock died testate, leaving surviving him Mary A. Pollock, his wife, and devised his moiety in the demised property to the plaintiffs Thomas Harvey Pollock and Julius Pollock, Jr., whom he also appointed executors of the will, in trust for the benefit of his wife and heirs during her life. And on January 30, 1915, the circuit court substituted the plaintiff C. H. Merkel trustee in lieu of Julius Pollock to administer the trust created by the will of Mortimer Pollock, deceased. Apparently this substitution stands upon the authority of section 5, c. 132 (sec. 4939), Code, which also clothes the substituted trustee with all the "rights, powers, duties and responsibilities of the trustee named in said deed" creating the trust.

[4] The will of the decedent doubtless answers the description of the instrument embodied in the statute and falls within the scope of its provisions to the same extent as if it was a deed. But, whether this construction is a fair deduction from the language used or not, equity will not permit a trust to fail for want of a trustee, and in the absence of a provision in the creative instrument, whatever its character may be, a court of equity will substitute another trustee in his stead whenever necessary to carry into full fruition the purpose intended by the donor. Whelan v. Reilly, 3 W. Va. 597. So that, if a will appoints a trustee for infants and he dies, equity will substitute another in his stead, even without authorization by the will itself. Dunscumb v. Dunscumb (Va.) 2 Hen. & M. 11.

In ruling upon the sufficiency of the declaration charged to be defective for the cause urged against it, the court found Mary A. Pollock, the widow of Julius, the only plaintiff capable or competent to prosecute the action, because she was the sole surviving lessor when the action was instituted. The order entered embodying the result of the opinion made no disposition of the case other than that indicated by the ruling. The order has no finality rendering it appealable, but it is certifiable to this court pursuant to the provisions of section 1, c. 135 (sec. 4981), Code.

[1, 2] In restricting the right to prosecute the action to one of the plaintiffs only, the court, we think, erred, doubtless inadvertently. Mrs. Pollock, it is true, is the only person, joining in the execution of the lease who survives her colessors. But Julius Pollock also joined therein as lessor, both in his own right as owner of a moiety in the real estate demised, and as trustee holding in trust the legal title of the other moiety for the use and benefit of the cestuis que trust by virtue of the will of Mortimer Pollock. The death of Julius Pollock after the date of the lease and before the breach thereof did not effect a discontinuance of the trust relation or cause its temporary suspension. It remained existent and intact, pending the substitution of another trustee in his stead. There was no disturbance in the continuity of the duties and responsibilities imposed by the testator's will. Merkel, as trustee by virtue of the appointment, was clothed with all the powers inhering in Julius Pollock as regards the real estate under the original appointment by the testator. He took up the duties of the trust unperformed at the death of his predecessor, and his appointment antedated defendant's breach of the rental contract. Why was he not fully competent to join with Mary A. Pollock as coplaintiff? The mere fact that his name nowhere appears in the lease as one of the contracting parties is not decisive. The estate committed to Julius Pollock in trust did not cease to exist upon his death. Though Merkel was not then authorized to act in his stead, his appointment as successor and the duties and responsibilities of the office reverted to that date. Though not so eo nomine, Merkel thus became at that date and remained as much a party to the demise as was Julius, so far as concerned the preservation of the rights of the cestuis que trust. Merkel was not named executor of Mortimer Pollock's will, but was vested with the legal title of the testator's moiety in the demised premises, and charged with the duty of administering the trust for the personal benefit of those entitled to take benefaction of the testator. The change or difference in the names of the persons vested with such title did not affect the qualification of Merkel to join in the prosecution of the action to recover rent becoming due after his appointment, or render him incapable to join as coplaintiff. The trust estate was by the undisturbed representation a party to the contract by virtue of which the rent was due and payable. It survived the death of the trustee named in Mortimer Pollock's will to the same extent and with like effect as did the right of Mary A. Pollock to join in the action. Both were parties to the lease in a justifiable sense, one no more or less than the other, and for that reason both are competent to join in an action to recover for any breach of the lease contract. Such joinder does not fall within the rule forbidding the uniting in a declaration in the same action a representative of a decedent's personal estate and a surviving co-obligee. Merkel had nothing whatsoever to do with the personal estate of the testator. That was not committed to him. He had no duty to perform as regards it. He was trustee of the moiety of the leased premises, and as such held the legal title to such property.

Mary A. Pollock had the legal capacity to sue as one of the lessors, and it was necessary to join her as plaintiff under the holding in Sandusky v. Oil Co., 63 W. Va. 260, 59 S. E. 1082. Merkel possessed the legal capacity to sue, not because he was lessor eo nomine, but because he was the representative of an estate which was party to the original lease by representation, and which continued in existence despite the change in representative. While Mrs. Pollock was one of the beneficiaries of the trust created by the will of Julius Pollock, that fact did not give her a remedial interest in the cause of action. It is immaterial whether Merkel had a direct pecuniary interest in maintaining the action, for a court will not stop to inquire whether he has sued in his own behalf or as trustee for some other person. It suffices if he has the legal right to sue, and as representative of a continuing estate which was a party to the original lease he had such right. The case of Nichols v. Campbell (Va.) 10 Grat. 560, is not inconsistent with this ruling, for in that case there were two trustees representing the same interest, and upon the death of one the action survived to the other. The surviving trustee represented the trust estate, thus bringing it before the court.

[3, 5] What, then, is the legal status of the other plaintiffs, the executors and trustees of the estate of Julius Pollock—what their rights as to the prosecution of this action? Are they controlled by the common-law rule that the right of action on a contract made with several persons jointly passes on the death of each to the survivors, and on the death of the last to his representatives, and that, therefore, the action must be brought in the name of the survivor or survivors alone; it being error to join as plaintiff with surviving co-obligees the personal representative of a deceased co-obligee? Dickey on Parties, rule 16, p. 149; Rowe v. Shenandoah Pulp Co., 42 W. Va. 551, 28 S. E. 320, 57 Am. St. Rep. 870; Henning v. Farnsworth, 41 W. Va. 548, 23 S. E. 663; 18 Cyc. 960. Casually considered, these questions might be answered agreeably with principles already stated in regard to the trusteeship provided for by the will of Mortimer Pollock. But there is this material and significant difference between the situation of the parties. At the date of the execution of the lease Julius Pollock was living and joined as a party to the contract. The devise of his moiety in trust had not then become effective. It originated only upon his death. Theretofore it did not possess legal vitality. His death was essential to its existence, and since both occurred after the date of the contract the common-law rule obtained, and authorized none other than the survivors to sue for the breach of the contract.

Though extremely technical, the rule as to survivorship as applied to cases of this kind is so thoroughly embedded in the procedural laws of the Virginias as not to warrant departure therefrom. Henning v. Farnsworth, supra; Rowe v. Shenandoah Pulp Co., supra. While the beneficiaries of the wills of the Pollocks are entitled to the money sued for, if any is recovered by the plaintiffs or any of them in this or any similar action, not all of them are capable of suing. Those only can maintain the action who were actual or virtual parties to the lease. The beneficiaries own the fund, but only part of them can enforce payment. That right devolves upon the surviving lessors as we have ascertained them to be.

That the rule was nullified and abrogated by section 19, c. 85 (sec. 4006), Code, is the contention of plaintiffs' counsel. But in that view we do not concur. The statute cited is simply declaratory of the common-law rule respecting the right of a personal representative to prosecute an action for the benefit of the estate committed to him for administration and his liability in certain cases to respond in damages for a breach by decedent of a contract occurring in his lifetime. Knotts v. McGregor, 47 W. Va. 566, 570, 35 S. E. 899. Before as well as after its enactment an administrator or executor could sue or be sued upon any judgment against his decedent and for the breach of certain contracts in the making of which the decedent participated as covenantor or covenantee. In other words, the statute effected no alteration of the right to sue or be sued on such contracts. It did not widen or narrow the scope of the common-law rule upon that subject.

Plaintiffs also ask us to sanction the argument advanced by them to the effect that all the plaintiffs rightly were joined in the action because of the exception to rule 16, Dickey on Parties, and cases cited thereunder. The first paragraph of the rule states the common-law doctrine as to the sole right of the surviving covenantee to sue on a contract. The second paragraph, by way of exception to the rule so stated, says:

"If there is a joint demise by A. and B., who are tenants in common, and a covenant therein with them, e. g., to repair, an action for the breach of such a covenant must, on the death of B., be brought, not by A., but by A. and M., the representative of B."—citing Foley v. Adendenbrooke, 7 Q. B. 197, 114 Eng. Rep. 872; Thompson v. Hakewill, 19 C. B. N. S. 713, 144 Eng. Rep. 966.

The cases cited by the author, as analyzed by the learned circuit judge, do not sustain the text. The question here involved seems not to have been raised or decided in the Foley Case. As showing the inapplicability of the second citation to the situation confronting us, we merely quote from the opinion this language:

"We, however, are now called on to decide that the benefit of such a covenant, contained in a joint demise originally made by tenants in common, not only may, but must, run with the entire reversion; in other words, that tenants in common so situated not only may, but must, join as plaintiffs in an action of covenant."

Of course, all parties to a joint contract, whatever its character may be, if living, must join as plaintiffs or be joined as defendants, as the case may require. To this general rule some exceptions exist, it is true; but no such exception appears here. Indeed, Dickey himself recognizes the exception which he has stated to his general rule as "only an apparent one."

As the proper disposition of the case resulting from the action upon the demurrer remains undisclosed by the record, this court declines to say what it legitimately may be, namely, whether the language of section 12, c. 125 (sec. 4766) Code, is sufficiently broad to warrant permission to amend the declaration by striking out the plaintiffs improperly joined, or whether it is necessary to dismiss the action without prejudice and institute another, joining in the declaration only the two persons adjudged herein to have the requisite capacity to maintain the action. These procedural questions are to be determined by the circuit court in the first instance, to authorize an expression of opinion thereon here.

Deeming the ruling of the court erroneous to the extent it fails to recognize the right of another plaintiff to prosecute the action, we reverse the judgment and require the case to be remanded for further proceedings, as the parties thereto may elect or the circuit court determine.

BROWN v. SMITH.(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 9, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. MECHANICS' LIENS §122—WHEN NOTICE OF LIEN SUFFICIENT.

In the notice given to the owner by a workman, who has performed work on a building at the instance of the contractor, as required by clause "g," section 3, chapter 75 (sec. 3851b), Code Supp. 1918, the omission of the word "dollars" in the statement of the amount which he claims to be due and for which he claims a lien is not material, when the amount is also stated in figures properly punctuated and preceded by the dollar mark.

2. MECHANICS' LIENS §157(1)—THAT NOTICE OF LIEN CONTAINS UNNECESSARY MATTER DOES NOT VITIATE IT.

Such notice, properly verified and recorded, is a sufficient compliance with the statute requiring notice of his lien to be recorded if it contains, in substance, all the matters required by clause "b," section 3, of said chapter. The fact that it contains also the itemized account, not required in the recorded notice, does not vitiate it.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR §194(6)—EQUITY §231—WHERE QUESTIONS ON DEMURRER ARE CERTIFIED, POINTS NOT RAISED ARE REVIEWED.

A demurrer to a bill raises the question of its sufficiency for any reason apparent on its face, and where the demurrant states his grounds therefor, omitting to mention a material defect, and the court overrules the demurrer and certifies the questions decided by it for the decision of this court, this court will consider and pass upon the sufficiency of the bill, regardless of whether or not some particular point rendering it defective was decided by the lower court.

*(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)4. MECHANICS' LIENS §263(9)—PRINCIPAL CONTRACTOR NECESSARY PARTY IN SUIT TO ENFORCE.

On bill to enforce a mechanic's lien against defendant's property, based on work performed at the instance of the principal contractor, plaintiff's failure to make such contractor a party to the bill was fatal, and made the bill subject to demurrer.

Case Certified from Circuit Court, Wood County.

Bill by O. M. Brown against W. H. Smith to enforce a mechanic's lien. Demurrer overruled, and questions certified by the circuit court. Decree reversed, with direction that decision be certified back to circuit court.

John W. Martin, of Parkersburg, for plaintiff.

Levin Smith, of Parkersburg, for defendant.

WILLIAMS, J. Plaintiff filed his bill to enforce a mechanic's lien against certain property of defendant, and the bill was demurred to on the following grounds: First, because the lien set up does not show that plaintiff is entitled to a lien for the amount of money claimed by him, the notice given and exhibited with the bill omitting the word "dollars" in the statement of the amount claimed as a lien; and, second, because the recorded notice of lien is not according to the form prescribed by the mechanic's lien statute. The court overruled the demurrer, and, under the provisions of section 1, chapter 135 (sec. 4981), Code Supp. 1918, certified these questions to this court for its decision.

[1,2] Neither point stated in the demurrer is well taken. The bill alleges that plaintiff performed labor for one J. K. Atkinson, who had contracted with defendant to erect a building on defendant's lot situated on the corner of Columbia and Smithfield streets in the city of Parkersburg, and exhibited with his bill the notice which he alleges he gave the owner, pursuant to the provisions of the mechanic's lien statute. That notice contains an itemized account showing the dates and number of hours each day that he performed labor on said building and the wage per day, aggregating the sum which he claims as a lien. He also alleges that he caused a notice of said lien to be recorded in the office of the clerk of the county court of Wood county, within the time prescribed by the mechanic's lien law.

A duplicate of the notice served upon defendant was apparently the notice recorded in the clerk's office, and it is claimed by defendant's counsel that the statute provides for the recordation of a different notice from the one served upon the owner. Clause "b," section 3, chapter 75 (sec. 3851b), prescribes the form of notice of lien and verification thereof to be recorded. The notice in this case is almost in the very language of the form prescribed, the only difference being that it contains the itemized account, which the recorded notice need not contain. It is, in substantial effect, a compliance with the statute, and that is all that is necessary. The matter contained in it, not required to be stated, may be treated as surplusage. It states the amount for which a lien is claimed to be $234.20, and that it has not been paid. It describes the property on which the lien is claimed as a "certain building on the real estate owned by [defendant] situated in the city of Parkersburg, county of Wood, West Virginia, on the corner of Columbia and Smithfield streets, and being what is known as lot No. 48 of J. M. Jackson, Jr., addition to the city of Parkersburg, as shown in the plat book thereof recorded in the county clerk's office of the said Wood county in Plat Book 42, page 27, the said lot fronting 46 feet more or less on Smithfield street and running back along Columbia street of equal width about eighty (80) feet, and being a part of the same real estate conveyed to [defendant] by I. M. Adams, Jr., by deed bearing date on the 13th of March, 1917, and of record in the said clerk's office of Wood county in Deed Book 167, page 625," and is verified in the manner and form required by statute. It was not necessary that the notice should have contained any further description of the building on which the labor was performed, as plaintiff's lien covered the defendant's interest in the entire lot, 46x80 feet, on which the building stands, by virtue of clause "f," section 2, chapter 75 (sec. 3851a), Code Supp. 1918.

[3, 4] But there appears on the face of the bill a fatal defect to which the court's attention was evidently not directed, and we are of the opinion that section 1, chapter 135, Code Supp. 1918, authorizing questions relating to the sufficiency of a summons or return thereof, or of the pleadings to be certified to this court for its decision, being designed by the Legislature to enable litigants to have all questions relating thereto settled and determined before a trial or hearing of the cause upon its merits, is entitled to a liberal construction, being a remedial statute, and authorizes this court to consider all questions affecting the sufficiency of the pleadings, even though they were not called to the attention of the lower court and were not specifically certified. The demurrer reaches any defect appearing on the face of the bill although the ground assigned fails to mention it, and the certificate brings up the question of the sufficiency of the bill. The plaintiff failed to make the principal contractor, J. K. Atkinson, a party to his bill, and this is the defect to which we refer. Such omission, we held in Aughr v. Warder, 74 W. Va. 103, 81 S. E. 708, and Gist v. Virginian Railway Co., 79 W. Va. 167, 90 S. E. 554, to be fatal. For this reason the demurrer should have been sustained, and plaintiff allowed to amend.

We therefore reverse the decree of the lower court, and direct our decision to be certified back to the circuit court of Wood county.

WILLIAMS v. SCHEHL

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 16, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SERVANT'S KNOWLEDGE OF DEFECTS IN MACHINE—DECLARATION.

The declaration in this case is not bad on demurrer for omitting to aver knowledge of the defendant of the alleged defective character of the machine doing the injuries complained of. Such knowledge is sufficiently alleged.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT §221(5), 261(4)—DECLARATION NOT DEFECTIVE AS CONFESSING CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

Nor do the circumstances of the injuries complained of and averred in the declaration sufficiently negative the ignorance of the plaintiff averred, so as to render the declaration bad as confessing contributory negligence and defeating recovery in such common-law action. But in so far as right of recovery is based on the failure of defendant to provide plaintiff with an instrument to enable him safely to operate the machine, the declaration is defective in failing to also allege plaintiff's reliance on such promise for a reasonable time thereafter.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT §258(12)—WHEN DECLARATION SUFFICIENT IN COMMON-LAW ACTION FOR INJURIES.

Though not good as a declaration for injuries sustained on the theory that defendant's business was controlled by the Workmen's Compensation Law and his failure to comply therewith depriving him of his common-law defenses, the declaration is good in a common-law action for alleged injuries sustained by plaintiff, his employee, for defective machinery furnished by defendant.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT §361—WHEN GROCER SELLING MEAT NOT RUNNING SLAUGHTER AND PACKING HOUSE.

The business of a retail grocer who also butchers cattle, sheep and hogs at a slaughter house operated in another place, for sale to his retail customers, and who at his grocery store cuts the meat, makes sausage and renders lard from such animals, for sale in a small way, is not engaged in the business of operating a slaughter and packing house within the meaning of schedule "n" of section 18 of the Workmen's Compensation Law of this state.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Packing House; Slaughterhouse.]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT §361—WHEN RETAIL DEALER RETAINS COMMON-LAW DEFENSES UNDER WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION LAW.

Nor does schedule "x" of said section, nor the general provisions of section 9 of said law, require one conducting such a retail business voluntarily to apply to the Compensation Commissioner to come under said law, or subject him to the penalty of losing his common-law defenses when sued by an employee for injuries sustained due to his alleged negligence in failing to use due care to provide reasonably safe machines and implements or a reasonably safe place for his servants to work.

6. ERRONEOUS INSTRUCTIONS IGNORING DEFENSE OF CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Instructions to the jury given at the instance of plaintiff, based on the theory of negligence on the part of defendant, and erroneously assuming that his business was under the Workmen's Compensation Law and his failure to comply therewith and ignoring his theory of contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff, should have been rejected.

7. TRIAL ¶191(1), 252(2)—INSTRUCTION ASSUMING CONTROVERTED FACT PROVEN ERRONEOUS.

An instruction to the jury which assumes as proven a fact controverted by the evidence or as to which there is, little if any appreciable evidence, is properly refused.

8. TRIAL ¶203(3) — CORRECT INSTRUCTION SUPPORTED BY SOME EVIDENCE IMPROPERLY REFUSED.

An instruction stating a correct legal principle applicable to the theory of the proponent, supported by some appreciable evidence, not binding, should be given to the jury.

Error to Circuit Court, Brooke County.

Action by Earl C. Williams against John A. Schehl. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed, verdict set aside, and defendant awarded a new trial.

Ramsey & Wilkin; T. S. Riley, of Wheeling, for plaintiff in error.

Erskine, Palmer & Curl, of Wheeling, for defendant in error.

MILLER, P. The action is ex delicto for the loss of plaintiff's hand, due to the alleged negligence of defendant in furnishing him a defective meat grinder and his failure to furnish him a feeder paddle or other implement necessary safely to operate said machine in the course of his employment.

From the verdict and judgment for plaintiff for one thousand dollars the defendant by writ of error has brought the case here for review.

[1, 2] First, it is complained that the demurrer to the declaration and each of the two counts thereof should have been sustained. We do not find the declaration defective in the first particular pointed out, namely, failure to aver knowledge on the part of defendant of the alleged defective condition of the meat grinder. If necessary to so aver, both counts do charge such knowledge on the part of the defendant.

Secondly, it is argued that if defective, the circumstances of the injury show that plaintiff had as much knowledge of the machine as defendant and with such knowledge continued to operate it, and thereby contributed to his own injury and excused the defendant. But if, as substantially averred, the defendant's business and the plaintiff's employment fall under the operation of the Workmen's Compensation Law (Code Supp. 1918, c. 15P, §§ 1-55 (secs. 657-711), and defendant failed to comply therewith, contributory negligence constituted no defense to the action. However, the declaration avers as to the feeder paddle that plaintiff was in fact ignorant of the defect alleged until he requested defendant to provide him with such implement, which he failed and neglected to do. If plaintiff as alleged was ignorant of the defects in the machine, of course he could not be chargeable with contributing to his injuries by continuing to work it. We do not think the circumstances averred sufficiently negative his averment of ignorance, as urged by counsel. But as to the feeder paddle the declaration does show knowledge on the part of plaintiff of the alleged need of such an instrument, for he avers that he requested defendant to furnish him with such a paddle, and his promise and failure to do so. But should he not have also averred his reliance on such promise and his belief that defendant would in a reasonable time comply therewith? We are persuaded on authority that such averment should have been made, if plaintiff relied on such negligence as a basis of recovery. Parfitt v. Veneer & Basket Co., 68 W. Va. 438, 449, 450, 69 S. E. 985; Ashley v. Tri-State Lumber Co., 79 W. Va. 726, 91 S. E. 813. If, as these cases hold, a servant continues in the services of his employer after knowledge of the defect in the machinery he is employed to operate he will be presumed to have assumed the risks, when injured thereby. It does not clearly appear whether the verdict and judgment were predicated on the alleged negligence to furnish a safe meat grinder or the omission to furnish a feeder paddle. If under the evidence the pleadings were sufficient, they might be sustained on either theory.

[3] Lastly, it is urged that the demurrer should have been sustained because the business of defendant without his election to come under it, not averred but negatived, does not bring him involuntarily under the Workmen's Compensation Law. Both counts aver that the business of the defendant in which plaintiff was employed to assist him was that of a butcher, and in which he made use of divers pieces of machinery; namely, boilers, engines, motors, pulleys, grinding machines and divers other implements, tools and devices for preparing meats so butchered by him for the market, and more particularly for the grinding of said meat in order to make the same into sausage. But whether the defendant's business so described in the declaration falls within the purview of the Workmen's Compensation Law or not, we think on demurrer it would be good as averring a good common-law action for negligence of the defendant to use due care to furnish plaintiff a safe place to work, a good machine to work with, and to keep it in good repair, and that the demurrer was therefore properly overruled. We should for this purpose treat the averments regarding the Workmen's Compensation Law and defendant's alleged negligence in failing to comply therewith as surplusage.

The remaining points relied on involve the giving and refusing of instructions to the jury, and the action of the court on the motion of the defendant for a new trial. All six of the instructions requested by plaintiff were given as offered. Of the four requested by defendant, the first and second were given; 3 and 4 were refused. Defendant complains of plaintiff's instructions 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6, and of the action of the court in refusing his instructions 3 and 4.

[4] Instructions 2, 3 and 4, given for plaintiff all assume that the business of the defendant and his liability to plaintiff were governed by Workmen's Compensation Law and his omission to comply therewith by electing to pay the premiums required thereby, and that he was thereby deprived of his common-law defenses, and particularly that of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff. This theory of these instructions, in the light of the averments of the declaration and the facts disclosed by the evidence as to the nature of the defendant's business, constitutes the chief objection of the defendant thereto. As already observed, the declaration avers that the business of defendant was that of a butcher. The plaintiff himself swears that the business of defendant was that of a general store, "that he had a little of everything—meats and groceries, and flour, and everything." And in describing his employment he says:

"I got up in the morning, and done my work up at the slaughter house, worked about half an hour; then I came in to the store, and went out and solicited orders, and worked around the store, and then in the afternoon they sent me down in the basement to grind meats, and cook meats, and that is when I got my hand taken off."

Defendant says his business was that of "meats and groceries," and that the duties of plaintiff were "delivering and taking orders in the forenoon, and in the afternoon taking care of the meat end, such as making sausage, or whatever we were doing; in the store he clerked—received and charged—had full sway, the same as I have or any of the balance of the help." And in describing the circumstances of the accident he says, "He was rendering lard and making this sausage; it was not a large amount—only a small amount—probably fifty pounds;" that to make fifty pounds of sausage on the style of machine used would take probably not more than twenty minutes, even when grinding it a second time.

The question is thus presented, whether the business of "butcher" as alleged in the declaration, or that of a general store in which his business was that of selling meats and groceries at retail with the incidental business of making sausage and rendering lard in the small way described in the evidence, brought the defendant under the involuntary requirements of the statute so as to render him liable to the plaintiff and the penalties imposed thereby, and the loss of his common-law defenses as assumed in these instructions. The contention of plaintiff is that the business of defendant brought him within sub-section "n" of section 18 of the act (sec. 874), classifying the industries subject to the act; and if not under that section, then it was comprehended within the provisions of sub-section "x," providing that:

"Any industry or business not specified in the foregoing schedules, for which any employer shall voluntarily apply to the commissioner to be brought under the provisions of this act; and the commissioner shall have the authority to classify and place in one of the schedules aforesaid, or any schedule created by him as herein-after mentioned, any industry or business subject to this act not hereinbefore specifically mentioned."

And if not comprehended thereby, the further contention is that it is covered by section 9 (sec. 665) of said act, providing that:

"All persons, firms, associations and corporations regularly employing other persons for profit, or for the purpose of carrying on any form of industry or business in this state (casual employment excepted)," etc., and not falling within the business of employers "in domestic and agricultural service," specifically excepted by the act.

The first inquiry then is, does the business of butcher alleged, or that of selling meats and groceries in a small retail store, such as the evidence discloses in this case, though the meats sold are in whole or in part of animals slaughtered by such retail merchant, fall within schedule "n" of section 18, namely, "slaughter and packing houses, stock yards, soap, tallow, lard and grease manufactories, tanneries, * * * in which power driven machinery is used"? In our opinion such a business does not come within the provisions of this section. If so, then every little merchant who happens to butcher a few animals whose meat he cuts and retails to his customers in a grocery store, of which there are many, would be brought under the act. Perhaps, as counsel argue, the size of the business ought not to be regarded as controlling in the construction of the statute. A statute like this in derogation of the common law, and imposing restrictions upon common occupations of the people, should receive a strict construction. Rhodes v. Coal Co., 79 W. Va. 71, 90 S. E. 796, point 3 of the syllabus. Unless therefore the words of the statute strictly construed comprehend the business of defendant, it should by no strained construction be held to include it. The words "slaughter and packing houses" readily suggest a business where animals fit for food are slaughtered and their meats packed and prepared for market in considerable quantities, and in which power driven machinery is employed. Would anyone think for a moment that the Legislature by these words meant to include thereunder the business of a corner grocery where the owner does a retail business in meats and groceries and slaughters a few animals and cuts them up and sells their meat at retail in a small way? We do not think so. Strictly speaking the words "slaughter house" may include any place where animals are killed; there is no pretense that the defendant was engaged in packing meats or other products. The proof is that his manufacture of lard and sausage was for the daily sale thereof to his customers in small quantities. When we examine the various schedules in section 18, we find that they relate generally to the business of mining, manufacturing, railroads, operated or propelled by power driven machinery, telegraph and telephone lines, and construction works of various kinds. In none of them do we find dry goods or grocery stores, banks, fruit stands, jewelry stores, or businesses of like character. Counsel for plaintiff cite us to three cases; one from Georgia, one from Indiana, and the other from Louisiana, in support of their construction of the statute. The question in the Georgia case was whether Kehrer, an agent or representative of Nelson Morris & Co., was subject to the occupational tax imposed by the statute upon agents of packing houses doing business in the state. It was decided that he was. There is no question made that Morris & Company were large packers in the state of Illinois. They maintained a distributing house in Georgia, where they were represented by Kehrer as agent or salesman. It was held that notwithstanding Morris & Co. did not slaughter and pack meats in Georgia but sold them there through Kehrer, they were doing business as packers in Georgia; that selling meats in Georgia manufactured and packed in Illinois was doing the business of packers in Georgia; and that Kehrer was subject to the occupational tax. Stewart v. Kehrer, 115 Ga. 184, 41 S. E. 680. The Indiana case was an indictment for burning a mill, described as a mill-house, and upon a motion to quash, the question was whether mill-house was sufficiently descriptive of the offence prescribed by the statute. It was held that it was. The court said:

"There are slaughter-houses, packing-houses, smoke-houses, etc., indicating houses in which animals are slaughtered, meats packed and smoked, etc. So, a 'mill-house,' we think, would readily be understood to be a building or house used for milling purposes." Ford v. State, 112 Ind. 373, 14 N. E. 241, citing Dugle v. State, 100 Ind. 259.

In the Louisiana case the question was whether the defendant was subject to a license tax for "carrying on the business of a slaughter house" imposed by the statute. The evidence showed that he killed one or two beeves a week, which were raised or pastured on his plantation and sold in his plantation store for which he paid a license as retail merchant and liquor dealer on the public road, and that most of the beeves were purchased originally in New Orleans. The manifest purpose of the statute was revenue, and we think the court rightly held the defendant liable for the tax regardless of the size of his business. Thibaut, Sheriff, v. Hebert, 45 La. Ann. 838, 12 South. 931. But our statute must be construed with reference to the legislative intent as manifested by the entire enactment. In two or more of the schedules of section 18 some businesses are exempted. For example, those specified in schedule "m" are limited to factories in which power driven machinery is used; and schedule "v," which includes structural work on buildings, is limited to those over three stories high.

In further support of their proposition counsel for plaintiff rely on the expression of this court in Louis v. Smith-McCormick Construction Co., 80 W. Va. 159, 92 S. E. 249, and Adkins v. Hope Engineering & Supply Co., 81 W. Va. 449, 94 S. E. 506, respecting the broad and inclusive scope of section 9 (sec. 665) of the act. While in these cases reference is made to the wide scope of this section, the business of the defendant in the first case clearly fell within schedules "v" and "w" of section 18; and in the latter case no question was made as to the fact that defendant's business, that of constructing a gas line, was covered by one of the schedules of said section. The principal question was whether on the facts plaintiff was entitled to recover for personal injuries sustained by his infant son fifteen years of age employed by defendant, and whether said infant was an employee as defined by said section 9. The court said that section makes no distinction as to age limit. What was said by the court in these cases should be construed with reference to the questions involved and so as not to do violence to the legislative intent manifested in the enactment.

[5] But what effect should be given to schedule "x", read in connection with said section 9? Clearly this schedule, which is made to cover "any industry or business not specified in the foregoing schedules, for which any employer shall voluntarily apply to the commissioner to be brought under the provisions of this act," does not bring such omitted industry or business under the act without the voluntary application of the employer. To be brought under the act such employer must apply to the commissioner, who must give him a classification and rate of premium, unless, the commissioner, as he possibly may do under a subsequent provision of the schedule, himself bring such employer under the act by exercising the power thereby conferred. In these provisions the statute clearly recognizes the two classes; namely, first, those brought under the act involuntarily as it were by being named in the several schedules, and required to comply therewith upon pain of being denied their common-law defenses; and second, those submitting themselves voluntarily, and when so doing, all are subject to the act within the meaning of section 9; but the voluntary classes without such submission, or the special act of the commissioner, do not become subject to the act. Nor is such voluntary class of employers denied any of their common-law rights for neglecting voluntary submission to the statute. Analogous to the case presented here, is that of Barnett, Adm'r, v. Coal & Coke Ry. Co., 81 W. Va. 251, 94 S. E. 150, where we held that section 28 (sec. 682) of the statute (Code 1913, c. 15P) did not operate to deprive employers engaged in both intra-state and inter-state businesses, unless and until, from the time they had elected, as they might under section 52 (sec. 708) by the method prescribed, to come under the act. This notwithstanding the broad and comprehensive scope of section 9.

[6] Our conclusion, therefore, is that plaintiff's instructions 2, 3, 4 and 6, ignoring and excluding defendant's theory of contributory negligence, and holding him subject to the Workmen's Compensation Law, were erroneous and should have been rejected.

Plaintiff's instruction No. 5, we think, states the law correctly relative to the liability of the master for failing to comply with his promise to remedy dangerous and defective machinery and to provide a reasonably safe place to work; but as we have already observed, the declaration was defective in not averring reliance of the plaintiff on the defendant's promises and his failure to comply therewith in a reasonable time.

[7] Defendant's instruction No. 3 was, we think, rightly refused. It would have told the jury that if they believed from the evidence plaintiff was a general clerk in defendant's store and performing his duties set forth in the declaration, and as such clerk had access to and right to use the feeders or feeder paddles in said store as are named in the declaration and could have taken and used the same in the performance of his duties, and did not do so at the time of the accident, the jury should find for the defendant. The principal vice of this proposition is that it assumes the fact that there were in the store feeder paddles suitable for such use, or any feeder paddles, facts as to which there was little if any appreciable evidence offered by defendant, and facts which were denied by plaintiff. Whether the defendant was negligent in failing to furnish such an instrument, if one was not provided, or were in the store at the disposal of plaintiff, were questions which might properly have been submitted to the jury by a proper instruction. But the instruction in question was not competent in this respect.

[8] Defendant's instruction No. 4, we think, states a correct legal proposition applicable to his theory of the case. It would have told the jury that if they believed from the evidence that plaintiff knew there was a rapidly revolving screw at the edge of the lower hopper of the sausage grinding machine testified to in the case, and that his hand was likely to come in contact therewith in attempting to push meat down into the hopper, he must be held to have appreciated the danger and assumed the risk in attempting to do the work. Louis v. Smith-McCormick Construction Co., supra; Ashton v. Boston & Maine R. R. Co., 222 Mass. 65, 109 N. E. 820, L. R. A. 1916B, 1281. The objection of the plaintiff and the ruling of the court thereon are that the instruction ignores the plaintiff's theory of a defective machine and failure to provide a suitable instrument to operate it as the cause of the injury. This would be a good objection if the instruction was a binding one telling the jury to find for the defendant; but it does not do so. It states a correct legal proposition on defendant's theory as to the facts, and was proper to go to the jury.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment below must be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the defendant awarded a new trial.

STATE v. LYNCH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 9, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION $\S$ 110(4)—WHEN INDICTMENT IN LANGUAGE OF STATUTE INSUFFICIENT.

If a statute creating an offense does not by its terms define the particular wrongful act, in such manner and to such an extent as to disclose all of its essential elements, an indictment in the language of the statute is not sufficient. It should expand the words of the statute by such specification of the essentials of the offense as will define it with particularity.

2. OBSTRUCTING JUSTICE $\S$ 11—INDICTMENT MUST ALLEGE THREAT AND AGAINST WHOM MADE.

An indictment under section 30 of chapter 147 (sec. 5283) of the Code of 1913, purporting to charge an attempt to intimidate a witness by means of a threat and to obstruct and impede the administration of justice by such means, should disclose the nature of the threat and the person against whom it was made; and omission of such disclosure is a fatal defect therein.

8. OBSTRUCTING JUSTICE §11 — EXACT WORDS OF THREAT NOT NECESSARY IN INDICTMENT.

In such case it suffices to indicate the nature and character of the threat by the use of any appropriate terms, and the exact words in which it was made need not be used.

4. OBSTRUCTING JUSTICE §11—INDICTMENT MUST ALLEGE SCIENTER.

Omission from such an indictment of an averment of scienter on the part of the accused is a fatal defect also.

Case Certified from Circuit Court, Mason County.

V. S. Lynch was indicted for an attempt to intimidate a witness summoned to testify before a grand jury, and by means thereof to obstruct the administration of justice. Motion to quash indictment and a demurrer thereto overruled, and question certified. Demurrer and motion to quash sustained, and decision certified to circuit court.

E. T. England, Atty. Gen., and Chas. Ritchie, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

Pendleton, Mathews & Bell, of Spencer, for defendant.

POFFENBARGER, J. The question certified in this case is whether an indictment charging an attempt to intimidate a witness summoned to give evidence before a grand jury, and, by means of such intimidation, to obstruct and impede the administration of justice in the circuit court of Mason county, is sufficient. A motion of the accused to quash the indictment and his demurrer to it were overruled.

The indictment purports to charge an offense under section 30 of chapter 147 (sec. 5283) of the Code, reading as follows:

"If any person by threats, force, or otherwise, intimidate or impede, or attempt to intimidate or impede any judge, justice of the peace, juror, witness, arbitrator, umpire, or any officer or member of any court in the discharge of his duty as such, or by any means obstruct or impede, or attempt to obstruct or impede the administration of justice in any court, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and unless otherwise provided by law, he shall be fined not less than twenty-five nor more than two hundred dollars, and be imprisoned in the county jail not exceeding six months."

It avers that the accused "did unlawfully attempt to intimidate by means of threats and otherwise" a certain person, "a witness who was then and there duly and legally summoned to appear and give evidence before the grand jury of Mason county, West Virginia, at the June term, 1915, of the circuit court of said Mason county," for the purpose of preventing "said person" from giving evidence before the said grand jury in obedience to said summons, whereby the said V. S. Lynch attempted to obstruct and impede the administration of justice in the said circuit court of said Mason county, West Virginia, by attempting by threats and otherwise to intimidate the said "person," and "prevent his appearance before the said grand jury of the said circuit court to give evidence therein," etc.

Two principal grounds of attack upon the indictment are: (1) Its failure to disclose the nature of the threat or other means of intimidation employed in the alleged attempt; and (2) lack of an averment of knowledge on the part of the accused that the person upon whom the attempt is alleged to have been made was a witness before the grand jury.

[1] Ordinarily, it suffices to charge an offense in the language of the statute creating it. State v. Chafin, 78 W. Va. 140, 88 S. E. 657; State v. Jones, 53 W. Va. 613, 45 S. E. 916; State v. Boggess, 36 W. Va. 713, 15 S. E. 423; State v. Riffe, 10 W. Va. 797. But this rule has its well-defined exceptions. It does not apply, unless the language of the statute embraces all of the essential elements of the offense. Church's Case, 4 W. Va. 745; State v. Boggess, 36 W. Va. 713, 15 S. E. 423.

"Though generally sufficient to charge in an indictment an offense in the words of a statute, yet if this does not sufficiently define the particular wrongful act, and give notice to the defendant of the offense he is required to meet—the particular criminal act in its essentials—the statute words must be expanded by such specification of the essentials as will define the offense with particularity." State v. Mitchell, 47 W. Va. 789, 35 S. E. 845.

To the same effect see Boyd v. Commonwealth, 77 Va. 55; 21 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 672; 22 Cyc. 339-341.

In respect of pleading, there seems to be a well-defined distinction between offenses charged as having been accomplished and those charged as having been attempted. In State v. Schnelle, 24 W. Va. 767, it was held that an indictment alleging the accused did slay, kill, and murder a named person was sufficient to inform him fully and plainly of the character and cause of the accusation; but it would not be sufficient to charge merely that the accused had attempted to slay, kill, and murder a named person. In such case, an overt act constituting the attempt must be averred, and an averment of such an act must necessarily include specification of the means employed in the attempt. Com. v. Clark, 6 Grat. (Va.) 675; State v. Baller, 26 W. Va. 90, 53 Am. Rep. 66. If the indictment had charged intimidation, instead of an attempt to intimidate, the averment might possibly have been held to be one of fact, and to have been sufficiently certain. Com. v. Feely, 2 Va. Cas. 1. As to this, however, we express no opinion. State v. Schnelle, cited, might not sustain it, because the form of indictment used in that case had been prescribed by statute, and the real question was whether the statute was constitutional and valid. Here an indictment for intimidation would be tested by common-law rules and principles.

[2, 3] This indictment purports to charge an overt act, but the charge is made by the use of a generic and indefinite term, viz, "threats." The thing done or words used by the accused, by way of threat are not disclosed. Nor is the person against whom the threat was made indicated. The words used might or might not, if disclosed, amount to a threat, and, if so, the relation of the threatened person or property to the parties concerned might be so remote as to make it apparent that the threat could have had no tendency to intimidate or influence the party alleged to have been affected by it. Without specification of these particulars, an indictment purporting to charge an attempt to intimidate does not disclose essential elements of the offense. In other words, it does not show, otherwise than by way of conclusion, that any offense has been committed. It does not fully and plainly inform the accused of the character and cause of the accusation against him, agreeably to common law and constitutional guaranties, nor afford him adequate protection under the law of former adjudication. This conclusion is well sustained by authority. People v. Jones, 62 Mich. 304, 28 N. W. 839; Robinson v. Com., 101 Mass. 27; People v. Frey, 112 Mich. 251, 70 N. W. 548; 21 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 672.

If it can be said that the indictment purports to charge two offenses, an attempt to intimidate a witness and an attempt to obstruct and impede the administration of justice, and that as to the latter, the rule of pleading should be less strict, in some respects, the requirement of specification of an overt act constituting an attempt could not be dispensed with. No attempt to obstruct or impede, otherwise than by the threat made to the witness, is charged or suggested; and it is just as essential, therefore, that the nature of the threat be disclosed in the one case as in the other.

[4] The omission of an averment of scienter, or knowledge of the status of the parties and intent to intimidate the witness or obstruct and impede the administration of justice, is equally fatal. Though the case of Pettibone v. United States, 148 U. S. 197, 13 Sup. Ct. 542, 37 L. Ed. 419, differs from this in respect of the status of the parties, the character of the offense and other particulars, it applies a general principle of criminal law. It holds that, to be criminal, an obstruction of the course of justice must be intentional and that the indictment must aver that the act of obstruction was done with knowledge and intent to obstruct. The indictment in that case was founded upon a statute similar to the one involved here. For the proposition that, under the federal statute, knowledge and intent are material and essential elements and must be established by proof. United States v. Kee et al. (D. C.) 39 Fed. 603, is direct authority. When these elements are essential, they must be averred as well as proved.

But the threats need not be set out in the exact words in which they were made. 21 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 673. And a general averment of scienter will no doubt suffice.

As the indictment is defective in both respects, however, it should have been quashed in the court below. The demurrer and motion to quash will be sustained, and the decision certified to that court.

STATE ex rel. DODD et al. v. HILL, Banking Com'r.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Sept. 16, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. BANKS AND BANKING §6 — CHARTER — DISCRETION OF COMMISSIONER OF BANKING.

That part of section 78, c. 54 (sec. 3031), Code 1913, as amended in 1919, which provides that "hereafter no charter shall be issued to any bank to do business in this state until the application therefor has been approved in writing by the commissioner of banking," vests in such commissioner discretionary power to approve or reject such application.

2. BANKS AND BANKING §6 — APPLICATION FOR CHARTER — DISCRETION OF COMMISSIONER OF BANKING.

The refusal of the commissioner of banking to approve an application for a charter in a proper exercise of such discretionary power is not subject to judicial review on the ground that a different decision should have been made, unless it clearly appears that he has willfully and arbitrarily disregarded his duty, or that his decision was due to caprice, passion, partiality or corruption.

Mandamus by the State, on the relation of C. I. Dodd and others, against J. S. Hill, Banking Commissioner, etc. Writ denied.

Henry S. Cato and Linn & Byrne, all of Charleston, for relators.

McClintic, Mathews & Campbell, of Charleston, for respondent.

LYNCH, J. Guided by his own construction of section 78, c. 54, Code (sec. 3031), as amended by chapter 21, Acts 1913, prescribing ing his authority as commissioner of banking, J. S. Hill declined to issue a certificate of approval of the application of C. I. Dodd and others for authority to establish a state bank at Elk View, in Elk district, Kanawha county, to be called and known as Elk View Banking Company. To compel the issuance of such certificate, petitioners applied to this court for and obtained an alternative writ requiring him either to comply with the writ forthwith or appear and show cause for not doing so. To the petition respondent appeared and demurred, moved to quash the writ, and filed his return, to which petitioners demurred.

Speaking as of the date at which the amendment of 1913 became effective, the Legislature declared that "hereafter no charter shall be issued to any bank to do business in this state until the application therefor has been approved in writing by the commissioner of banking." It is by virtue of this power that respondent seeks to justify his action in withholding the certificate without which no new state banking institution lawfully may open its doors for the transaction of business in this state.

As to the power of the Legislature to enact a provision of this character there is no question raised, but the existence of the power is conceded, and nothing need be said upon that subject except to remark that while judicial decisions are not entirely in accord, the greater number uphold such or similar enactments as within the scope of the regulatory authority of the Congress and of the Legislatures of the several states.

Respondent's return, petitioners say, is not sufficient to justify the withholding of the commissioner's approval of their preliminary application for the privilege of engaging in the banking business, and that upon such application the only duty he then was required to perform was to determine the formal sufficiency of the papers presented for examination and approval. The language of the statute does not so limit or circumscribe the powers it purports to confer upon the office thus created. Besides, there was no need to regrant such a right to test the legal sufficiency of such preliminary documents, as that right then belonged and still belongs to the office of the secretary of state, and it is there that such a test is made.

Respondent in the return defends his action in part by showing like action by former occupants of the office in similar circumstances, and a virtual ratification or indorsement of the construction given by him and them of the provisions of section 78 in this: That the Legislature of 1919, presumably knowing and consenting to such construction, amended and re-enacted the section in other particulars, but left intact the provision so construed.

[1, 2] But, granting the scope of the power to be as broad as the respondent says it is, petitioners claim that his action, nevertheless, was wholly unjustifiable and arbitrary, and that none of the reasons relied on to justify the rejection of their application were sufficient for that purpose. Before condemning as arbitrary and unreasonable the action of an officer charged with the performance of an important public duty, a court should carefully scrutinize the grounds assigned for so doing. Looking to these we find the only charge to be that the banking commissioner acted adversely upon the application on the day it was presented to him for approval. Promptness in the discharge of a public duty ordinarily is worthy of commendation rather than adverse criticism of the officer. It does not necessarily signify failure to give thoughtful consideration to the matters involved before determining what action a proper discharge of his duty required him to take. Besides, according to his return, he "seriously considered all questions connected with the location of said bank and reached the conclusion that from a banking standpoint a bank was not needed at such place, and would not be able to be of any value to the stockholders, or any real value to the people of that community; that respondent was of opinion that the territory in a commercial sense tributary to said Elk View would be very small and was not sufficient to properly support a bank and enable that bank to pay the heavy expenses connected with the operation thereof and make any returns to the stockholders, and respondent's experience has been that unless a bank can make sufficient money for such purposes it is of no value to the public, and in many instances has been really menaces to the interests of the community.

"Respondent further says that in view of late events in one section of West Virginia it can be better appreciated that there is a grave responsibility resting upon respondent in connection with his duties under the law, and that respondent is advised under the law that one of the methods given to him for the protection of the public is to carefully scrutinize every application made for a charter for a new bank, and to take into consideration everything connected therewith in each individual case, and that this especially includes the location of the bank, the territory contributory thereto, its possibilities and probabilities from a banking standpoint, and that in this case he has given much attention to all these and other questions connected therewith, and in the exercise of his best judgment as a sworn officer of the state of West Virginia he has arrived at the conclusion that this application should not be approved."

If, as we believe and hold, the matters stated are fairly considered within the scope of the authority conferred by the Legislature, and the officer upon whom such authority devolved duly considered them, as he solemnly swears he did before deciding to withhold approval, the writ ought not to issue; for, while this court may by mandamus compel action in good faith by an officer clothed with discretionary power, we will not award the writ for such purpose unless it appears that he has clearly and willfully disregarded his duty, or that his action was flagrantly wrong working unjust results, or that his decision was due to caprice, passion, partiality or corruption. Dillon v. Bare & Carter, 60 W. Va. 483, 56 S. E. 390.

Two recent decisions, one by the Supreme Court of Illinois, in People ex rel. Schweder v. Brady, 268 Ill. 182, 108 N. E. 1009, the other by the Supreme Court of New York, Appellate Division, in In re Lughino & Sons, 176 App. Div. 285, 163 N. Y. Supp. 9, construing provisions regulating banking institutions and conferring authority on specified public officers similar to that dealt with here, support the principle stated in Dillon v. Bare, supra. Speaking of the provision of the New York Banking Law (Consol. Laws, c. 2) which "makes the approval of the superintendent a condition precedent to the doing of any act," the court held that it lay within his sound discretion to grant or refuse his approval, and, though a later section conferred upon the court the right to review the action of such official, the exercise of that right was held to be restricted to instances where he acted arbitrarily and without good cause, or where there had been an abuse of discretion, and that "acts properly within such discretion are not subject to judicial review at the instance of some one claiming that a different decision should have been made."

Likewise, First Nat. Bank of Capitol Hill v. Murray, 212 Fed. 140, 128 C. C. A. 652, held not reviewable acts of the Comptroller of the Currency done within the scope of the powers conferred on him by the National Banking Act (Act June 20, 1874, c. 343, 18 Stat. 123) as to control and visita-

Some of the matters alleged by respondent for his refusal to approve the initial steps taken for the establishment of the proposed bank may not, as petitioners say, be sufficient. But when the return is considered in its entirety in the light of the objects of the state banking act taken as a whole, and in view of the authorities, it presents facts, circumstances and conditions such as we think do not warrant us in awarding the peremptory writ. Apparently the chief purpose of the Legislature in enacting the state banking law was to regulate the banking business and render it more efficient and more safe for those who intrust money to them. These considerations and numerous others of similar and like character have operated to induce such legislation by many if not all of the states, following congressional action as the safest and best criterion. Depositors have suffered severe losses by the failure of banks, due sometimes only to the lack of business enterprise in the community to create a demand for capital, but generally because of the dishonesty or incapacity of bank officers or agents, and when insolvency occurs, as it often does from one or both causes, it is usually the depositor least capable of sustaining the loss who suffers most seriously.

What motive prompted the creation of the office and the enactment of the provision granting such authority if the Legislature did not intend the public to derive some substantial benefit and protection from the power granted? Certainly there was no public demand for protection against injury from informality in the application for the privilege of engaging in the business. No serious results have flowed from that source. It was to reduce the probability of mishaps and losses of the nature mentioned above that the banking commissioner was intrusted with such power, and to achieve that end a certain discretion must be allowed him in the exercise of his duties.

Writ denied.

SOUTHERN EXPRESS CO. v. CHERO-COLA BOTTLING CO.

CHERO-COLA BOTTLING CO. v. SOUTHERN EXPRESS CO.
(Nos. 10201, 10202.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Sept. 19, 1919. Rehearing Denied Oct. 1, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)*1. COURTS ⇐189(15)—JUDGMENT ⇐120, 470
—DOCKET ENTRIES IN PENDING CAUSES NOT OPEN TO COLLATERAL ATTACK—"IN DE-FAULT."

Upon the call of the appearance docket an entry was made thereon by the trial judge, "In default April 27, 1918." Later in the day a plea was filed, the attorney for the plaintiff notified thereof, and the entry of "In default" erased by the trial judge, and an entry made by him, "Plea filed April 27, 1918." Entries made by the judge on the docket are a part of the proceedings in the case. Brady v. Little, 21 Ga. 132 (4), 135 (4). At the trial term a motion was made to strike the plea, because at the time it was filed the case was in default, and the judge had erred in striking the entry "In default," and marking "Plea filed." While sections 5654 and 5656 of the Civil Code of 1910 provide a way in which defaults may be opened, yet where the method provided by these sections is not followed, and the default is set aside and a new entry made, what is the remedy of the plaintiff? He must either except to the erroneous striking of the first entry, or he must file a direct proceeding to "vacate or reform" the second entry. To the judgment erasing "In default" there was no exception. The motion to strike the plea was not a "direct proceeding to vacate or reform" the entry of "Plea filed." "Entries appropriately made upon the dockets of the superior courts during the pendency of causes, by judges presiding therein, are presumed to represent truthfully the incidents occurring in the course of litigation; and so long as such entries stand unchallenged by direct proceedings to vacate or reform them, they are not open to collateral explanation or attack." Thornton v. Perry, 101 Ga. 608, 29 S. E. 24 (1); Albany Pine Products Co. v. Hercules Mfg. Co., 123 Ga. 270, 51 S. E. 297; Saffold v. Banks, 69 Ga. 290 (5-a); Smith v. Merchants' & Farmers' Bank, 22 Ga. App. 505, 96 S. E. 342. The practice in the city court of Carrollton is the same as in the superior courts of this state. Laws Ga. 1897, p. 438, §§ 13, 17. The only entry on the docket at the trial term being that of "Plea filed," and there being no direct proceedings to vacate or reform this entry, the judge properly refused to strike the plea. In addition it will be noticed that both entries above discussed were made on the same day, and our Supreme Court has said: "At all events, a case is not 'in default' unless so entered on the docket by the judge; and where the entry is marked off or defaced by the judge on the day the appearance docket is called, such marred entry should not have the effect of an 'in default' judgment. The presumption is that the case was not in default, but that the entry was heedlessly made by the judge through mistake, and that he disfigured the entry with his pen in order to correct his mistake." Albany Pine Products Co. v. Hercules Mfg. Co., 123 Ga. 271, 272, 51 S. E. 297.

2. ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

The court erred in admitting, over the defendant's objections, the two letters set forth in the bill of exceptions.

3. DIRECTED VERDICT.

The evidence, with the letters above eliminated, did not demand a finding for the plaintiff, and the court erred in directing a verdict for that party.

Broyles, P. J., dissenting.

Error from City Court of Carrollton; James Beall, Judge.

Action by the Chero-Cola Bottling Company against the Southern Express Company. Motion by plaintiff to strike plea, on ground that entry of "Plea filed," in lieu of former entry of "In default," was error, denied, and judgment for plaintiff on a directed verdict, and defendant brings error, and plaintiff takes a cross-bill of exceptions. Judgment on main bill of exceptions reversed, and on the cross-bill affirmed.

Robt. C. & Philip H. Alston, of Atlanta, and S. Holderness, of Carrollton, for plaintiff in error.

Boykin & Boykin, of Carrollton, for defendant in error.

STEPHENS, J. Judgment on the main bill of exceptions reversed; on the cross-bill affirmed.

BLOODWORTH, J., concurs.

BROYLES, P. J. (dissenting). At the trial term, upon the hearing of the motion to strike the defendant's plea from the files of the court, the undisputed evidence, which was admitted without objection, showed the following facts: The case was returnable to the March term, 1918, of the city court of Carrollton. When the case was called, on the day which had been previously fixed for the call of the appearance docket for that term, no plea had been filed by the defendant, and the clerk of the court so announced to the presiding judge. The judge thereupon made the following entry on the docket of the court, to wit: "In default April 27, 1918." On the same day, but subsequently to the entering of the default judgment and the closing of the docket, the defendant was allowed by the court to file a plea, and the court thereupon scratched out the words "In default," upon the docket, and marked thereon, "Plea filed April 27, 1918." While it was not shown in so many words, the undisputed evidence clearly demanded the inference that in opening the default there was no attempt to comply with the provisions of sections 5654 and 5656 of the Civil Code of 1910. In my opinion the court erred in overruling the motion to strike the plea. See, in this connection, Albany Pine Products Co. v. Hercules Mfg. Co., 123 Ga. 270, 51 S. E. 297; Coker & Son v. Lapscomb, 17 Ga. App. 506, 87 S. E. 704; Longlife Paint Co. v. Williams, 20 Ga. App. 524, 93 S. E. 154; Park's Ann. Code, §§ 5653, 5654, 5655, 5656, 5661.

Under the facts stated above I do not think that this view of the case is contrary to the rule laid down in Saffold v. Banks, 69 Ga. 289, Thornton v. Perry, 101 Ga. 608, 29 S. E. 24, and Smith v. Merchants' & Farmers' Bank, 22 Ga. App. 505, 96 S. E. 342, to the effect that entries made by the trial judge upon the docket cannot be challenged, except by a direct proceeding to vacate or reform them. While the motion in the instant case, to strike the defendant's plea from the files of the court, may not have constituted, in a narrow and technical sense, a direct proceeding to vacate or reform the entry upon the court's docket, it amounted in substance and effect to the same thing. In Albany Pine Products Co. v. Hercules Mfg. Co., supra, as in the instant case, the motion was to strike the defendant's plea, and the facts there were almost identical with those here, except that the evidence in that case did not affirmatively show that the plea was not filed before the entry of default was entered upon the docket, while in this case that controlling fact was affirmatively shown by the undisputed evidence. In that case the headnote is as follows:

"Where it appears that an entry was made by the judge on the docket of 'In default,' and it also appears that on the same day the judge defaced the entry by passing his pen through it, in the absence of proof to the contrary, such mutilated entry will be treated as the correction of an inadvertence, and not as an 'in default' judgment." (Italics mine.)

It clearly appears from this headnote, and the opinion in that case, that, if the evidence had affirmatively shown that the plea was not filed until after the judgment of default had been entered on the docket, the "mutilated entry" of "In default" would have been held to be an "in default judgment," and would not have been "treated as the correction of an inadvertence."

The refusal of the court to grant the motion to strike the defendant's plea deprived the plaintiff of a substantial right, and rendered the further proceedings in the case nugatory. In my opinion the judgment on the cross-bill of exceptions should be reversed, and the main bill of exceptions dismissed.

GAULEY & E. RY. CO. v. CONLEY et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 16, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN §202(1) — MARKET VALUE OF PROPERTY—EVIDENCE.

In a proceeding to condemn private property for public use, evidence of past annual profits derived from a business conducted on the property, in the form of net income arising from such business, offered as an index to the market value of the property, is ordinarily inadmissible, because the extent to which such income arises out of the property used is uncertain; it being dependent upon the capital invested, business conditions obtaining, and the trading skill and business capacity of the owner, as well as adaptability of the property to the business.

2. EMINENT DOMAIN §202(1)—REMOVAL OF BUSINESS FROM CONDEMNED PROPERTY—DISADVANTAGES OF NEW LOCATION—ADMISSIBILITY IN EVIDENCE.

If, in such case, the business is to be continued at another location and on property different from that involved in the proceeding, evidence of the relative inconvenience and disadvantages of the new location is inadmissible, because the constitutional guaranty of indemnity does not extend to the business conducted upon the property taken.

3. EMINENT DOMAIN §202(1) — REMOVAL OF BUSINESS — CONSTRUCTION OF NEW BUILDING—DAMAGES.

Nor, in the event of the erection of a new building on a different piece of land, in which such business is to be continued, can the cost thereof be included in the compensation or damages awarded, or proved as tending to show the value of the old building, in the absence of disclosure of like or closely similar construction and conditions in all respects.

4. EMINENT DOMAIN §202(1) — DAMAGES — EVIDENCE—CONTIGUOUS LOT.

In such case, the admission of evidence of damages to a lot not involved in the proceeding, nor used in connection with the property proceeded against, though contiguous to it, is erroneous.

5. EMINENT DOMAIN §202(1)—DAMAGES—EVIDENCE—OFFER TO OWNER.

It is also erroneous, in such case, to permit the landowner to prove an inquiry to him by an agent and attorney of the condemnor, as to whether he would accept a named sum of money, in payment of compensation for the property to be taken and damages to the residue, without proof of the agent's authority to fix and determine the amount of such compensation and damages. Evidence of such an inquiry is also inadmissible, because it does not fairly tend to prove an admission as to the value of the property.

6. EMINENT DOMAIN §202(1)—TAKING OF PART OF LOT—PROOF OF VALUE.

Ordinarily, when only a part of a lot or parcel of land is taken under the power of emiment domain, the proof of value should be limited to the part actually taken, and, as to the residue, the evidence should be limited to damages; but, when virtually all of the property is taken and the remnants are relatively worthless, the value of the entire tract or lot may be established, and an allowance made for the value of the remnants.

7. EMINENT DOMAIN ⇨202(1)—DAMAGES—EVIDENCE—OTHER SUITABLE PROPERTY.

After the right to take the property has been adjudicated and acquiesced in, it is inadmissible to prove, upon the inquiry as to compensation and damages, that the condemnor could have obtained other property equally as well suited to its purposes.

8. EVIDENCE ⇨501(7)—OPINION—VALUE OF PROPERTY.

Upon such a trial, a witness cannot base his opinion as to the value of the property upon "the possibility or impossibility of securing other locations" for the business conducted upon it.

9. EMINENT DOMAIN ⇨202(6) — VALUE OF PROPERTY—EVIDENCE—ASSESSMENT.

To be admissible, by virtue of section 115, c. 29 (sec. 1000), of the Code, as evidence of the value of property proceeded against under the power of eminent domain, the assessment thereof for purposes of taxation, last certified before the beginning of the proceeding, must be limited to the property so proceeded against, and must not include it and other property as a single or combined piece, unless the property is of uniform value and appears to have been assessed by the acre or by the lot.

Error from Circuit Court, Fayette County.

Condemnation proceeding by the Gauley & Eastern Railway Company against C. A. Conley and others. Verdict and judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed, verdict set aside, and cause remanded for a new trial.

W. N. King, of Columbus, Ohio, Leroy Allebach, of Charleston, and Dillon & Nuckolls, of Fayetteville, for plaintiff in error.

Magee McClung and C. R. Summerfield, both of Fayetteville, for defendants in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. The verdict and judgment in this condemnation proceeding by a railway company to take, for its purposes, a portion of each of two small lots, on one of which there was a horse and mule barn, and on the other a department store building, both in use at the time, are for $14,000, and the applicant complains of them.

The dimensions of the barn lot were, substantially, 40 by 80 feet, and of the other lot 40 by 54 feet. The railroad right of way line cut into both lots to a depth of about 30 feet and ran through the building on each. Each of the structures was a two-story frame building; the former about 54 by 37 feet, and the latter about 36 by 50 feet. On account of the unfavorable topography of the ground, the building sites had to be prepared at considerable expense, by the blasting out and hauling away of rock and the construction of retaining walls. The barn seems to have been built in 1911, and the storehouse in 1914. Up to a date prior to August, 1917, the time of the institution of this proceeding, the two defendants, C. A. Conley and E. D. Kincaid, were partners trading in horses and mules, and conducted their business in the barn just described. At the latter date, Conley, having bought out Kincaid, was conducting the horse and mule business alone. They, however, were owners in common of the two lots, and Conley was paying Kincaid $25 per month as rental for his interest in the lot on which the barn stood, and the store building paid a rental of $60 per month.

The commissioners appointed in the usual way ascertained the compensation and damages respecting the lot on which the barn was at $4,800, and the lot on which the store building was at $5,500, making a total of $10,300. The railway company paid this amount into court and obtained an order authorizing it to take possession of the property. The owners excepted to the report of the commissioners and demanded a trial by jury, solely on the question of the amount of compensation and damages; they having acquiesced in the court's decision affirming the right of the applicant to take the property for its railroad purposes, on payment of proper compensation and damages.

All of the numerous assignments of error, except two, are based upon rulings admitting evidence over objections of the plaintiff in error. One of the others denies the propriety of an instruction, because it is based upon evidence alleged to be inadmissible; and the overruling of a motion to set aside the verdict, for insufficiency of the evidence, and as being contrary to the clear and decided preponderance of the evidence, is the subject-matter of the last one.

[1, 2] In the beginning of the trial, the court refused to permit the owners of the property to prove the net income and profits of the horse and mule business conducted in the barn on one of the lots, for the year immediately preceding the month of August, 1917, the date of the institution of this proceeding; but, later, such evidence was admitted over an objection interposed by the applicant. In the argument submitted here in support of the court's final ruling upon the question, it is frankly admitted that such profits cannot be included in the verdict as an element or item of compensation or damages; but it is earnestly insisted that profits actually derived from business conducted on the property may be proved as one of the circumstances tending to show its market value. The distinction between the two offices of proof is obvious, but it does not overcome the objection to the evidence in question. There is a clear distinction, but it is not coextensive with the difference. The rental value is always admissible, because it is almost as fixed and certain as the market value of the property. The profits derived from a business conducted upon the property are uncertain and speculative in character, because the question of profit and loss, or the amount of profit, in the event of any, depends more upon the capital invested, general business conditions, and the trading skill and business capacity of the person conducting it, than it does upon the location of the place of business. Profits already derived from a business may not be speculative, in the true sense of the term; but they would, nevertheless, constitute an uncertain measure of the value of the property upon which the business was carried on.

The argument submitted in support of the admissibility of this evidence is plausible; but it is not in harmony with our decisions, nor with the weight of authority throughout the country. B. & N. Railway Co. v. Great Scott Coal & Coke Co., 75 W. Va. 423, 83 S. E. 1031; Shenandoah Valley Ry. Co. v. Shepherd et al., 26 W. Va. 672; Richmond, etc., Railroad Co. v. Chamblin, 100 Va. 401, 41 S. E. 750; Braun v. Met. West Side Elevated Railroad Co., 166 Ill. 434, 46 N. E. 974; Dupuis v. C. & N. W. Railway Co., 115 Ill. 97, 3 N. E. 720; Sauer v. Mayor, 44 App. Div. 305, 60 N. Y. Supp. 648; Matter of Gilroy, 26 App. Div. 314, 49 N. Y. Supp. 798; Newton v. Armstrong, 19 N. Y. Supp. 573; Edmonds v. Boston, 108 Mass. 535; Cobb v. Boston, 109 Mass. 438; Becker v. P. & R. T. R. Co., 177 Pa. 252, 35 Atl. 617, 35 L. R. A. 583; Kossler v. Railway Co., 208 Pa. 50, 57 Atl. 66. Several of these cases specifically deny the admissibility of evidence of past profits derived from the land taken. Others rule out proof of future profits. No authority explicitly holding that, under ordinary circumstances, such evidence can be received to prove market value, has been cited or found.

In some jurisdictions, the peculiar character of the property to be condemned or the circumstances of the owner are permitted to vary the rule and to constitute an exception thereto. Thus, in Montgomery County v. Schuylkill Bridge Co., 110 Pa. 54, 20 Atl. 407, in which the subject of condemnation was a toll bridge, the court recognized the exception and permitted the introduction of proof of past annual net profits as tending to show the market value of the bridge. Mr. Justice Paxson, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

"The principle is well enough, but it has no application to the facts of this case. The property taken was of a peculiar character, and can hardly be said to have a market value."

In Railroad Co. v. Patterson, 107 Pa. 461, the same court denied the right of a jury to take in consideration, in its estimate of compensation and damages, any supposed loss of profits, saying:

"Such an assessment would be purely speculative, and a rule which justified it would lead to most ruinous results."

In West Side E. R. Co. v. Siegel, 161 Ill. 638, 44 N. E. 276, the owners were allowed the cost of removal of their personal property from the real estate taken and damages for interruption of their business; but it was carefully noted that the allowances were made under an exception to the general rule. These cases are referred to merely to show that such exceptions are recognized in some jurisdictions. They are not applicable here, for there is nothing of an anomalous character in this case, justifying an inquiry as to the existence of such exceptions here.

All of the evidence tending to prove that the new barn is not as conveniently or advantageously located as the old one was improperly admitted. As in the case of profits, it pertains, not to the value of the property taken or damage to the residue, but to the business of one of the defendants. For injury or detriment to that the law does not require the condemnor to compensate. B. & N. Railroad Co. v. Great Scott C. & C. Co., 75 W. Va. 423, 83 S. E. 1031; Shenandoah Valley R. Co. v. Shepherd, 26 W. Va. 672. Such damages are said to be common to the owners of other like business enterprises of the community. The true reason may be that presumptively the world affords the trader just as good opportunities in other places, and the inconvenience and expense of finding another location are incidents of the business, and not elements of damage to the property condemned; the constitutional guaranty being limited by its terms to compensation for property taken and indemnity for injury to property not taken. If an established business is to be continued on the residue of property only partially taken, an allowance for interruption to the business may possibly be justifiable, on the theory of temporary loss of use of the residue of the property; but as to this we decide nothing, since the question does not arise, the business having been removed to another piece of land.

[3] Evidence of the cost of construction of a new barn on another site was improperly admitted also. The applicant pays the value of the old barn, and, out of that compensation or otherwise, the defendant should provide himself with a new one, if he needs or desires it. As the applicant takes a good portion of each building, and the lots are too small to afford room for them on what remains of each lot, they are in legal contemplation wholly taken. In other words, they are to be treated, upon the inquiry as to compensation, as if they were wholly taken.

Ohio River R. Co. v. Gibbens, 35 W. Va. 57, 12 S. E. 1093; Pumpelly v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co., 13 Wall. 180, 20 L. Ed. 557; Eaton v. Railroad Co., 51 N. H. 504, 12 Am. Rep. 147. They are parts of the property taken, and are therefore to be paid for. The condemnor is not required, in addition to such payment, to provide new buildings. The case is entirely different from one in which a building can be moved over onto the untaken residue of a tract of land and its uses continued. In the latter case, cost of removal might be evidence bearing on the question of damages to the residue; but we do not have this question. The evidence of the cost of erection of the new barn is too uncertain as an element of proof of the value of the old one. It was put up on different ground, and the cost of preparation of the new site may have been considerably more or less than that incident to the construction of the old one, which included expensive excavation and retaining walls. If identity or close similarity of conditions in all respects would make this evidence admissible, as tending to prove the value of the old barn, it is not disclosed, and the record does not indicate that it can be.

[4] Between the two lots in question there was another small one owned by Conley alone, and a part of which was taken. Kincald alone owned another lot adjoining all three of those involved in the proceeding, and on it he resided in a house worth probably $3,000; but no part of that lot was taken. Defendants were allowed, over objections, to prove damages to his residence lot, resulting from the construction of the railroad in front of it. No direct effort is made in the brief for defendant in error to sustain this ruling, but it is treated as part of the evidence relating to an assessment for taxation, in an effort to apportion the assessment between the residence lot and the store lot; they having been assessed together. This effort at apportionment, however, did not necessarily involve proof of damage to the residence lot, which was not involved in the proceeding. Admission of such proof was a palpable error. On this subject, the rule is strict. Lewis, Em. Dom. 697, citing numerous cases sustaining the text.

[5] Evidence of an inquiry made by an agent and attorney of the condemnor as to whether one of the defendants would accept a certain amount of money by way of compensation and damages, if he were sole owner of the property, was admitted over objection. As there was no proof of any authority in the agent and attorney to bind his principal by an agreement as to the compensation and damages, this evidence was improperly admitted. One dealing with an agent must know the extent of his authority. Uniontown Grocery Co. v. Dawson, 68 W. Va. 332, 69 S. E. 845, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 148. The inquiry, if made, was no evidence of the value of the property and rights sought. It was an effort to ascertain the attitude of the defendants, and did not import purpose or willingness to pay the amount suggested. Besides, there is no proof of intent on the part of the principal to make the agent a witness either for or against it in the condemnation proceeding. It was bad for want of proof of authority in the agent, and also for lack of tendency to prove value.

[6] Ordinarily it would be highly improper to permit the owner to prove the value of the entire property, when only a portion of it is taken. But in this case the remnants are so small and unfavorably located, lying between the railroad track and a rock cliff, that their relative values practically amount to almost nothing, and render the ordinary rule difficult of application. It is much more convenient and intelligible to state the entire values and then make allowances for the remnants. In point of utility, though not of law or fact, the entire lots, according to the evidence, were substantially taken, for the portions not taken were rendered almost useless. The buildings were, in a legal sense, wholly taken, because they had to be moved or destroyed. The assignment of error respecting proof of entire values is, for these reasons, held to be untenable.

[7] As the right of the railroad company to take the land had been previously adjudicated and acquiesced in by the defendants, it was too late for them to set up the defense of lack of necessity for condemnation of these lots on the ground of existence of another way occasioning less damage. Introduction of evidence at this stage of the case to prove such a way could subserve no useful or legitimate purpose. It pertains neither to the value of the land taken nor damages to the residue. It might become a fallacious basis of an inference of wantonness on the part of the railway company, in seeking unnecessarily to take improved or actually used property, when vacant property would answer its purposes equally well. If effective at all, such an inference could result only in prejudice against the railway company in the trial. The witness did say the ground on the other side of the road was very steep and rocky; but he had previously stated the condemnor could have gone that way and obtained cheaper property. The court should have sustained the motion to strike that evidence out.

[8] A witness was improperly allowed to give his opinion as to the value of the property, "taking into consideration . . . the possibility or impossibility of securing other locations." It was competent for the defendants to prove the location, the adaptation of the property to any use of which it was susceptible, and the use to which it had been devoted, as bearing on the question of market value; but, for reasons already stated, they could not have the jury take into consideration facts tending to prove detriment to their trading business conducted on the property.

This involves no mere interruption to business to be continued on the residue of a tract of land, which may fall within an exception to the general rule. The taking of the land terminates the business on that tract, and the constitutional guaranty does not require reimbursement for loss of business.

[9] The argument submitted in support of the admission of the tax assessment of the Kincaid residence lot and the store building lot, treated as a single piece of property, at the sum of $17,280, fallaciously assumes that the assessor put the same values on the two pieces of property as the witnesses accorded to them—$5,000 on the residence lot and $12,280 on the other. The unreliability of assessments as indices to the market values of property is shown by the fact that the assessment of these two pieces of property for the preceding year was only $2,000. Assessments are so fearfully and wonderfully made that it would be unsafe to hazard a guess as to the method adopted in any particular case. The statute (Code 1913, c. 29, § 115 [sec. 1000]) makes them admissible on questions of value; but, ordinarily, the assessment offered should be limited to the particular property involved in the proceeding, for, when two or more pieces are combined, there is no certain means of knowledge affording ground for a just and fair apportionment, unless the land is all of the same quality and appears to have been valued by the acre or the lot. The court should have excluded the assessment and refused the instruction based upon it.

As the evidence on the new trial will be different in material respects from what it was on this trial, it is deemed unnecessary, and might be improper, to enter upon any inquiry as to whether, as it stands now, it is sufficient to sustain the verdict.

For the errors noted, the judgment will be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial.

STATE, for Use of MASON COUNTY COURT, v. TURNER et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Sept. 16, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES ⇨157(2), 168 (2)—BOND—DEFALCATION — LIABILITY OF SURETIES—DEFAULT.

In an action brought against the sureties on a new official bond, executed by a sheriff pursuant to an order of the county court, to recover balances found to be due the various public funds on final settlement made after his term of office has ended, the sureties on such new official bond, not being liable for defalcations occurring prior to the taking effect of the new bond, are entitled to show that the embezzlement of the public moneys occurred before that event, if that is the fact, and they are entitled to set up this defense by a special plea, if they so desire.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

2. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES ⇨162, 168(1)—BOND—DEFAULTS—SUIT ON BOND—ALLEGATIONS.

Under Barnes' Code 1918, c. 39, § 38 (Code 1913, c. 39, § 38 [sec. 1588]), order of county court and failure of sheriff to comply therewith shows a default and is a condition precedent to the right to sue sheriff on his bond; and an averment to that effect, or that a judgment or decree has been rendered against county court for a certain sum, is essential to maintenance of action on the bond.

3. PLEADING ⇨87—MODE OF PLEADING DEFENSE—SPECIAL PLEA.

Notwithstanding the facts alleged in a special plea may be proven under the general issue, a defendant has the right to plead them specially, if he so desires.

Case Certified from Circuit Court, Mason County.

Action of debt by the State of West Virginia, suing for the use of the County Court of Mason County, against H. C. Turner and others. Plaintiff's objection to the filing of defendant's pleas overruled, and the pleas allowed to be filed, and the question of the right to file such pleas certified. Ruling of lower court sustained, with direction.

Rankin Wiley and Musgrave & Blessing, all of Point Pleasant, for plaintiff.

B. H. Blagg and Somerville & Somerville, all of Point Pleasant, and John L. Whitten, of Huntington, for defendants.

WILLIAMS, J. This is an action of debt brought by the state of West Virginia for the use and benefit of the county court of Mason county against the surviving sureties on one of the official bonds given by John P. Austin, now deceased, as sheriff of said county.

The term of office for which said sheriff was elected began January 1, 1909, and ended December 31, 1912. Prior to entering upon the duties of said office he gave the bond required by law, with the Citizens' Trust & Guaranty Company as his surety. On the 17th day of July, 1911, he was required by an order of the county court, entered of record, to give a new bond, and gave the bond now sued on.

Defendants tendered and asked leave to file three special pleas, Nos. 4, 5, and 6, averring, in effect, that the fund for which the sureties are now sought to be held liable was misapplied or embezzled by their principal prior to the time they became his sureties. Plaintiff objected to the filing of these pleas, but the court overruled the objection and permitted them to be filed, and, at the request of the attorneys for the respective parties, certified the question of the right to file these pleas to this court for its determination.

It is averred in the declaration that the defendant sheriff made annual settlements with the county court during his term of office, and that each settlement showed the balances then due the several funds of which the county court had control for each successive year; that such balances were carried over and charged against the sheriff in his settlement for the succeeding year, and so on, until the final settlement made the 12th day of August, 1913, when it was ascertained that there were certain balances in his hands due the various funds, aggregating $24,825.05, which he was directed by order of the court entered of record, and of which he had notice, to turn over to F. E. Bletner, his successor in office. It is also alleged that he failed and refused to comply with this order.

[2] It is contended by counsel for plaintiff that, in view of the statute—section 38, chapter 39, Barnes' Code 1918 (Code 1913, c. 39, § 38 [sec. 1555])—forbidding the sheriff to pay any money out of the county treasury "except upon an order signed by the president and clerk of the county court, and properly indorsed as aforesaid, or upon judgment or decree, as provided by the forty-second section of this chapter," the alleged default did not occur until the 12th day of August, 1913, when he was ordered to pay the money over to his successor and failed to do so, and that, therefore, the liability of the sureties on his official bond then in force is determined as of that time, and that consequently the pleas set up no defense. State v. Wade, 15 W. Va. 524, State v. Parsons, 22 W. Va. 580, State v. Hays, 30 W. Va. 107, 3 S. E. 177, and State v. Keadle, 63 W. Va. 645, 60 S. E. 798, are cited to sustain this contention. It is true that such an order of the county court and the failure of the sheriff to comply therewith shows a default, and constitutes a condition precedent to the right to sue the sheriff on his official bond. Hence an averment to that effect, or that a judgment or decree has been rendered against the county court for a certain sum of money, is essential to the maintenance of an action on a sheriff's official bond. A breach of his official duty is unquestionably shown by his failure to comply with the order of the county court. But when the conflicting rights and liabilities of different sets of sureties are involved, such order is not conclusive evidence of the time when the embezzlement actually occurred, and the sureties are permitted to show that it occurred at a time before the bond on which they are liable became operative. We in effect, so held in Raleigh County Court v. Cottle, 79 W. Va. 661, 92 S. E. 110, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 510.

[1] Being the sureties on the new bond given by their principal, defendants are, by section 20, chapter 10, Barnes' Code 1918 (Code 1913, c. 10, § 20 [sec. 270]), made liable only for the default of their principal occurring after the approval of that bond, and, if the default contemplated by the statute could occur only when the sheriff is ordered to pay the fund over to his successor in office and fails to do so, the provision limiting liability of the sureties to such default only as occurs after the approval of the new bond would be useless, because the sheriff is the treasurer of the county funds and is entitled to the custody thereof until his term of office ends, and he would never be ordered by the county court to pay over any balance in his hands for any fiscal year until the end of his term, and hence it would follow that the sureties on the new bond last given by a sheriff would always be liable for the balance found on last settlement. Clearly it was the purpose of the Legislature, in case a sheriff gives a new bond to make the sureties thereon liable for such malfeasance only as occurs within the time such bond is in force. It is not alleged here that the new bond was retrospective, and unless made so by its terms the law does not give it that effect. The term "default," occurring in section 20, chapter 10, Code, in the phrase "for any default of their principal occurring after the approval of such additional bond," relates to and includes the time when the malfeasance was actually committed, as well as the default that may be shown by the officer's failure to comply with the order of the county court made after final settlement after the ending of his term, and the sureties on the new bond have a right to prove, if they can, that the malfeasance occurred before they became liable. As we interpret the decision in State v. Wade, supra, it supports rather than conflicts with our present holding. There the sheriff had given two new official bonds, one July 24, 1869, and the other the 15th of March, 1870, with different sureties. On January 24, 1870, he paid into the treasury nearly three-fourths of the taxes for the year 1869 and directed the auditor to apply the funds to the taxes of 1869. But the sheriff being then delinquent for the taxes of 1867 and 1868, the auditor disregarded his instructions and caused the fund to be applied on the delinquent taxes of 1867 and 1868, claiming the right to do so under the statute. The Legislature then passed a special act, at the instance of the sheriff and his sureties, directing the auditor to apply the payment to the taxes of 1869, or so much thereof as the auditor was satisfied was collected out of the taxes due the state for 1869. The court held that the auditor had no right to disregard the sheriff's instructions, and furthermore, that inasmuch as only three-fourths of the taxes of 1869 were required to be paid into the treasury prior to May 1, 1870, the sureties in the first bond were liable for three-fourths of the taxes of 1869, and the sureties in the second bond, for the remaining one-fourth. That a sheriff may, by directing the application of public funds under his control to the payment of a particular indebtedness thereto, affect the liability of his sureties is well settled. Taylor v. La Follette, 49 W. Va. 478, 39 S. E. 276, and cases cited in the opinion. But that question is not raised by the pleading here.

[3] It may be that defendants are entitled to prove the facts averred in their special pleas, under the issue raised by the plea of conditions performed, but this question we do not decide, as we lately held in case of First National Bank v. Freeman, 83 W. Va. —, 98 S. E. 558, that notwithstanding the facts alleged in a special plea may be proven under the general issue, nevertheless a defendant has the right to plead them specially if he so desires. We therefore sustain the ruling of the lower court and direct our decision to be certified back to it.

PITTSBURGH & WEST VIRGINIA GAS CO. et al. v. PENTRESS GAS CO. et al.
Appeal of CHARTIERS OIL CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 16, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. IMPROVEMENTS ¶4(2) — WILLFUL TRESPASSER.

One who, with full knowledge of the facts which make his claim of title to land invalid, enters thereon and commits acts of trespass, is a willful trespasser within the meaning of the law, even though he may honestly believe that under such known facts the law confers upon him good title.

2. MINES AND MINERALS ¶80—INVALID OIL AND GAS LEASE—SUIT FOR VALUE OF OIL—DEDUCTION OF EXPENSES.

One who enters upon a tract of land under an oil and gas lease, with full knowledge of the facts which render the same invalid, and produces the oil therefrom, is not entitled, when sued for the value of the oil so produced and sold from the lands by the party having the superior right, to any deduction from such value because of expenditures made by him in producing and marketing such oil.

3. DAMAGES ¶69—INTEREST AS DAMAGES—CONVERSION.

Where, in an action for damages, it appears that the complaining party was entitled to receive the fixed money value of property converted at a certain time, in ascertaining his damages at the time of recovery, it is proper to add interest on such fixed value from the time of such conversion to the date of recovery.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Monongalia County.

Separate suits for injunction by the Pittsburgh & West Virginia Gas Company and others against the Pentress Gas Company, the Chartiers Oil Company, and others. Decrees for plaintiffs, and defendant Chartiers Oil Company appeals. Reversed, and causes remanded.

Edward S. Craig, Cox & Baker, of Morgantown, for appellant.

Charles A. Goodwin and Glasscock & Glasscock, all of Morgantown, for appellees.

RITZ, J. Plaintiffs are the successors in title to the lessee in two oil and gas leases, executed by the owners of separate tracts of land lying in Monongalia county. These leases are indefinite in their term, and are what is commonly called "no term leases." They provide for the drilling of a well within a certain time, or for the payment of a certain sum of money quarterly in lieu of drilling. For a number of years the plaintiffs and their predecessors paid the commutation money in lieu of drilling and kept the leases alive in that way. At the end of one of the quarterly periods for which this commutation money had been paid, the landowners notified the holders of the leases that the same were canceled, and refused to receive the rental moneys for the next quarter. This contention of the landowners was disputed by the holders of the leases. Shortly thereafter the owners of the land made other leases to the defendants, or their predecessors, covering the same tracts of land, and both plaintiffs and defendants thereupon made locations upon each of the tracts of land with a view to drilling for oil or gas thereon. In the one instance the landowner, and in the other the defendant Pentress Gas Company, filed their bills in the circuit court of Monongalia county, setting up the facts as aforesaid, and asking that the plaintiffs here be enjoined from drilling upon said land under the old leases, contending that the same were canceled, and also be enjoined from interfering with the holders of the junior leases in their operations upon said lands. This injunction was granted, and while it was in force the defendants, claiming under the junior leases, drilled a well on each of the tracts of land, and produced oil therefrom. Upon a final hearing the circuit court perpetuated the injunctions and canceled the senior leases. An appeal was prosecuted from those decrees, and this court reversed the same, holding the senior leases valid and binding, and the junior lessors without right, and dismissed the bills. Johnson v. Armstrong, 81 W. Va. 399, 94 S. E. 753, and Pen- tress Gas Co. v. Monongahela Natural Gas Co., 81 W. Va. 399, 94 S. E. 753.

Thereafter the plaintiffs brought these suits and invoked the jurisdiction of equity to enjoin the defendants, the holders of the junior leases, from further operations upon said lands, and to have an accounting and recovery of the money received by said defendants for the oil taken from the premises. The cases were submitted upon a statement of agreed facts, from which it appears that the defendants expended in the drilling of each of the wells more than the sum of $5,000, and that they also expended in what is termed caring for, storing, and transporting the oil from the wells on the premises the sum of more than $1,500 in each case, which sums so expended by them in drilling the wells and in marketing the oil it is asked may be set off against the amounts received for the oil produced. The court below declined to allow defendants credit for the cost of drilling the wells, but did allow them credit for the other expenses in connection with said oil, and in the one case this was sufficient to entirely offset the amount received for oil, and in the other to reduce such amount to an inconsiderable sum. The plaintiffs contend that the defendants in their operations upon these lands were willful trespassers, and are not entitled to any credit for money expended by them in producing or marketing the oil which they sold from the lands; while, on the other hand, it is contended by the defendants that they were acting in good faith, believing their rights superior to the rights of plaintiffs, for which reason they are entitled to credit for the expenses incurred in the production of the oil, and further that, even if this is not the case, under decisions of this court cited by counsel, which will be hereafter referred to, they are entitled to be credited in an accounting with such cost of production.

[1] The first question which naturally presents itself is: What was the status of the defendants in relation to these lands at the time they drilled the wells thereon? That they were trespassers there is no doubt, but as will be hereafter seen a willful trespasser is upon a different footing from one who can be said to be acting in good faith. The defendants contend that they were not willful trespassers, because they honestly believed that their title was superior to that of the plaintiffs. They were cognizant of every fact affecting their rights or interests in the lands, as well as the rights and interests of the plaintiffs, and their contention of good faith rests upon the sole ground that they honestly misjudged the law. They believed that under the law the existing facts, of which they were fully informed, gave them the superior right. The plaintiffs did not acquiesce in this view, but, on the contrary, vigorously contested it, and contended from the very beginning that they alone had right to drill for oil and gas on these lands. Can the fact that one acts under a misconception of the law characterize his acts as innocent? The presumption is that every man knows the law, and when he is fully informed as to the facts, and makes a wrong application of the law thereto, ordinarily he will be bound by his acts to the same extent as if he had no misconception in regard to the law which controls. He is presumed to be as fully informed as to the law controlling under a given state of facts at one time as at another, and if he acts upon his own interpretation of the law he does so at his peril. In this case, as before observed, the defendants were fully informed as to the facts, and committed the acts which resulted in the extraction of the oil with this full knowledge, and with the further knowledge that their interpretation of the law was vigorously contested by the plaintiffs. It may be said that the defendants had such confidence in their judgment as to be willing to take the risk of an unfavorable decision. Entire good faith, it occurs to us, would have dictated to them that the proper course would be to wait until the controversy had been finally determined before expending large sums of money in drilling upon the land.

This doctrine is fully discussed in the case of Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co. v. Deepwater Ry. Co., 57 W. Va. 641-695, 50 S. E. 890. In that case the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company entered upon the lands under an order of the circuit court and spent large sums of money in constructing a tunnel. It was afterwards determined that the Deepwater Railway Company had the better right to the right of way in dispute, and, notwithstanding the tunnel constructed by the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company was beneficial to the Deepwater Railway Company in its operations, this court denied any right to compensation for the money expended and the improvements made. It was there held that the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company could not be a bona fide occupant of the land, although it had entered thereon under an order of the court, believing its title to be good, because it had notice of all of the facts, being ignorant only of matter of law. The same doctrine was announced in Snider v. Snider, 3 W. Va. 200. And in Dawson v. Grow, 29 W. Va. 333, 1 S. E. 564, it was held that, to entitle an evicted claimant to compensation for improvements put upon lands, he must have acted bona fide, and that one having knowledge of all the facts in regard to the title to the land, or means of knowledge, is not such bona fide claimant. In that case it was held that the recordation of the deed gave notice of the adverse claim, and that the one making improvements was charged with knowledge of such deed from the fact of its recordation alone. And in the case of Hall v. Hall, 30 W. Va. 779, 5 S. E. 260, it was likewise held that one evicted from land, claiming for improvements placed thereon, will not be entitled thereto unless he was a bona fide occupant, and that to be such bona fide occupant it must appear that he not only believed he had good title, and made the improvements in good faith under that belief, but it must be further shown that he at the time had reasonable grounds to believe his title good. If the title under which he claimed appeared upon its face to be defective upon a proper application of legal principles thereto, he could not be held to be acting in good faith.

This doctrine is announced in other cases decided by this court, and is well sustained both upon reason and authority. Why should one be treated as acting in good faith when dealing with property as his own, when he knows all of the facts which constitute his claim, as well as the claim of his adversary, which facts, when properly construed, give him no title to the land? Such a holding would make every man a judge of the law in his own case, instead of being bound by the law as interpreted by those charged with that duty. We must therefore conclude that the defendants, when they drilled the wells on these lands, were willful trespassers, just as much so as though there had been no question but that the plaintiffs had the superior right. They could not decide the disputed question in their own favor, and then proceed with the hope that their acts would be characterized by this court as in good faith, even though their judgment upon the law of the case should not be approved.

[2] Having reached this conclusion, what, then, are the plaintiffs entitled to recover in these cases? In case of a trespass to real property by removing timber or mineral therefrom, it seems that the injured party may sue for damages done to the estate, or he may bring his suit in the nature of trover and conversion for the thing severed from the estate, and recover it, or its value. In case he sues for the injury to the estate, the measure of his damages is the depreciation in the value thereof by reason of the trespass; but in case he elects to waive any consequential injury by reason of the trespass, and sue only for the material severed, or its value, then the measure of his damages is arrived at in another way. By severing a part of the freehold and converting it into personalty, the trespasser does not thereby become vested with title. The title still remains in him to whom the real estate belonged at the time the trespass was committed, and he can follow the article so long as he can find it, and recover it for his own benefit without any deduction for the cost of making the severance. Gaskins v. Davis, 115 N. C. 85, 20 S. E. 188, 25 L. R. A. 813, 44 Am. St. Rep. 439, and note.

In this case the plaintiffs do not seek to recover damages for the injury inflicted upon their estate. They seek to recover the value of the oil taken from the property by the defendants as a result of the trespass committed upon their rights. They do not attempt to recover the oil itself, for the very good reason that it has gone beyond the control of either of the parties. It might seem that, if the owner of real estate is entitled to recover the property severed therefrom by a trespasser, without deduction for the cost of such severance where the same increases the value of the property, whether the trespass is willful or otherwise, he would be entitled to recover the value of the article after its severance, where the trespasser has put it beyond his control to recover the article itself; and indeed many of the cases so hold. It seems to us, however, that the better rule is that laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in Woodenware Co. v. United States, 106 U. S. 432, 1 Sup. Ct. 398, 27 L. Ed. 230, and that is that, where the trespass is willful, the measure of damages is the value of the property at the time and place of demand, without deduction for labor and expense; but where such trespass is not willful, but is the result of a mistake of fact, the measure of plaintiff's damages is the value of the article after its severance, less the proper expense of such severance. Sutherland on Damages, § 1020; J. F. Ball & Bro. Lumber Co. v. Simms Lumber Co., 121 La. 627, 46 South. 674, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 244, and note; Bailey v. Railroad Co., 3 S. D. 531, 54 N. W. 596, 19 L. R. A. 653, and note; Gaskins v. Davis, 115 N. C. 85, 20 S. E. 188, 25 L. R. A. 813, 44 Am. St. Rep. 439; Winchester v. Craig, 33 Mich. 205.

Many more authorities to the same effect might be cited, but they are thoroughly considered in the cases above noted. In the case of Guffey v. Smith, 237 U. S. 101, 35 Sup. Ct. 526, 59 L. Ed. 856, the United States Supreme Court considered a question similar to the one we have here. That was a controversy between junior and senior lessees, in which the one not entitled to the property had produced oil therefrom, and that court held that the proper measure of recovery was the value of the oil sold from the land by the trespasser, without any credit for such sums as he had expended in producing the same after he became a willful trespasser, but with credit for such sums as had been expended by him while he was in ignorance of one of the facts making his lease invalid.

Counsel for the defendants here attempt to distinguish that case upon the ground that in Illinois one holding an oil and gas lease is held to have an interest in the land, while in this jurisdiction the holder of such a lease before production thereunder is held not to have an interest in the land as such, but only an exclusive right to drill the land for the purpose of producing these minerals, and to produce the same after they are discovered. This can make no difference in the application of the principle, for the reason that the trespass committed here was to the plaintiffs' rights, regardless of what they were. Admittedly plaintiffs had the exclusive right to drill this land for oil and gas, and the defendants wrongfully took this right from them. Plaintiffs likewise had the right, upon discovery of the oil and gas, to produce and sell the same, and of this right they were deprived by the defendants; so that it makes no difference as to the extent of the plaintiffs' interests, the result is that they have been deprived of them, and that by the defendants' unwarranted acts. This would lead to the conclusion that the plaintiffs were entitled to decrees at least for the amounts received by the defendants for the oil produced from these premises, without deduction for the amount spent in the production thereof.

But the defendants claim that these cases are controlled by the decisions of this court in the cases of Williamson v. Jones, 43 W. Va. 562, 27 S. E. 411, 38 L. R. A. 694, 64 Am. St. Rep. 891, McNeely v. South Penn Oil Co., 58 W. Va. 438, 52 S. E. 480, and South Penn Oil Co. v. Haight, 71 W. Va. 720, 78 S. E. 759, in each of which cases it was held that a joint tenant, who had committed waste upon the common property, by producing and selling the oil therefrom, should be given credit in an accounting for the amount expended by him in such production. In all of those cases the party committing the waste did so with knowledge or means of knowledge of the facts affecting his title. In the Williamson-Jones Case, Jones claimed to be the owner of the whole of the land, and believed himself to be such owner, having bought the same at a judicial sale; but the court held that he was chargeable with the knowledge that an inspection of the record would disclose. To this extent this decision is stronger against the trespasser than that of Guffey v. Smith, above cited, for in that case the Supreme Court held that, even though the senior lease was recorded, the junior lessee would not be charged with notice of it from that fact alone. Believing himself to be the owner of the whole tract of land, he developed the same for oil and gas, and thereafter the owners of the other seven-tenths sued him for an accounting. Judge Brannon in that case says that by dry law Jones would not be entitled to any credit for the money expended by him in doing the drilling, but because of the equities existing he was allowed such credit.

How did these equities arise? In the case of joint tenants each is to an extent the agent of the other in the matter of caring for the joint property, and a joint tenant who commits waste because of this relationship is to some extent, at least, in the same situation as an agent who acts in excess of his authority. If one of the joint owners is in possession of the real estate, he has the right to use it, but not to commit waste thereon, subject to an accounting with his cotenant for the rents and profits derivable from such estate. If he exceeds his authority and commits waste, there is an equitable relation between him and his cotenant similar to that existing between a principal and an agent who exceeds his authority. It is well settled that if an agent exceeds his authority in making a contract for his principal, and the principal subsequently accepts the benefits of the contract, he must likewise submit to its obligations. There is a similar relation, perhaps not, however, so well defined, or existing in the same degree, between joint tenants, where one exceeds his authority by committing waste upon the joint estate, and this is the relation because of which the equities spoken of by Judge Brannon arose.

The same may be said of the decision in the other two cases referred to. The matters decided involved waste committed by joint tenants. In the McNeely Case Judge Poffenbarger, speaking for this court, says that the court seems to have gone to the utmost limit of equity jurisdiction to relieve from the rigors of the common and statutory law in allowing the expense incurred by the drilling in that case, and we quite agree with this conclusion. We are not willing to extend those limits, so as to include a trespass committed by one who is a stranger to the title. In the Haight Case, above referred to, it is intimated in the opinion that the decision would have been different, were it not for the fact that the notice given by the joint tenant out of possession to his cotenant was more of an invitation to go on with the drilling than it was a prohibition thereof. It cannot be doubted that there is a relation between joint tenants, from which equities may arise in favor of the one or the other, which does not exist between strangers, and for this reason equity may relieve against the harshness of the rule of law otherwise applicable.

The plaintiffs claim that they are entitled, not only to the oil received by the defendants and sold by them, but also to the one-eighth thereof delivered to the owners of the land. They argue that, while it is true the landowners are entitled to receive one-eighth of the oil produced, yet this delivery of the one-eighth to the landowners by the defendants did not fulfill their contract with the landowners. This may be quite true; but it must be borne in mind that the plaintiffs are only under obligation to deliver to the landowners one-eighth of the oil produced by them. They are under no obligation to deliver one-eighth of the oil produced by a trespasser, especially when such trespasser is put upon the land by the landowners themselves. We do not think, therefore, that the plaintiffs' contention in this regard has merit.

[3] Plaintiffs also contend that they are entitled to receive, not only the price at which the oil was sold, but to have interest thereon as a part of the damages, from the time the defendants received the money until it is paid to them; and they further contend that they are entitled to receive the highest market price of the oil between the time that it was produced and the institution of these suits. Both of these contentions cannot stand. Their bills in these cases pray that they be decreed the amount received by the defendants for the oil produced and sold from the premises. This is inconsistent with the demand for the highest market price of such oil between the date of its production and the bringing of the suits. Plaintiffs were, however, entitled to have this money at the time the oil was converted into money. The oil was theirs, and they elected by their suits to take what defendants actually received for it, but contend that as part of their damages interest should be added to this amount until the same is paid. In this contention we think they are correct. While ordinarily interest is not recoverable as a part of unliquidated damages, still, in ascertaining the amount of damages to which one is entitled, where it appears that such damages are determined by a fixed sum, to which the plaintiff was entitled at a particular time, interest may be added to it as one of the elements constituting the amount to which the plaintiff is entitled at the time of the recovery. 8 R. C. L. 537. This was our holding in Cresap v. Brown, 82 W. Va. 467, 96 S. E. 66.

In these cases we are of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to decrees in their favor for the amounts actually received by the defendants for the oil sold by them from the premises, with interest on each of these amounts from the time the same was so received until the entry of such decrees, without any deduction therefrom for money expended by the defendants for producing and marketing such oil.

The decrees appealed from will be reversed, and the cases remanded for the entry of such decrees.

WILKIN v. H. KOPPERS CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Sept. 16, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT §356 — MASTER NOT LIABLE WHEN HIS NEGLIGENCE NOT PROXIMATE CAUSE.

Though an employer within the terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act fails to avail himself of the benefit of the statute, he is not liable for an injury sustained by an employé in the course of his employment, in the absence of negligence on the part of the former which is the proximate cause of the injury.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT §114 — MASTER MUST FURNISH SAFE ACCESS TO PLACE OF WORK.

It is the duty of the employer to provide for his employé a reasonably safe place in which to work, and reasonably safe and convenient means of access to the premises and to the places thereon assigned for work.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT §114—ACCESS TO PLACE OF WORK—MASTER NOT LIABLE FOR DANGEROUS ACCESS BEYOND HIS CONTROL.

But the scope of this duty generally is limited to the premises owned or controlled by the employer, and does not extend to a place beyond them, unless brought within the scope of employment by an express or implied provision in the contract of employment for its use by the employé in going to and returning from his work.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT §114—WHEN DUTY AS TO SAFE ACCESS REASONABLY COMPLIED WITH.

Where the only means of ingress to and egress from the place of employment is across a series of railroad tracks adjoining it, but under separate ownership and control, and there is provided for the use of the employé a public crossing, properly guarded, leading to the premises of the employer and reasonably convenient thereto, the duty of the employer to provide reasonably suitable means of access has been sufficiently complied with, so far as concerns points beyond the boundaries of his premises.

5. MASTER AND SERVANT §233(2)—WHEN SERVANT SELECTS DANGEROUS ROUTE, MASTER NOT LIABLE.

An employé, who for his own personal convenience willfully disregards such public crossing, and elects to take a shorter route over the railroad tracks, more direct, but fraught with more danger, than the public crossing, does so at his peril, and, if killed while thereon, no liability therefor attaches to the employer, though other employés daily follow the same way with the knowledge and consent of the employer.

Error to Circuit Court, Brooke County.

Action by William S. Wilkin, administrator, against the H. Koppers Company. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed, verdict set aside, and case remanded.

Jno. J. P. O'Brien and Leo A. Coleman, both of Wheeling, for plaintiff in error.

R. L. Ramsay, of Wellsburg, and W. S. Wilkin, of New Cumberland, for defendant in error.

LYNCH, J. John Tsouvalakis, plaintiff's intestate and an employé of the defendant, was killed accidentally while on his way to and about to enter upon the premises on which he was engaged to work, then only in the temporary control of the defendant, who had and exercised no right to control the operation of the railroad. The railroad right of way and tracks and the premises so controlled by defendant were not subject to joint ownership or control, but were held under different titles, though the properties lay immediately adjacent to each other. To the place of employment but two ways of approach, about half a block apart, were used by defendant's employes, and in using either of the two they were obliged to cross three tracks of the railroad company. One was a public crossing; the other a short cut used by many of its employes, with its knowledge and acquiescence, who for their own convenience preferred to cross the tracks at that point. It was this second route that the deceased took as he was approaching the plant for work on the night shift. Each of the two outside tracks was occupied by idle freight cars on the evening of the accident, and decedent either undertook to crawl under or pass between the cars on the bumpers, and then onto the middle track, where he was struck by the train and killed.

[1] Liability for decedent's death, as averred in the declaration and argued by counsel, rests solely upon the breach of the common-law duty requiring the master to provide for his servants a reasonably safe place in which to work and reasonably safe means of access thereto, without the benefit of the usual common-law defenses. They are not available because defendant, though clearly within the terms of the act, failed to elect to pay into the workmen's compensation fund the premiums provided by law to entitle him to its benefits. But even under those circumstances plaintiff's intestate cannot lawfully be entitled to the benefit of a recovery, unless death resulted from some negligent act or omission to act which at common law required the master to respond in damages. For no such liability can arise except from the wrongful act, neglect, or default of the employer or any of his officers, agents, or employes. Section 26, c. 15P (sec. 682), Code 1913; Watts v. Ohio Valley Electric Ry. Co., 78 W. Va. 144, 88 S. E. 659; Louis v. Smith-McCormick Construction Co., 80 W. Va. 159, 92 S. E. 249.

[2] The duties of a master towards his servants while upon his own premises, or premises under his control, are established by abundant authority. According to them he is bound to exercise due diligence in furnishing them with a reasonably safe place and safe appliances in and with which to work, and reasonably safe means of access to the place assigned them to work, and exits therefrom while in his employ on his premises, including, according to Jones v. Railroad Co., 74 W. Va. 666, 83 S. E. 54, L. R. A. 1915C, 428, a reasonable time and opportunity to depart therefrom. Violation of none of these duties is charged or proved against defendant. Decisions dealing with breaches of duties committed elsewhere than on the premises owned or controlled by the master include only those secured to the employe by virtue of some provision of his contract of employment, so far as we have been able to discover.

[3] Outside of decisions under Compensation Acts, the cases are few which discuss the extent of the duty of the employer to provide, beyond the limits of his own possession or control, safe means of ingress and egress to and from his premises for the convenience and safety of his employes. This lack of authority may be accounted for to some extent by the fact that Workmen's Compensation Acts have largely supplanted the common law dealing with employers' liability. The test under these acts now is: Did the injury arise out of and in the course of the employment? It would seem, however, that decisions under such statutes treating of situations analogous to the one now considered, where the plaintiff was injured while off the premises and on his way either to or from work, would properly serve as authority illustrative of the scope of the duty owed in this case. It is safe to say that, wherever at common law the duty existed to provide proper means of access to the property for the employes, an employe injured in such a situation would be held under the Compensation Acts to be within the scope of his employment. The converse, however, is not true, for these acts have been given a broader scope and meaning, permitting an employe to recover compensation he could not have recovered under common-law principles. Hence, whenever an authority is found denying a right to compensation on the ground that the injury sustained by the employe while on his way to or from work was beyond the course of his employment, it is safe to say that the same court would under similar circumstances hold that there had been no violation of the general duty to provide a reasonably safe and convenient means of access to the premises. And there is this further reason for considering decisions under compensation acts as authority in this case. Section 26, c. 15P (sec. 682), Code, provides that employers subject to the act, who have not paid into the compensation fund the premiums provided by the act, shall be liable to their employes for damages suffered by reason of personal injuries "sustained in the course of employment." Under this section, therefore, the right to recover for personal injuries caused by the wrongful act, neglect, or default of the employer is subject to the same test as the right to compensation where the employer had complied with the provisions of the act.

In De Constantijn v. Public Service Commission, 75 W. Va. 32, 83 S. E. 88, a case arising under our Compensation Act, a rule is laid down which we think is applicable to the case before us. The second point of the syllabus is:

"An injury incurred by a workman, in the course of his travel to his place of work and not on the premises of the employer, does not give right to participation in such fund, unless the place of injury was brought within the scope of employment by an express or implied requirement in the contract of employment, of its use by the servant in going to or returning from his work."

As said in the body of the opinion, the scope of the employment does not terminate at the instant the employé lays down his tools, but continues for a reasonable time thereafter, while he is preparing to leave and leaving the premises. But if, says the opinion, "the employé, at the time of the injury, has gone beyond the premises of the employer, or has not reached them, and chosen his own place or mode of travel, the injury does not arise out of his employment, nor is it within the scope thereof."

[4, 5] Likewise the duty to provide a reasonably safe and convenient means of access to the premises and plant of the employer generally is coextensive with, but not outside of, the limits of the premises under his control. There is no charge that defendant has failed in any duty so far as his own premises are concerned. But plaintiff by his declaration, proof, and argument rests his right of recovery upon the breach of an alleged duty to use adequate means to safeguard such of defendant's employes as voluntarily elected not to avail themselves of a crossing duly guarded, less dangerous, and readily accessible to them, though slightly more circuitous, but chose rather the shorter route, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the defendant, as being a more convenient way of approach to and departure from the place appointed for them to convene mornings and evenings for the purpose of registration.

An examination of some analogous cases arising under Compensation Acts proves instructive upon the issues involved. In Fumicello's Case, 219 Mass. 488, 107 N. E. 349, the material facts tended to show that an employé, while returning home at the close of the day's work, entered upon a railroad track which he had to cross after leaving his employer's premises, and there was struck by a train and killed. The court, in affirming the denial of compensation, said:

"It is plain that, if * * * it was necessary for him to pass over the railroad location, it formed no part of the employer's plant. * * * The contract of employment did not provide for transportation, or that the employé should be paid for the time taken in going and returning to his place of employment, and when the day's work had ended the employé was free to do as he pleased. If he had chosen to use the public ways, and had been injured by a defect or passing vehicle, the administrator could not recover against the employer, because there would be no causal connection between the conditions of employment and the injuries suffered. * * * The principle is the same and equally applicable where the employé uses a private way or crosses the land of another, either as a licensee or a trespasser."

By way of contrast, and as showing the difference in the rule where the route taken in going home, and on which the injury occurred, was on the employer's premises, see Stacy's Case, 225 Mass. 174, 114 N. E. 206. There the court expressly distinguished the case from Fumicello's Case on the ground that in the latter the employé was killed upon a railroad track which was not a part of the premises of the employer, while in Stacy's Case the route taken was on the premises.

Likewise, where an employé after work ceased, left the plant, walked about two blocks from the premises, and was killed at a street intersection by a car, he was held not to be entitled to compensation. N. K. Fairbank Co. v. Industrial Commission, 285 Ill. 11, 120 N. E. 457. The court said:

"When work for the day has ended, and the employé has left the premises of the employer to go to his home, the liability of the employer ceases, unless after leaving the plant of the employer the employé is incidentally performing some act for the employer under his contract of employment."

Again in Guastelo v. Mich. Cent. R. R., 194 Mich. 382, 160 N. W. 484, L. R. A. 1917D, 69, plaintiff, after quitting work for the day, left the place where he had been working to go to his bunk car a mile away. There were two routes that he could take; the shorter one being a railroad track, the other a public highway. Plaintiff elected to follow the railroad, and at a point about 600 feet down the track was injured by a passing train. The court, in denying compensation, said that it was a well-settled rule "that injuries sustained by an employé while going to or returning from the day's work, where there is no contract of transportation, are not to be regarded as arising out of or received in the course of his employment." See, to the same effect, Hills v. Blair, 182 Mich. 20, 148 N. W. 243.

Nor can a repairer of musical instruments, who slips on the ice and is injured while going to his work, be held to be injured in the course of his employment. Industrial Commission v. Anderson (Colo.) 169 Pac. 135, L. R. A. 1918F, 885. And a janitor in an office building, who was killed by coming in contact with an electric wire, just as he was leaving his home to go to work, was not in the course of his employment. Murphy v. Ludlum Steel Co., 182 App. Div. 139, 169 N. Y. Supp. 781.

In a case very similar to this—Leite v. Paraffine Paint Co., 2 Cal. Ind. Acc. Com.

948—compensation was denied where it appeared that applicant's husband, while going to work, was killed by a train on the tracks of a railroad which ran in front of the employer's premises; he having taken a short cut across the tracks, instead of walking several blocks to the one street which crossed the railroad and led to the plant.

While these cases are not directly in point, they do have a bearing upon the extent of the employer's liability to his employes, and show that even under Compensation Acts, where an employer may be held for compensation even in the absence of negligence, his responsibility is limited generally to accidents occurring on the premises. Conceding the duty of a master to provide a reasonably safe means of access to the place of employment, one that was reasonably convenient for his men to use, has defendant not fully performed the obligation? Here was a public road, crossing the railroad within reasonable distance of the plant, and adequately guarded. If the place of employment had been isolated completely from any highway, or located so as to be inaccessible, or accessible only by incurring serious risks, the law doubtless would require defendant, in the exercise of a reasonable degree of care, to provide some reasonably safe and convenient means of access for the protection of his employes in going to and from their work, as held in Patrick v. Atlas Knitting Co., 164 App. Div. 753, 149 N. Y. Supp. 845. The case last cited is the only one out of many examined that extended the master's liability beyond the premises owned or controlled by him, for the failure to provide a safe exit therefrom to a public road, and in that case there was no public crossing over the railroad tracks—no means provided for crossing to the public highway, except by trespassing on railroad property. It is interesting to note the history of that case. Upon no trial did plaintiff obtain a judgment. He was thrice plaintiff in error, and was successful only in the volume of the report cited above awarding him a new trial. See 170 App. Div. 943, 154 N. Y. Supp. 1136; Patrick v. N. Y. Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 220 N. Y. 728, 116 N. E. 1063.

No such situation existed here as was present in Patrick v. Knitting Co. There, according to the opinion, not even one safe means of ingress and egress was provided. Here there was one comparatively safe means of access, but which for his personal convenience deceased did not choose to follow, but instead elected to take another, which was slightly shorter. He made the election with full notice and knowledge of the dangerous character of the course adopted; for he saw, and seeing he must have known, the imminence of the danger, because of the presence of the freight cars on the tracks in front of him. Defendant had fulfilled its duty by providing one reasonably safe and convenient means of access for its employes. Owning no other, it therefore has breached no duty toward deceased, and is subject to no liability.

We are therefore of opinion to reverse the judgment, set aside the verdict, and remand the case.

BARFOOT et al. v. WILLIS. (No. 176.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 1, 1919.)

PUBLIC LANDS ~~§~~164 — LANDS NAVIGABLE WHEN COVERED BY TIDE SUBJECT TO ENTRY ONLY BY RIPARIAN OWNER.

Under Revisal 1905, § 1693, lands covered by water at average tide, which is navigable, are not subject to entry except by the riparian owner for wharf purposes under section 1696; hence an entry by one not a riparian owner cannot be sustained.

Appeal from Superior Court, Carteret County; Daniels, Judge.

Protest by G. A. Barfoot and others to an entry by M. L. Willis. The court dismissed the entry, and the enterer excepted and appealed. Affirmed.

This is a protest to an entry. The enterer went in front of protestant's lots, and attempted to fill in navigable water by building sand fences, and then laid his entry. On the trial the following judgment was rendered:

"This cause coming on to be heard before his honor, F. A. Daniels, judge, and a jury, at the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence the protestant asked the court to rule that upon his testimony the land was, at the time of filing his entry, covered by water at average tide, both before he built the sand fences and since they have been removed. The enterer admitted that he was not the riparian owner, that the land entered was covered by water at average tide, and that the sand fences that had been built prior to the entry had been removed, and that it was now navigable water. The court so held and dismissed the entry. It is therefore considered and adjudged by the court that the enterer is not entitled to maintain the entry, is not entitled to a grant, that the entry is invalid, and void, and that enterer pay the costs, to be taxed by the clerk.

"F. A. Daniels, Judge Presiding."

The enterer excepted and appealed.

Julius F. Duncan, of Beaufort, for appellant.

E. H. Gorham, of Morehead City, and D. L. Ward, of Newbern, for appellees.

ALLEN, J. The admissions contained in the judgment clearly show that the attempted entry is unauthorized and of no legal effect. The water, being navigable, was not the subject of entry (Rev. § 1693), except by the riparian owner for wharfage purposes (Rev. § 1696), and the enterer is not a riparian owner.

Affirmed.

(178 N. C. 184)

WOODWARD v. SAVINGS & TRUST CO.
(No. 80.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 1, 1919.)

1. BANKS AND BANKING ¶126—WHERE BANK ON WHICH CHECK DRAWN DEPOSITS IT TO CREDIT OF HOLDER, IT IS PAYMENT.

Where the holder of a check demands that the bank on which it is drawn deposit the same to his credit, and the bank credits him with the amount of the check, and the holder is not guilty of any want of good faith, the act of crediting is equivalent to a payment in money, and the bank cannot recall or repudiate the payment because, on an examination of the accounts of the drawer, it is ascertained that he was without funds to meet the check.

2. BANKS AND BANKING ¶125—RIGHT OF HOLDER OF FORGED CHECK DEPOSITING IT TO HIS CREDIT IN BANK ON WHICH DRAWN DETERMINED.

A bank, as between itself and the bona fide holder of a check, is bound to know the signature of its customers, and cannot recover from such holder money paid to him on the subsequent discovery that the drawer's name was forged; hence if a depositor presents a check which he holds in good faith, drawn on the bank by another depositor, and the check is credited to him in his account, and charged to the drawer, that is in effect a payment which the bank cannot repudiate; but in such case the depositor, if both payee and indorser of the check, is held to have knowledge of all facts except the signature of the drawer.

3. BANKS AND BANKING ¶125—HOLDER OF CHECK KNOWING NAME OF DRAWER WAS SIGNED BY ANOTHER LIABLE TO BANK PAYING IT.

Where the payee and indorser of a check knew that the one who signed the drawer's name was not the drawer herself, held that, though the bank accepted the check and credited the same to the payee's account, the bank might repudiate the check for that reason.

4. BANKS AND BANKING ¶124—RIGHTS OF BANK AND INDORSER OF CHECK PAYABLE TO HIM NOT GOVERNED BY NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS LAW.

Where one indorses a check payable to him so as to receive credit from the bank on which it is drawn, the bank simply honors an order drawn on funds in its hands, and the rights of the parties are not affected by the provisions of the Negotiable Instruments Law relating to indorsers.

5. BANKS AND BANKING ¶126—RIGHTS OF HOLDER OF FORGED CHECK DEPOSITED TO HIS CREDIT BY DRAWER BANK DETERMINED.

Where the seller of an automobile received in payment a sum in cash and a check, which the buyer signed with his mother's name, held that the seller, having recovered possession of the machine and retained the cash payment, could not recover from the drawee bank with whom it deposited the check to its account, the bank having recalled the credit on discovery that the check was not signed by the drawer, there being no showing of damage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; Devin, Judge.

Action by J. S. Woodward against the Savings & Trust Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. No error.

This is an action to recover damages against the defendant bank for charging back against the account of the plaintiff a check of $380. The jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Did the defendant represent to the plaintiff that the check for $380, signed in the name of Winnie E. Jackson, was good and would be paid? Answer. No.

"(2) Was the plaintiff induced by said representation to sell and deliver the car to Simon Jackson? Answer. No.

"(3) Did the defendant accept the check for $380, and credit plaintiff's account therewith? Answer. Yes.

"(4) Was the name of Winnie E. Jackson signed to said check without the authority, knowledge, or consent of said Winnie E. Jackson? Answer. Yes.

"(5) What damage, if any, is plaintiff entitled to recover therefor? Answer. None."

The verdict, considered in connection with the evidence and the charge, discloses the following facts: In January, 1919, the plaintiff was engaged in the business of selling automobiles in Washington under the name of the Overland Washington Company. On the morning of January 24th one Simon Jackson went to the place of business of the plaintiff about 8 o'clock in the morning, and entered into a contract for the purchase of a Ford car from one Hollowell, agent of the plaintiff, by the terms of which Jackson was to pay $20 in cash, give a paper for $100 with solvent indorsers, a check for $280, and a note for $25, secured by mortgage on the automobile. Simon Jackson had no account with the defendant bank, but he gave a check for the $280, signing the name of his mother, Winnie Jackson, as drawer, who did have an account in the bank. Hollowell took the check to the defendant bank, and asked if the check of Winnie Jackson for $280 was good, which was answered in the affirmative, Winnie Jackson having at that time $340 to her credit in the bank. Hollowell returned to the place of business of the plaintiff when the plaintiff was present, and it was then found that Simon Jackson could not secure the papers for $100, properly indorsed, and the check for $280 was then torn up, and he gave to the plaintiff as payee another check upon the defendant bank for $380, signing the name of Winnie Jackson as drawer in the presence of the plaintiff, who took this check to the bank, indorsed it, passed it across the counter, and was given credit for the same on his account as a depositor. Later in the day the defendant bank charged back the check to the account of the plaintiff, finding that Winnie Jackson did not have $380 to her credit, and that she had not authorized Simon Jackson to sign her name to the check, which the jury finds to be a fact.

The automobile was delivered to Simon Jackson on Friday, and was used by him, and, being injured, was returned to the plaintiff on Saturday for repairs.

The plaintiff, then claiming the right to hold the automobile under his mortgage to secure the $25, after advertisement sold it, and had it bought in for himself.

The plaintiff now has the automobile, $20 in cash paid by Simon Jackson, and his note for $25.

The plaintiff moved for judgment on the third issue, which was refused, and he excepted.

Judgment was rendered for the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed.

E. A. Daniel, Jr., of Washington, N. C., for appellant.

Stewart & Bryan and Ward & Grimes, all of Washington, N. C., for appellee.

ALLEN, J. [1] The weight of authority is in favor of the proposition for which the plaintiff contends, that a bank, the drawee of a check, accepting it unconditionally and passing it to the credit of the depositor, in the absence of special custom known to the depositor, cannot charge it back against the account of the depositor on the ground that it is an overdraft.

The court says in Bank v. Burkhardt, 100 U. S. 689, 25 L. Ed. 766:

"In Morse's well-considered work on Banking, p. 321, it is said: 'But if at the time the holder hands in the check he demands to have it placed to his credit, and is informed that it shall be done, or if he holds any other species of conversation which practically amounts to demanding and receiving a promise of a transfer of credit, as equivalent to an actual payment, the effect will be the same as if he had received his money in cash, and the bank's indebtedness to him for the amount will be equally fixed and irrevocable.'

"We regard this as a sound and accurate exposition of the law upon the subject, and it rests upon a solid basis of reason. The authority referred to sustains the text.

100 S.E.—20

"When a check on itself is offered to a bank as a deposit, the bank has the option to accept or reject it, or to receive it upon such conditions as may be agreed upon. If it be rejected, there is no room for any doubt or question between the parties. If, on the other hand, the check is offered as a deposit and received as a deposit, there being no fraud and the check genuine, the parties are no less bound and concluded than in the former case. Neither can disavow or repudiate what has been done. The case is simply one of an executed contract. There are the requisite parties, the requisite consideration, and the requisite concurrence and assent of the minds of those concerned. It was well said by an eminent chief justice, 'If there has ever been a doubt on this point, there should be none hereafter.' Oddie v. National City Bank of New York, 45 N. Y. 735 [6 Am. Rep. 160]."

"When a bank credits a depositor with the amount of a check drawn upon it by another customer, and there is no want of good faith on the part of the depositor, the act of crediting is equivalent to a payment in money, and the bank cannot recall or repudiate the payment because, upon an examination of the accounts of the drawer, it is ascertained that he was without funds to meet the check, though, when the payment was made, the officers labored under the mistake that there were funds sufficient. In such a case the bank could have received the check conditionally, and have come under obligations to account to the holder for it, only in the event that on an examination of the accounts of the drawer it was found he had funds to meet it, or in the event that he provided funds for its payment. Or it could have asked for time to examine the accounts, that it might determine whether it would accept and pay or dishonor the check. It would have been within the option of the holder to have accepted or rejected either of these propositions. But when the holder presented the check with his passbook, that the check might be entered as a deposit to his credit, it was a request for the payment of the check; and there can be no distinction between a request for payment in money, and a request for payment by a transfer to the credit of the holder." 3 R. C. L. 526.

To the same effect see 7 C. J. 681; Levy v. Bank, 4 Dall. 234, 1 L. Ed. 814; Bank v. Burns, 68 Ala. 267, 44 Am. Rep. 142; Bank v. Gregg, 138 Ill. 596, 28 N. E. 839, 32 Am. St. Rep. 173; Wasson v. Lamb, 120 Ind. 514, 22 N. E. 729, 6 L. R. A. 191, 16 Am. St. Rep. 345.

[2, 3] And the authorities also sustain the position that the same rule applies when the check is a forgery:

"A bank is bound to know the signatures of its customers; and if it pays a forged check it must be considered as making the payment out of its own funds, and cannot ordinarily charge the amount so paid to the account of the depositor whose name was forged." 7 C. J. 683.

"In pursuance of the rule that a bank, as between itself and the bona fide holder of a check, is bound to know the signature of its depositors, and cannot recover from such a holder money paid to him upon the subsequent discovery that the drawer's name was forged, if a depositor presents a check, which he holds in good faith, drawn on the bank by another depositor, and the check is credited to him in his account and charged to the drawer, this is in effect a payment of the check, and the bank cannot strike off the credit." 3 R. C. L. 527.

This principle was first declared by Lord Mansfield in 1762 in Price v. Neal, 3 Burrows, 1355, and has been adopted in United States v. Bank, 10 Wheat. 333, 6 L. Ed. 334; Neal v. Coburn, 92 Me. 145, 42 Atl. 348, 69 Am. St. Rep. 495; Bank v. Bank, 107 Iowa, 337, 77 N. W. 1045, 44 L. R. A. 131; Bank v. Bank, 90 Ky. 15, 13 S. W. 339, 7 L. R. A. 849; Bank v. Bank, 30 Md. 21, 96 Am. Dec. 554; Bernheimer v. Marshal, 2 Minn. 82 (Gil. 61) 72 Am. Dec. 89; Bank v. Bank, 46 N. Y. 77, 7 Am. Rep. 314; Bank v. Boutell, 60 Minn. 189, 62 N. W. 327, 27 L. R. A. 635, 51 Am. St. Rep. 519; Bank v. Bank, 10 Vt. 145, 33 Am. Dec. 188; Yarborough v. Trust Co., 142 N. C. 381, 55 S. E. 296; and, indeed, in all the states except Pennsylvania, where it has been changed by statute. Bank v. Bank, 66 Pa. 438.

These principles rest upon the presumption that the drawer knows the signature of its customer, and upon the necessity of fixing some time when there shall be no further inquiry by the one upon whom it is drawn into the integrity of commercial paper with which so much of the business of the world is done today; but the courts recognize that they are establishing a rule at variance with the principle that money paid under a mistake of fact may be recovered, and the one depositing the check, if both the payee and indorser of the check, is held to knowledge of all other facts except the signature of the drawer, and he can take no benefit from the transaction if he actively participated in the forgery, although without fraudulent intent.

This is true because the payee in the check is necessarily brought in close touch with the drawer, and has every opportunity to inquire into the regularity and genuineness of the paper.

"It would be an exceedingly harsh rule to permit one who negotiates with the forger, and obtains his check payable to the use of the party advancing the money, who then indorses it to a bank, to hold onto the money when the payee has himself contracted with the forger, and given credit to the paper by his indorsement that led the bank to believe the paper was genuine." Bank v. Bank, 90 Ky. 10, 13 S. W. 339, 7 L. R. A. 849.

"The drawee bank is held to a knowledge of the signature of the drawer, but the payee indorser is held to a knowledge of all other facts.

"The discounting bank and the drawee bank, in such a case, have the right to rely upon the indorsement of the payee, and as to him are not required to exercise any diligence to discover the fact that the check had been raised. These facts are conclusively presumed to be within the knowledge of the payee. Under such circumstances the money paid can be recovered back in assumpsit, unless, possibly, from some subsequent arrangement or cause, the right is lost. Certainly, the fact that the payee, who received the money as payee and ostensible owner, has disposed of it according to his own will, cannot in any way affect this right. The authorities cited by appellee to the proposition that if a bank pays a forged check to a holder without fault, who, in ignorance of the fraud, pays value for it, the money cannot be recovered back, are not applicable to the case at bar. Bradley was the payee, and, by his indorsement, obtained the money. He parted with nothing to get possession of the check. Its genuineness is conclusive as to him, and as indorser he guaranteed it to be genuine for the amount expressed in the check. Carpenter v. Nat. Bank, 123 Mass. 66; Nat. Park Bank v. Seaboard Bank, 114 N. Y. 28, 20 N. E. 632, 11 Am. St. Rep. 612; White v. Bank, 64 N. Y. 316 [21 Am. Rep. 612]; Susquehanna Bank v. Loomis, 85 N. Y. 207 [39 Am. Rep. 652]." Bank v. Bradley, 103 Ala. at page 119, 15 South. at page 443, 49 Am. St. Rep. 17.

"In the usual course of business, if a check purporting to be signed by one of its depositors is paid by a bank to one who, finding it in circulation or receiving it from the payee by indorsement, took it in good faith for value, the money cannot be recovered back on the discovery that the check is a forgery. It is presumed that the bank knows the signature of its own customers, and therefore is not entitled to the benefit of the rule which in cases of forgery permits a party to recover back money paid under a mistake of fact as to the character of the instrument by which the fraud has been effected. This presumption is conclusive only when the party receiving the money has in no way contributed to the success of the fraud or the mistake of fact under which the payment has been made. * * * To entitle the holder to retain money obtained by a forgery, he should be able to maintain that the whole responsibility of determining the validity of the signature was placed upon the drawee, and that the vigilance of the drawee was not lessened, and that he was not lulled into a false security by any disregard of duty on his own part, or by the failure of any precautions which from his implied assertion in presenting the check as a sufficient voucher the drawee had a right to believe he had taken. Ellis v. Ohio Ins. & Trust Co., 4 Ohio St. 628 [64 Am. Dec. 610]; Rouvant v. San Antonio National Bank, 63 Tex. 610; First National Bank of Quincy v. Ricker, 71 Ill. 439 [22 Am. Rep. 104]." Bank v. Bank, 151 Mass. 280, 24 N. E. 44, 21 Am. St. Rep. 450.

In this case the plaintiff was present and saw Simon Jackson sign the name of Winnie Jackson to the check, and he made no inquiry, except of Simon, of his authority to do so. He carried the check to the bank during business hours, and according to the evidence of the defendant, which the jury has accepted, indorsed it, and had it passed to his credit, without giving any information to the bank of the circumstances attending the drawing of the check.

The plaintiff offered evidence to the contrary, but his theory of the case has been repudiated.

Under these conditions the plaintiff cannot be permitted to recover.

[4] We have made no reference to the liability of an indorser under the Negotiable Instruments Law (Laws 1899, c. 733) because his guaranties under that law are only in favor of a holder in due course, and the drawee bank does not occupy that position. Bank v. Bank, 115 Tenn. 71, 88 S. W. 939, 112 Am. St. Rep. 817.

It pays nothing, and simply honors an order on funds in its hands.

[5] It also appears, and the jury has so found, that the plaintiff has suffered no damage, and that if he recovered $380 of the defendant it would be a recovery for which he has paid nothing.

He sold a Ford car to Simon Jackson on Friday for $425, of which $20 was paid in cash, and the balance by the check of Winnie Jackson on the defendant for $380, and the note of Simon Jackson for $25 secured by mortgage on the car.

Simon Jackson kept the car one day, and returned it to the plaintiff for repairs, there being evidence that the car was damaged, but the extent not shown.

The plaintiff then advertised the car for sale under the chattel mortgage of Simon Jackson, and at the sale had it bought for himself, and he now has the car, and $20 to indemnify him for the repairs, the amount of which he did not state, and the use of the car one day.

No error.

MITCHELL BROS. v. SOUTHERN EXPRESS CO. et al. (No. 233.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 8, 1919.)

JUDGMENT  $\S$  111—OF DEFAULT AND INQUIRY ESTABLISHES CAUSE OF ACTION ALLEGED.

Judgment of default and inquiry against a defendant who failed to plead establishes against him the cause of action alleged; so that he cannot rely on the provision in the bill of lading under which plaintiff shipped, and which was only admitted on the issue of damages, that action must be brought within six months from the injury to shipment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lenoir County; Gulon, Judge.

Action by W. A. Mitchell and another, partners as Mitchell Brothers, against the Southern Express Company and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant Adams Express Company appeals. No error.

This action was instituted by the plaintiffs against the Southern Express Company on March 13, 1914, to recover damages to a carload of horses and mules alleged to have been delivered to Adams Express Company at Cincinnati, Ohio, on October 3, 1912, and by the Adams Express Company delivered, in the city of Richmond, Va., to the Southern Express Company for transportation to Kinston, N. C., and by the Southern Express Company delivered to the plaintiffs at Kinston on October 5, 1912; the damages claimed being for alleged injury to a mule and two horses, due, among other causes as alleged, to the improper arrangement of timbers in said car. Summons was not originally issued against the Adams Express Company, but at the June term, 1915, an order was made adjudging that the Adams Express Company be made a party defendant to the action, and that summons issue against the said express company. Service was not obtained, and at the April term, 1916, another order was rendered by the court, adjudging that the said express company be made a party defendant to the action and that summons issue against it, and on May 15, 1916, which was before the convening of any court subsequent to the said April term, 1916, summons was issued against the Adams Express Company and duly served on May 19, 1916, returnable to the June term, 1916, which convened on June 12th. A duly verified complaint was filed against both of the defendants on January 26, 1916, which was before service was made upon the Adams Express Company, but was after an order adjudging that it be made a party had been rendered.

The plaintiffs seek to recover against both of the defendants the sum of $372.50 for causes as appear in the complaint. At the April term, 1918, a judgment by default and inquiry was rendered against the Adams Express Company, which company had then filed no pleading and had made no appearance in court of any nature. During the April term, 1918, of said court, and after the rendition of the judgment entitled "Judgment by Default and Inquiry," the defendant Adams Express Company for the first time made an appearance in court, and moved the court to strike out said judgment for surprise and excusable neglect, alleging that it had, soon after being summoned, instructed its district counsel to retain counsel, and that the defendant Adams Express Company was not aware that appearance had not been entered for it and that a defense had not been asserted until after the rendition of said judgment by default and inquiry. The motion to strike out the judgment was continued and was refused and disallowed by his honor, Judge Gulon, at the June term, 1919, and the action directed to proceed to trial upon the inquiry as to the amount of damages sustained by the plaintiffs.

The answer of the Southern Express Company was filed as appears of record on April 8, 1918, and the plaintiffs filed replication as set out in the record on April 8, 1918.

At the June term, 1919, when the cause came on for trial upon the whole cause of action as alleged against the Southern Express Company and upon the judgment by default and inquiry as to the Adams Express Company, the court held, upon the pleadings as to the Southern Express Company and upon the admission of the plaintiffs in open court, that the action had not been instituted within six months from the time of the injury complained of; that the plaintiffs could not recover for any amount against the defendant Southern Express Company.

The cause then proceeded to trial against the defendant Adams Express Company upon the judgment by default and inquiry.

The express company offered the bill of lading in evidence for all purposes, and the court admitted it on the issue of damages, but held that the defendant Adams Express Company would not have the benefit of the provision requiring the action to be brought within six months, because of the judgment by default and inquiry, and defendant excepted. Judgment in favor of plaintiff, and defendant appealed.

Rouse & Rouse, of Kinston, for appellant Adams Express Co.

Dawson, Manning & Wallace, of Kinston, for appellees.

ALLEN, J. There is no exception to the refusal to set aside the judgment by default and inquiry, nor is the legal effect of the provision requiring the action to be brought within six months before us, as the bill of lading was only admitted in evidence on the issue of damages.

The sole question presented is whether the judgment by default and inquiry prevents the defendant from relying upon the provision in the contract.

The effect of a judgment by default and inquiry is to establish the cause of action alleged in the complaint, and, if the recovery sought is damages, to give to the plaintiff the right to recover at least nominal damages, and no evidence is admissible tending to prove that no right of action exists.

In Hollifield v. Telephone Co., 172 N. C. 714, 90 S. E. 996, where there were two parties defendant, one of whom answered and the other of whom failed to answer, judgment by default and inquiry was rendered against the defendant who failed to answer. In discussing the question involved, the court says:

"He failed to plead, and judgment by default was entered against him, which established as against him, under our procedure, and procedure generally, the cause of action alleged in the complaint. Blow v. Joyner, 156 N. C. 140, 72 S. E. 319; Graves v. Cameron, 161 N. C.

549, 77 S. E. 841; Patrick v. Dunn, 162 N. C. 19, 77 S. E. 995; Plumbing Co. v. Hotel Co., 168 N. C. 577, 84 S. E. 1008. It was not necessary to submit an issue as to this negligence, when he admitted it by failing to answer. Justice Brown well says in Plumbing Co. v. Hotel Co., supra: "The default is an admission of every material and traversable allegation of the declaration or complaint necessary to the plaintiff's cause of action. 23 Cyc. 752. It admits all the material averments properly set forth in the complaint, and, of course, everything essential to establish the right of the plaintiff to recover. Any testimony, therefore, tending to prove that no right of action existed, or denying the cause of action, is irrelevant and inadmissible," citing Garrard v. Dollar, 49 N. C. 176, 67 Am. Dec. 271; Lee v. Knapp, 90 N. C. 171; Blow v. Joyner, supra; Graves v. Cameron, supra. This being so, the only thing left to do in regard to the resident defendant was the assessment of damages, after ascertaining the negligence of the other defendant."

This authority covers fully the exception presented, and sustains the ruling that the provision of the bill of lading was inadmissible to destroy the plaintiff's action.

No error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sampson County; Gulon, Judge.

Action by James Brewington against Clarissa Hargrove and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

On December 27, 1910, J. N. Bennett and Clarissa Hargrove, his mother, executed a mortgage to C. S. and T. A. Hines to secure certain indebtedness. The property conveyed was one tract of land the property of Bennett, consisting of 141 acres, and the other 21½ acres the property of Clarissa Hargrove. C. S. and T. A. Hines assigned the notes and mortgage to D. A. Edwards, who died in February, 1914, and his administrator is defendant in this action.

On December 13, 1915, a notice and advertisement of sale under the power contained in the said mortgage deed, which had been assigned to D. A. Edwards, were given, signed by C. S. and T. A. Hines, mortgagees, and Wilbur T. Edwards, administrator of D. A. Edwards, assignee of the mortgage. The notice specified that the sale would take place on January 16th describing the land conveyed in the mortgage. A deed executed on January 19, 1916, by C. S. Hines and T. A. Hines, mortgagees, and Wilbur T. Edwards, administrator of D. A. Edwards, assignee, recites that the property was exposed by them for sale on January 18, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon, at which sale Thomas Perrett became the last and highest bidder in the sum of $1,000, and the deed was executed to him accordingly. Perrett testified that he bought the land for J. N. Bennett, but paid no money for it; that on January 8, 1916, he conveyed these two tracts of land to Wilbur T. Edwards for $1,100 as an individual and not as an administrator. By deed December 1, 1916, Edwards conveyed the two tracts of land to Brewington the plaintiff. There was evidence to show that the 141-acre tract of land at the time of the sale was worth $3,000, to $4,000.

The jury found upon the issues submitted that Brewington, the plaintiff, purchased the 21½ acres of land formerly the property of Clarissa Hargrove without notice of any equities in her favor, and that the land was duly advertised according to the terms of the mortgage. Judgment for plaintiff for recovery of the tract of land.

The jury further found that W. T. Edwards, administrator of the assignee of the mortgage, procured Perrett as his agent to bid and purchase said land at the sale under the mortgage, and that its value at that time was $29 per acre, whereupon it was adjudged that the plaintiff is entitled to the 21½ acres of land and rents and costs, and that Clarissa Hargrove recover of Wilbur T. Edwards the sum of $406.11 with interest from December, 1916.

Stevens & Beasley, of Warsaw, and H. E. Faison, of Clinton, for appellants.

J. Faison Thomson, of Goldsboro, Fowler & Crumpler, of Clinton, and Murray Allen, of Raleigh, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. [1] There was no evidence to go to the jury to show that James Brewington purchased the 21½ acres formerly the property of Clarissa Hargrove with notice of any infirmity, and the judge properly instructed the jury to answer the first and second issue accordingly. There was no violating fact appearing on the face of the deeds in the chain of title. Smith v. Fuller, 152 N. C. 7, 67 S. E. 48. Brewington was not purchaser at the sale, but bought from Wilbur T. Edwards.

[2-4] The court properly refused to instruct the jury that the burden was upon the plaintiff to show that the land was advertised by notice published at the courthouse door and in three other public places. The deeds signed by the mortgagee and the assignee of the mortgage recited that due advertisement as required by the mortgage and by law had been made. These recitals are prima facie evidence of the fact. The acquiescence of the mortgagor in the conduct of the sale will cure any defect in this respect. Lunsford v. Speaks, 112 N. C. 608, 17 S. E. 430, cited and approved in Norwood v. Lassiter, 132 N. C. 58, 43 S. E. 509. It is true the recital is that the sale took place on January 18th, while the notice shows that the advertisement was for January 16th, but the presumption, which was not rebutted by any evidence, is that it was postponed till the 18th, and the mortgagor waived any objection on that ground by making no protest and taking no action to set aside the sale. Norwood v. Lassiter, supra.

[5] The defendants requested the court to charge the jury that, the mortgage notes having been assigned by C. S. Hines and T. A. Hines to D. A. Edwards, Edwards became only the equitable owner, the naked legal title still remaining in C. S. Hines and T.

A. Hines, and, this being so, the equitable title would only have authorized D. A. Edwards to compel a foreclosure and sale by order of court, and that C. S. Hines and T. A. Hines after the assignment of the notes simply held the legal title and having no debt against the land could not execute the power, and, the assignee of D. A. Edwards being the owner of the debt and having no power of sale transferred to him, his administrator could not sell because he was merely the equitable owner, and the attempted sale by notice from C. S. and T. A. Hines and the administrator of Edwards, assignee, was void. The court properly refused the prayer.

As both the holder of the naked legal title and the holder of the equitable title concurred and united in giving the notice and making the sale, there can be no defect in the execution of the power conferred by the mortgage. Well v. Davis, 168 N. C. 298, 84 S. E. 395.

[6] The plaintiff did not buy at the mortgage sale, but was a subsequent grantee without notice and in good faith, and takes a good title against irregularities in the sale, if any, of which he had no notice. Hinton v. Hall, 166 N. C. 480, 82 S. E. 847; 27 Cyc. 1494.

Rev. § 1031, authorizes the personal representative of a mortgagee or trustee who is vested with power of sale in the mortgage or trust deed to advertise and sell under said power. Whether this would confer the like power upon the executor or administrator of the assignee of the mortgage is a question not presented on this record.

Affirmed.

L. J. UPTON & CO. v. FEREBEE et al.
(No. 169.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 1, 1919.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨933(4)—GRANT OF NEW TRIAL UPHELD ON ANY GOOD GROUND JUSTIFYING IT.

A grant of a new trial generally will be upheld if there is any ground which would justify it.

2. ESTOPPEL ⇨110, 112—EQUITABLE ESTOPPEL MUST BE PLEADED.

An estoppel must be pleaded with certainty and particularity, unless the cause is one falling within an exception, as where the pleadings are general and a party has no opportunity to enter his plea.

3. ESTOPPEL ⇨110—ESTOPPEL IN PAIS MUST BE PLEADED.

Where plaintiff contracted with a tenant to furnish the seed for a potato crop and the contract was signed by the landlord for the illiterate tenant, the landlord's estoppel from asserting his lien on part of the crop must be pleaded in order to be available in an action by plaintiff to recover crop taken by the landlord.

4. ESTOPPEL ⇨120—INSTRUCTION AS TO DEFENDANT'S AIDING IN EXECUTION OF PAPER INSUFFICIENT, NOT EXPLAINING TERM.

In an action by one who furnished seed potatoes to a tenant whose landlord executed the contract on behalf of the tenant, an instruction setting up the claim of estoppel against the landlord which referred to the landlord's aiding in the execution of the paper held insufficient; there being no explanation of that term.

5. ESTOPPEL ⇨52—REQUISITES OF "ESTOPPEL IN PAIS."

To constitute an "estoppel in pais" or equitable estoppel, there must be conduct amounting to a representation or a concealment of material facts, such facts must be known to the party estopped or knowledge thereof imputable to him and unknown to the opposite party, and such conduct must be done with intent that it will be acted on by the other party, and furthermore such conduct must in fact be acted upon.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Estoppel in Pais.]

6. ESTOPPEL ⇨120 — INSTRUCTION NOT REQUIRING RELIANCE ON DEFENDANT'S ACT TO INJURY OF PLAINTIFF ERROR.

Where one who furnished seed potatoes to a tenant asserted that the landlord was estopped because he executed contract on behalf of the tenant who could not write from claiming any part of the crop, an instruction which merely set out the fact of the landlord's execution, etc., held insufficient, not requiring the finding that there was a concealment or otherwise by the landlord upon which plaintiff relied to his damage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pamlico County; Daniels, Judge.

Action by L. J. Upton & Company against S. W. Ferebee and another. Verdict for plaintiff was set aside and plaintiff allowed to amend, whereupon plaintiff excepted and appealed. No error.

This is an action to recover 14 barrels of Irish potatoes, which the defendant Ferebee took possession of. On the 13th day of November, 1916, L. J. Upton & Co. entered into a contract with one Anthony Avery, a tenant of Ferebee, which contract was signed for Anthony Avery, who could not write, by S. W. Ferebee, who was his landlord. Under this contract the plaintiff and the defendant agreed to plant and grow on equal shares during the spring and summer season of 1917 a crop of Irish Cobbler potatoes. Upton furnished the seed potatoes, 14 bags, furnished the fertilizer, on the basis of 2½ bags to each bag of seed potatoes, and the defendant Anthony Avery was to cultivate and harvest said crop. One-half of the crop was to be the property of Upton and the other one-half the defendant's. And under the seventh paragraph of the contract Upton & Co. agreed to purchase the one-half of the crop, the property of the defendant at the price of $2.50 per barrel delivered on cars at Stonewall. It is admitted that all of the potatoes raised by Avery were grown from the seed potatoes furnished by Upton; that all the barrels were furnished by Upton and all the fertilizer used to grow the potatoes was furnished by Upton.

⇨For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

The defendant Ferebee, after the potatoes were harvested and delivered to Upton at the railroad station, took 14 barrels of the same, claiming them to be due him for rent.

The defendant set up his title as landlord in his answer, and there was no plea of an estoppel by the plaintiff.

His honor charged the jury, in part, as follows:

"Now, I charge you, gentlemen, that if the evidence satisfies you by its greater weight that Ferebee knew that it was the intention of Upton to take and Avery to give a paper disposing of the whole of the potato crop to be grown on Ferebee's lands by Avery, and aided in the execution of the paper with this knowledge and permitted Upton to furnish seed potatoes, fertilizer, and barrels under the terms of said paper to Avery, then Ferebee would be estopped to claim any of the potatoes, and you should answer the first issue yes."

The jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Are the plaintiffs owners of the property described in the complaint? Answer: 'Yes.'"

"(2) What was the value of the potatoes at the time of the seizure? Answer: '$9 per barrel.'"

His honor then set aside the verdict as matter of law and allowed the plaintiff to amend by pleading an estoppel, and the plaintiff excepted and appealed.

Moore & Dunn, of Newbern, for appellant.
D. L. Ward, of Newbern, and Z. V. Rawls, of Bayboro, for appellees.

ALLEN, J. [1-3] The judge presiding at the trial set aside the verdict as matter of law, without assigning any reason, and his ruling may be sustained upon the ground that the case was submitted to the jury upon the question of estoppel when no such issue was raised by the pleadings.

"An estoppel which 'shutteth a man's mouth to speak the truth' should be pleaded with certainty and particularity. 8 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 11. The court should be able to see from the pleadings what facts are relied upon to work the estoppel." Porter v. Armstrong, 134 N. C. 455, 46 S. E. 1000. And this case does not come within the exceptions to the rule, holding that it is not necessary to plead an estoppel when it is apparent on the face of the record, or when the pleadings are general, as in ejectment or trespass and the party has had no opportunity to enter the plea (Wilkins v. Suttles, 114 N. C. 558, 19 S. E. 806; Weeks v. McPhail, 129 N. C. 73, 39 S. E. 732), because in his answer the defendant alleges the tenancy and his claim as landlord, thus affording the opportunity to meet these allegations by pleading the facts relied on to create the estoppel.

This seems to have been the opinion of his honor, as he made the order a part of his judgment that the plaintiff be "allowed to amend his complaint as he may be advised setting up an estoppel against the defendant Ferebee."

[4] We are also of opinion the charge was not sufficiently specific, and that it omitted an important and material element of an estoppel in pais, or by conduct.

In view of the conflict in the evidence as to the circumstances attending the execution of the contract between the plaintiff and the defendant Avery, the plaintiff offering evidence that Ferebee read the contract and the defendant denying this, there ought to have been some explanation of what was meant by aiding in the execution of the paper, and of the difference in legal effect between signing the name of Avery because he could not write, and doing so after reading.

[5, 6] There is, however, a more serious objection to the charge, in that it collects the evidentiary facts relied on by the plaintiff, and instructs the jury, if found to exist, they constitute an estoppel, leaving out of consideration that the conduct of the defendant must be the equivalent of a representation that he would make no claim as landlord, and was so understood by the plaintiff, and relying thereon the plaintiff entered into the contract, and furnished fertilizer, etc.

In other words, the agent of the plaintiff who negotiated the contract and the defendant both testifying that nothing was said about rents or of the rights of the landlord, it was for the jury to say whether the conduct of the defendant amounted to a representation, which was relied on by the plaintiff, while his honor decided these questions as matter of law.

Mr. Pomeroy, in Equity Jurisprudence (volume 2, § 805 [2d Ed.]), states the following as the requisites of an "estoppel in pais," or equitable estoppel:

"(1) There must be conduct—acts, language, or silence—amounting to a representation or a concealment of material facts. (2) These facts must be known to the party estopped at the time of his said conduct, or at least the circumstances must be such that knowledge of them is necessarily imputed to him. (3) The truth concerning these facts must be unknown to the other party claiming the benefit of the estoppel, at the time when such conduct was done, and at the time when it was acted upon by him. (4) The conduct must be done with the intention, or at least with the expectation, that it will be acted upon by the other party, or under such circumstances that it is both natural and probable that it will be so acted upon. There are several familiar species in which it is simply impossible to ascribe any intention or even expectation to the party estopped that his conduct will be acted upon by the one who afterwards claims the benefit of the estoppel. (5) The conduct must be relied upon by the other party, and, thus relying, he must be held to act upon it. (6) He must in fact act upon it in such a manner as to change his position for the worse."

The same principles are declared in Lumber Co. v. Price, 144 N. C. 57, 56 S. E. 684, and Hardware Co. v. Lewis, 173 N. C. 295, 92 S. E. 13, and in Boddie v. Bond, 154 N. C. 365, 70 S. E. 826, where the court says:

"In order to constitute an equitable estoppel, there must exist a false representation or concealment of material fact, with a knowledge, actual or constructive, of the truth; the other party must have been without such knowledge, or, having the means of knowledge of the real facts, must not have been culpably negligent in informing himself; it must have been intended or expected that the representation or concealment should be acted upon, and the party asserting the estoppel must have reasonably relied on it or acted upon it to his prejudice. 16 Cyc. 722; Eaton's Equity, p. 169. It is a species of fraud which forms the basis of the doctrine, and to prevent its consummation is its object."

In this case there was no concealment of any fact, as the agent of the plaintiff knew he was contracting with a tenant and that Ferebee was the landlord, and if it was the intention to release rents, and was so understood, it is strange that Ferebee was not asked to make himself a party to the contract.

There is no error in setting aside the verdict.

No error.

STEPHENSON v. CITY OF RALEIGH.
(No. 256.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 8, 1919.)

1. TRIAL ¶29(3)—REMARK OF COURT ON CROSS-EXAMINATION NOT PREJUDICIAL.

In an action against a city for injuries, remark of the trial judge in the presence of the jury during plaintiff's cross-examination of defendant's mayor, a witness, as to the answer, which the mayor had sworn to, "You are just quibbling over that," held not erroneous as reflecting on plaintiff's counsel so as to prejudice his standing or case before the jury.

2. TRIAL ¶29(3)—PREJUDICIAL REMARK OF COURT CURED BY INSTRUCTION TO DISREGARD.

Remark of the trial judge during plaintiff's cross-examination of defendant's witness, if objectionable and prejudicial as reflecting on plain-tiff's counsel, held cured by the court's direction to the jury in his charge to disregard it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Allen, Judge.

Action by Mrs. W. D. Stephenson against the City of Raleigh. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. No error.

This was an action for the recovery of damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant in failing to keep a walkway habitually used for the public in a reasonably safe condition. Verdict and judgment for defendant. Appeal by plaintiff.

Douglass & Douglass, of Raleigh, for appellant.

John W. Hinsdale, Jr., of Raleigh, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. James I. Johnson, mayor of Raleigh, testified to the ordinance, which was put in evidence forbidding any person to use the grass plats in any of the city parks for walkways and prohibiting any new carriage or walkways to be made in any city park except by the approval of the board of aldermen. The plaintiff's counsel asked the witness the following questions:

"You swore to the answer in this case? A. Yes. Q. Do you swear positively that she did not get hurt? A. No. Q. Do you admit that she did get hurt? A. No, I swore to that on information and belief. Q. Who informed you that she was not hurt? A. I assumed it as a whole. I deny that the hole was left there negligently by the city. Q. How came you to admit that she walked and denied she fell? A. Because I had been notified that she had walked there, and I deny that there was a dangerous hole there and that she was hurt. Q. Why didn't you admit that she fell there?"

At this stage of the cross-examination, his honor stated, in the presence of the jury, "You are just quibbling over that." The plaintiff excepted to this statement of the court.

[1] We cannot see that the remark was any such reflection on counsel as to prejudice his standing, or his case before the jury. The judge was simply calling to his attention that he was taking up the public time in asking irrelevant and unnecessary questions. There have been rare occasions in which the trial judge has made remarks which seemed to be a serious reflection upon the counsel, and on appeal to this court we have in such cases granted a new trial, as in Perry v. Perry, 144 N. C. 329, 57 S. E. 1, which was cited and approved, Bank v. McArthur, 168 N. C. 53, 84 S. E. 39, and other cases there cited. These cases hold:

"Any remarks of the presiding judge, made in the presence of the jury, which have a tendency to prejudice their minds against the unsuccessful party, will afford ground for a reversal of the judgment."

The presiding judges should be, and usually are, very careful to use no expression that will be disparagement to counsel, or any intimation of opinion upon the merits of the case then on trial. On the other hand, counsel should not unnecessarily consume the time of the court on irrelevant matters, and, when this is being done, the judge should restrict counsel to the matter in hand. We see in the words excepted to no reflection upon counsel or prejudice to the cause he was representing, and nothing more than an effort to restrict the investigation to matters really pertinent to the trial.

[2] Besides the courteous gentleman, who was the presiding judge on this occasion, used the following language in his charge:

"I want to retract one word or remark which I used when the counsel was examining Mr. Johnson and I interrupted and I said it was 'quibbling.' I should not have used that word. I only meant that they were contending about a matter of pleadings, and that it was, to my mind, not throwing any light on the question that we were trying, and I therefore made the remark, and I only meant that it was a contention between counsel about pleadings, and I did not intend to intimate anything about the merits of the case, and I will ask you to dismiss that from your mind."

Even if the remark had been objectionable and capable of the construction that it was prejudicial, it would have been cured, except possibly where there has been a serious abuse of the powers of the court.

The court has held in numerous cases that error in the admission of improper evidence is cured where it is afterwards withdrawn and the jury instructed to disregard it. Ellison v. Tel. Co., 163 N. C. 5, 79 S. E. 277; Harrison v. Tel. Co., 163 N. C. 18, 79 S. E. 281; Toole v. Toole, 112 N. C. 152, 16 S. E. 912, 34 Am. St. Rep. 479; Gilbert v. James, 86 N. C. 245; McAllister v. McAllister, 34 N. C. 184.

For a stronger reason, when a remark of a judge has been made which might seem improper, the error can be cured, if erroneous, by the same instruction to the jury and its express retraction as in this case.

Justice John H. Clarke, now of the United States Supreme Court, then United States District Judge in Ohio, in the course of a written opinion said:

"This court cannot refrain from observing in this connection that the old notion that a suit at law or in equity is chiefly a game, affording an opportunity for the matching of wits of counsel and for the exercise of the ingenuity of courts, is fast giving place to the conception that suits, both at law and in equity, should be sincere and candid attempts to reach the real point of difference between the parties to them, and to secure a just settlement of such difference." Coulston v. Steel Range Co. (D. C.) 221 Fed. 669, 672.

As was said by this court some years ago, a trial is a solemn, serious investigation of the matters in controversy with the sole object of ascertaining the truth of the facts at issue and the application of the law in the interests of justice, "it is not a game in which the object is to catch the judge out on first base." Wilson v. Mfg. Co., 120 N. C. 96, 26 S. E. 629. Trivial matters should be excluded by the trial judge, and in so doing there is no ground for reversal on appeal.

The other exceptions raised do not require any discussion.

No error.

SINGLETON v. ROEBUCK. (No. 178.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 1, 1919.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶231(3) — GENERAL OBJECTION TO EVIDENCE PARTIALLY COMPETENT INSUFFICIENT.

In view of rule 27 of the Supreme Court (81 S. E. xi), plaintiff's general objection fails to evidence which was at least competent as corroborative; plaintiff not having asked that the evidence be restricted to that purpose.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶925(1) — IT WILL BE ASSUMED THAT WITNESSES UNDERSTOOD COURT'S CAUTION.

The Supreme Court must assume that witnesses understood and observed the court's caution not to speak of anything said by persons living, or interested at the time in the controversy.

3. EVIDENCE ¶158(27) — DEFENDANT COULD TESTIFY HIS DEED COVERED LAND IN DISPUTE AND AS TO POSSESSION.

In an action to recover land, it was competent for defendant to state that his deed covered the land in dispute, and that he was let into possession of the same, for he was stating facts within his knowledge.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶231(3) — GENERAL OBJECTION TO EVIDENCE CORROBORATIVE OF WITNESS INSUFFICIENT.

In view of rule 27 of the Supreme Court (81 S. E. xi), in an action to recover land, question as to a certain corner, in form competent, and the answer that a certain person showed such corner to the witness, being corroborative of such other person as a witness, held competent under general objection only.

5. EVIDENCE ¶109 — WITNESS COULD TESTIFY HE KNEW LOCATION OF CORNER OF LAND IN CONTROVERSY.

In an action to recover land, it is competent for a witness, when asked about a corner at a pine, to state that he knew where the stump was.

6. BOUNDARIES  $\Leftrightarrow$ 35(2)—HEARSAY AND REPUTATION AS TO PRIVATE BOUNDARY ARE ADMISSIBLE.

Under certain restrictions, both hearsay evidence and common reputation are admissible on questions of private boundary.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR  $\Leftrightarrow$ 1050(2)—ADMISSION OF IMMATERIAL EVIDENCE HARMLESS.

In an action to recover land, testimony of two witnesses, which, if erroneously admitted, was immaterial, held harmless.

8. EJECTMENT  $\Leftrightarrow$ 9(3), 86(1) — BURDEN OF PROOF OF TITLE RESTS ON PLAINTIFF.

In an action to recover land, the burden rests wholly on plaintiff, who must recover, if at all, on the strength of his own title, and not on the weakness of defendant's.

9. APPEAL AND ERROR  $\Leftrightarrow$ 231(9) — GENERAL EXCEPTION TO CHARGE PARTIALLY CORRECT IS INSUFFICIENT.

Where some parts of the charge to which plaintiff took exception are clearly correct, plaintiff not having singled out the erroneous part, his exception must fail.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Gulon, Judge.

Action by R. P. Singleton against W. B. Roebuck. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. No error.

This action was brought to recover the land described in the complaint. Defendant denied plaintiff's title and alleged ownership in himself. There was a controversy as to the location of lines and boundaries, which presented the question in dispute as to the true ownership. Verdict and judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appealed.

Albion Dunn and S. J. Everett, both of Greenville, for appellant.

Julius Brown, F. O. Harding, and D. M. Clark, all of Greenville, for appellee.

WALKER, J. The record in this case has been amended under a writ of certiorari. As the record was originally, it appeared that the court had ruled out certain testimony of a witness, Noah Moore, to the effect that Roebuck had bought wood which had been cut from the land. This was competent, and if no amendment had been made, there would have been error. But the amendment has removed it from the case.

[1, 2] First. There was general objection to evidence, which was, at least, competent as corroborative, and plaintiff did not ask that the evidence be restricted to that purpose. The objection fails. Rule of this Court, No. 27 (81 S. E. xi) Dunn v. Lumber Co., 172 N. C. 129, 90 S. E. 18; Ricks v. Woodard, 159 N. C. 647, 75 S. E. 735. This applies to testimony of Mr. Roebuck as to declarations of Mr. Gray and Mr. Perkins. Besides, the court warned witnesses not to speak of anything said by persons who are living or who were interested, at the time, in the controversy. We must assume that the witnesses understood the caution and observed it.

[3] Second. It was competent for defendant to state that his deed covered the land in dispute and that he was let into possession of the same. Why not? He was stating facts within his knowledge.

[4] Third. The question as to the Crandall corner, and the answer thereto, were properly admitted, in the absence of proper objection. The question was, in form, competent, and the answer that Perkins showed the corner to the witness was corroborative of Perkins, who had before been examined as a witness, about it. Under a general objection, it was competent. Rule 27, and cases supra. His honor, too, again repeated the warning as to statements of living or interested declarants.

[5-7] Fourth. It was competent for the witness, when asked about the corner at the pine, to state that he knew where the stump was, and, besides, it appears to have been harmless and not prejudicial. Buckner v. Railroad Co., 164 N. C. 201, 80 S. E. 225, and is not of sufficient importance, if erroneous, to cause a reversal. There are several of the many exceptions to evidence which are covered by the court's caution and instruction to the witnesses not to state anything told to them by living or interested persons. We will not consider them serialim. It is sufficient to say that the judge required the witnesses to comply with the rule, as to declarations concerning boundaries, established by this court, and thus stated:

"It is the law in this state that under certain restrictions both hearsay evidence and common reputation are admissible on questions of private boundary. Sasser v. Herring, 14 N. C. 340; Shaffer v. Gaynor, 117 N. C. 15 [23 S. E. 154]; Yow v. Hamilton, 136 N. C. 357 [48 S. E. 782]. The restrictions on hearsay evidence of this character—declarations of an individual as to the location of certain lines and corners—established by repeated decisions, are: That the declarations be made ante litem motam; that the declarant be dead when they are offered; and that he was disinterested when they were made. Bethea v. Byrd, 95 N. C. 309 [59 Am. Rep. 240]; Caldwell v. Neely, 81 N. C. 114." Hemphill v. Hemphill, 138 N. C. 504. 51 S. E. 42.

Most, if not nearly all, of the objections may be thus fully met, without further discussion. The surveyor's testimony, as to the Jesse Griffin land division, if erroneously admitted, was harmless. It was immaterial, having no connection with the controversy, and the same may be said of the testimony of J. J. Gray. He might show where his corner was, if he knew its location. If material, it was competent, and if immaterial, as claimed, it worked no harm, and certainly no substantial harm.

Fifth. Plaintiff complains that the court did not sufficiently caution witnesses and the jury as to declarations of living or interested witnesses; but we think that he did do so, and in language that could not be misunderstood.

[8] Sixth. As to the charge, we do not think that plaintiff's criticism of it is warranted. The court placed the burden, at the outset, distinctly upon the plaintiff. He stated that the latter must recover, if at all, upon the strength of his own title, and not upon the weakness of the defendant's, and that no burden rests upon the latter. It is all upon the plaintiff. He could not have been more explicit, or correct, on this part of the case. The defendant was not required, by the law, to introduce any evidence. He might rely on that of the plaintiff, and on his ability to show that plaintiff's contention on his own showing was erroneous, and that he had not located his land, or proved his right to recover. The court was arraying the contentions of the parties, and its meaning was that, if plaintiff had offered evidence which satisfied them by its preponderance that his claim was correct, he was entitled to their verdict, and that if the defendant had not introduced evidence tending to show, and sufficient to show, that plaintiff was mistaken in his contention, he would be taking a chance to lose the verdict. He was balancing the contentions of the parties as against each other. The language, if prejudicial to either side, was more against the defendant than against the plaintiff, for there was no burden on the former at all. It was the duty of plaintiff to make out his case, and not rely on the inability of the defendant to sustain his contention, or to show any title.

Speaking of the burden of proof in ejectment, the court says in Moore v. McClain, 141 N. C. 473, 478, 54 S. E. 382, 385:

"The plaintiff having shown a prima facie title, it behooves the defendants to show a superior title. The burden of proof upon the issue was upon the plaintiff. She alleged title, and the defendants denied it. Showing a prima facie title did not shift the burden of proof upon the issue, but imposed upon the defendants the duty of 'going forward' with their evidence. The distinction is clear and well illustrated in Meredith v. Railroad, 137 N. C. 478 [50 S. E. 1], and Board of Education v. Makely, 139 N. C. 31 [51 S. E. 784]."

That is what the judge evidently meant in this case, not that the defendant was required to offer any evidence at all, but that, if he did not do so, while it was still his right to attack and overcome his adversary's case, he might take the risk of an adverse verdict, if he failed to go forward with evidence. He could not well have intended anything else, as he had already told the jury that the burden of proving his case rested upon the plaintiff throughout the trial. The meaning of the court, as we have stated it, is made perfectly plain by the following instruction:

"I charge you further that, in connection with the defendant's chain of title, he has offered in evidence his grant and chain of title for the purpose of showing that his grant and deed cover the same land as is contended to be covered by plaintiff in his grant and deed, not for the purpose of establishing title in himself, because there is no burden upon defendant to establish title in him, because plaintiff himself must establish his own title, but the defendant has offered such evidence which he contends ought to be sufficient to satisfy you that the weight of plaintiff's evidence is not sufficient to locate the land, contended for by him."

[9] It may be further stated that, as there are some parts of the charge to which this exception is taken which are clearly correct, and as plaintiff has not singled out the erroneous part, his exception must fail. Nance v. Telegraph Co., 177 N. C. 313, 98 S. E. 838; State v. Evans, 177 N. C. 564, 570, 98 S. E. 788, and cases cited; State v. Ledford, 133 N. C. 722, 45 S. E. 944. We said in the Nance Case, supra:

"Defendant should have separated the 'good from the bad,' and objected only to the latter, as the objection must be valid as to the whole of the testimony. We will not set off the bad for him, and consider only that much of it, upon the supposition that his objection was aimed solely at the incompetent part. He must do that for himself. This is the firmly established rule."

The thirteenth assignment of error, the last one being merely formal, is subject to the same objection. The particular error is not pointed out and excepted to; there being several different propositions in the instructions, some of which are plainly correct. Nance v. Telegraph Co., supra. But, when the entire charge is considered, especially the statement of defendant's contention, it is apparent that the court did not mean that it required more than seven years' adverse possession to ripen the title, but seven years or more would be sufficient, and the jury so understood it. He indicated seven years as the minimum period, and the expression was doubtless used because the evidence showed such a possession for more than seven years, and the judge had stated the plaintiff's contention to be that he had occupied the land adversely for more than seven years, or "for seven years and upward," without any correction from the plaintiff. The court sufficiently instructed the jury that they should decide with the plaintiff, if they found that he had been in adverse possession, as had been contended by him.

There was no substantial error in the rulings or charge of the Court, if error at all, and, even if there was slight error, it is not of sufficient importance to warrant a reversal (Griffin v. Railroad Co., 138 N. C. 55, 50 S. E. 516), and the instruction as to adverse possession was responsive to plaintiff's contention, as stated by the court, and not questioned at the time by him (Griffin v. Railroad Co., supra).

The case has been correctly tried, as we think, without prejudice to any just right of the plaintiff.

No error.

(178 N. C. 175)

PRODUCE TRADING CO. v. NORFOLK SOUTHERN R. CO. (No. 14.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 1, 1919.)

1. CARRIERS ⇐187 — WHICH WAS INITIAL CARRIER QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action for damage to or loss of a shipment of potatoes, whether defendant railroad or a steamboat company was the first carrier in the line of continuous transportation to final destination held a question for the jury.

2. CARRIERS ⇐177(3)—IMMATERIAL WHETHER INITIAL CARRIER OF INTERSTATE SHIPMENT WAS NEGLIGENT.

It was immaterial under the Carmack Amendment to the Interstate Commerce Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8604a, 8604aa), as to a shipment of potatoes by several carriers, whether the initial carrier was negligent, for initial carrier was answerable for the negligence of succeeding carriers.

3. CARRIERS ⇐185(1) — CONNECTING CARRIER MUST SHOW DELIVERY TO SUCCEEDING CARRIER IN GOOD CONDITION.

Where there was evidence of the good condition of a shipment when loaded on the car of an intermediate carrier, the burden was on such carrier to prove the shipment continued in the same good condition as when received until it had been delivered to the next carrier.

4. INDEMNITY ⇐13(1) — REMEDY OVER OF INITIAL CARRIER AGAINST NEGLIGENT CONNECTING CARRIER.

An initial carrier, liable under the Carmack Amendment to the federal Interstate Commerce Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8604a, 8604aa) for damage to the goods in the hands of any succeeding carrier, has a remedy over against the carrier in default, if it was not itself negligent.

5. CARRIERS ⇐76—ADJUSTMENT OF LOSS EQUITABLE ASSIGNMENT TO CONSIGNOR OF CONSIGNEE'S CLAIM FOR DAMAGES.

Where goods are shipped on open bills of lading, so that title passes, but the price of the goods to the consignee is docked the amount of any loss or damage, the adjustment amounts to an equitable assignment to the consignor of the consignee's right to recover of the carrier.

6. CARRIERS ⇐177(3)—ON RECONSIGNMENT, NEW DESTINATION REGARDED AS ORIGINAL ONE IN DETERMINING LIABILITY.

When the consignor controls the bill of lading, or has the right to change the destination or divert the goods to a new one, a reconsignment does not break the connection; but the new destination is regarded as the original one, to determine the liability of the initial carrier under the Carmack Amendment to the Interstate Commerce Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8604a, 8604aa).

7. CARRIERS ⇐132—WHERE SHIPPER LOADS AND COUNTS, BURDEN OF PROOF OF DAMAGE ON HIM.

Where a shipper undertakes to load and count the goods, the carrier's burden of proof is shifted, and the shipper must affirmatively show his damage.

8. CARRIERS ⇐186 — NUMBER OF CARS IN SHIPMENT QUESTION FOR JURY.

In the shipper's action for injuries to several shipments of potatoes, the question as to the number of the cars, being one of identity, held for the jury under the evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pasquotank County; Devin, Judge.

Action by the Produce Trading Company against the Norfolk Southern Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. No error.

First Shipment—Second Issue.—Plaintiff sued for damages sustained in the shipment of potatoes, and he especially relied on negligence in the transportation of four lots, some of which were either injured or lost. The inquiry in regard to those damages is covered by the second, fifth, sixth, and tenth issues. The first shipment of 200 barrels was to Elizabeth City, N. C., at which place, on the wharf of defendant, the potatoes were deposited by the North River Steamboat Company; it having been brought by that line from one of its landings on the river at Jarvisburg, N. C., June 14, 1917, under a bill of lading in which they were consigned by the plaintiff to itself—destination not mentioned, but left blank. These potatoes were loaded in defendant's cars, and they were carried to Berkley, Va., and by telegraph ordered to be reconsigned there to John A. Eck, at Chicago, Ill. When they were loaded in cars at Elizabeth City, N. C., a through way bill, or shipping instructions, reading from Jarvisburg, N. C., to Berkley, Va., was handed by the agent of the steamboat line to the agent of defendant at Elizabeth City. Ten barrels of these potatoes were lost in transit, and the market price of the others had fallen 50 cents per barrel, by reason of the delay in shipment, causing the consignor to lose that much from the contract price, as the consignee exacted that much in reduction of the amount due by them.

Second Shipment—Fifth Issue.—This shipment contained 200 barrels of potatoes, consigned by plaintiff to Lally Bros., at Chicago, Ill. Four barrels were lost in transit, and the rest were delayed in shipment and damaged by delay. The car was in bad condition, and was marked, "Car in bad order, shop when empty." These potatoes were brought by the North River Line to Elizabeth City, N. C., from Morris' Wharf, N. C., a landing on the river, on June 18, 1917. The goods moved from Elizabeth City by defendant's line and connecting carriers to Chicago, Ill. Plaintiff claims as damages $330.

Third Shipment—Sixth Issue.—The bill of lading in this case was issued by the defendant at Pasquotank, N. C., on June 19, 1917, in the name of the Produce Trading Company, as consignor and consignee, destination Berkley, Va., for 175 barrels of potatoes, and the bill was indorsed "S. L. & C.," meaning "shipper's load and count." The car left Pasquotank on June 19, arrived at Berkley, Va., at 4:10 p. m. the same day, and the next day, June 20, 1917, plaintiff by telegraph reconsigned it at that place to Zivi & Co., Chicago, Ill., route Star Union. Plaintiff alleged damage to 7 barrels of the potatoes and delay in transporting the remainder of them, whereby, as to the latter part of the shipment, plaintiff lost $1.50 per barrel by the decline in the price. The claim is for $28, on account of the lost barrels of potatoes, and $256.50 for the loss in price of the others.

Fourth Shipment—Seventh Issue.—This was 207 barrels of potatoes received by defendant at Bishop's Cross, and consigned to Watson & Sons, Chicago, Ill., on June 17, 1917. When the car of potatoes arrived at its destination, it was found to be short 9 barrels, for which plaintiff claimed damages in the sum of $90.

Upon the verdict, the court gave judgment for the total amounts assessed by the jury under the foregoing issues, and defendant appealed.

Thompson & Wilson, of Elizabeth City, and W. B. Rodman, of Norfolk, Va., for appellant.

Aydlett, Simpson & Sawyer, of Elizabeth City, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). We have only given an outline of the several causes of action upon which the four sets of issues above set out were framed, preferring to mention the other pertinent facts in this opinion, when dealing with each shipment separately.

[1, 2] The first set of issues related to the shipment of potatoes by the plaintiff via the North River Line to Elizabeth City, N. C., from a landing on the river. The evidence tends to show that various shipments were made to that place, and there assembled for transportation, after being assorted, to distant points in other states. It did not appear clearly at the trial whether the defendant, or the North River Line, was the first carrier in the line of continuous transportation to the final destination, and the court, therefore, very properly submitted the question to the jury to say how this was. There was testimony which would authorize a decision either way, and the evidence was not conclusive of the question for either side. The proper course was therefore taken, for the decision of the question depended upon how the jury should find the facts to be. There was no destination stated in the original bill of lading, and defendant contends that the shipment was intended for Berkley, Va., from which place it was reconsigned to John A. Eck Company, at Chicago, Ill. It would be impossible to hold, as a matter of law, that defendant was not the first carrier, as to do so we would have to ignore all the evidence as to the position held by the North River Line. In the first place, it was for the jury to say whether Berkley was originally intended as the destination, when its destination was left blank in the bill of lading. We cannot assume in law that it was so intended to be. The jury had the right to consider the bills of lading in connection with the other relevant testimony, and they would have to do so, in order to give the true effect to the transaction. Having decided that defendant was the initial carrier, it made no difference, under the Carmack Amendment (Act June 29, 1906, c. 3591, § 7, pars. 11, 12, 34 Stat. 595) to the Interstate Commerce Act (Act Feb. 4, 1887, c. 104, § 20, 24 Stat. 386 [U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8604a, 8604aa]), as to this shipment, whether defendant was chargeable with negligence, either in respect to the loss of the potatoes or any part thereof, or of the damage to them. This, we take it, is conceded by the defendant; but, if not, it is correct as a principle of the law applicable to this case.

But the defendant argues that the steamboat company was engaged in interstate commerce, and therefore it must have been the first carrier, and not the defendant. But the conclusion does not follow from the premise. Counsel rely on the following authorities to sustain their position: Texas, etc., Railroad Co. v. Sabine Tram Co., 227 U. S. 111, 33 Sup. Ct. 229, 57 L. Ed. 442; S. P. Terminal Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 219 U. S. 498, 31 Sup. Ct. 279, 55 L. Ed. 310; Railroad Commission v. Worthington, 225 U. S. 101, 32 Sup. Ct. 653, 56 L. Ed. 1004. But the question there was not as to who was the initial carrier within the meaning of the Carmack Amendment, but whether the defendant carriers were engaged in interstate commerce, and therefore subject to the rates prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and not to those of the state Railroad Commission. We will refer further to only one of those cases, which is typical of all of them; the others being practically like it.

In Railroad Co. v. Sabine Tram Co., supra, we understand the case and decision to be this: A shipment of lumber, destined by the purchaser for export, was made by the seller under a local bill of lading from an interior point in Texas to a Texas Gulf port, at which the lumber was unloaded without delay by the purchaser's order into slips or docks, in reach of ship's tackle, and was then loaded into chartered ships, by which it was carried to foreign ports. Such shipment, not being an isolated one, but typical of many others, constitutes foreign commerce, as the court held, and as such is governed by the tariffs on file with the Interstate Commerce Commission, to the exclusion of the rates established by the state Railroad Commission, although the seller had no connection with the lumber after it reached the railway terminus, and had no concern with its destination after it came into the hands of the purchaser, and no knowledge thereof, and although the lumber had no definite foreign destination at the time of the initial shipment. But this, according to our conception, is far from holding that the first railroad which handled the lumber at Rutliff, in Texas, and destined for Sabine, was an "initial carrier." The court held that the connecting carriers, all in Texas, from the first to the last, were subject to the federal tariffs as to switching charges, as they were engaged in interstate commerce.

[3] The second shipment was from plaintiff, at Morris' Wharf, N. C., on the North River Line, to Lally Bros., Chicago, Ill., and the court held that the steamboat company was the initial carrier, and called upon the jury to inquire and find whether the defendant, who was an intermediate carrier, was actually negligent in respect to the loss of four barrels of potatoes and damage to the others, and liable therefor, as a question of fact. We do not see why the case is not fully covered by Meredith v. Railroad Co., 137 N. C. 478, 50 S. E. 1, assuming the contract of carriage to have been that defendant, as an intermediate carrier, agreed to transport the goods over his own line and to deliver them to the next carrier on the route in the same condition that he received them. The consignor or consignee does not know the facts, and it must be difficult, if not impossible, to prove them. The carriers do know them, or should know them. It is easy for any of the carriers to prove that he delivered them in good order to the next carrier, but not so for the consignor or consignee. In such a case, Justice Connor says, citing 3 Wood on Railroads, 1926, Railroad Co. v. Tupelo Co., 67 Miss. 35, 7 South. 279, 19 Am. St. Rep. 262, and Railroad Co. v. Emrich, 24 Ill. App. 249, that—

"On proof that any carrier on the route received the goods in good condition, the burden of proof rests upon such carrier to show delivery in the same condition to the next carrier or to the consignee; it being peculiarly and almost solely within its power to make such proof."

He supports the proposition by many authorities, and among them 1 Elliott on Ev. 141; U. S. v. Railroad Co., 191 U. S. 84, 24 Sup. Ct. 33, 48 L. Ed. 106; Brintnall v. Railroad Co., 32 Vt. 665 (opinion by Poland, J.); Ellis v. Railroad Co., 24 N. C. 138; Aycock v. Railroad Co., 89 N. C. 321; Lindley v. Railroad Co., 88 N. C. 547; Phillips v. Railroad Co., 78 N. C. 294. In the Meredith Case, supra, reference is made to Mitchell v. Railroad Co., 124 N. C. 238, 32 S. E. 671, 44 L. R. A. 515, as follows:

"The principle is applied in an able and exhaustive opinion by Mr. Justice Douglas. It is true that he was discussing the question in respect to the burden of proof as applied to the last carrier, but we can see no reason why the same rule does not apply when the first or contracting carrier is sued. In both cases the plaintiff's cause of action is based upon the assumption of a duty and the breach thereof. The same reason which requires the last carrier to show performance of the duty applies with equal force to the first—that the sources or means of proving the exculpatory facts are peculiarly within its knowledge, and not otherwise open to the plaintiff. It would be a difficult, if not a vain, undertaking on the part of the plaintiff to locate the time and place at which his goods were injured, or where the delay of 14 days occurred. Every reason which justifies the rule as to the first carrier applies with equal force to the other. It assumed the duty of safely, and within a reasonable time, conveying the goods to Wilmington and delivering them to the Coast Line"

—that railroad company, the Coast Line, being the next carrier, and also the last one in the route.

Chief Justice Smith said, in the Lindley Case, supra:

"The obligation resting on each attaches as the goods pass into its custody, and ceases only when safely carried and delivered to the successor."

The court also says in the Meredith Case that the license cases (State v. Morrison, 14 N. C. 299; State v. Emery, 98 N. C. 668, 3 S. E. 636; State v. Glenn, 118 N. C. 1194, 23 S. E. 1004) also support the doctrine as to the prima facie case and the burden resting upon the carrier of going forward with its proof of facts peculiarly within its knowledge, or of taking the risk of defeat as the prima facie case carries the case to the jury; the principle of all such decisions being really the same. 1 Elliott on Ev. 141, says:

"The fact that the party having peculiar knowledge of the matter fails to bring it forward may raise a presumption or justify an inference in favor of his adversary's claim, and thus shift the burden of proceeding in order to win; but the burden of establishing the issue is not shifted, nor is it ordinarily determined in the first instance, by the mere fact that a negative is involved, or that some fact is peculiarly within the knowledge of the adverse party."

We cannot see why, under this reasonable and firmly established principle, there is not enough shown in this case to bring it within the operation of the same. There was sufficient evidence of the good condition of the potatoes when loaded on the defendant's car, and when they reached their destination the car was in a bad plight. The defendant should have offered evidence that it continued in the same condition it was when started by it on its journey until it had been delivered to the next carrier in the line of transportation; the prima facie case being enough to carry the case to the jury. We therefore hold that the charge with reference to this shipment was correct.

[4] The third shipment contained 175 barrels of potatoes, originated at Pasquotank, or Elizabeth City, N. C., and was consigned by plaintiff to itself at Berkley, Va., and by its direction reconsigned, at that station, to Zivi & Co., Chicago, Ill. The defendant was the initial carrier, and consequently was liable, under the Carmack Amendment, for any loss or damage occurring during the carriage, whether caused by its negligence or not. Its remedy is one against the defaulting carrier, if it was not itself negligent. This shipment is governed by the principle already discussed.

The fourth shipment contained 207 barrels of potatoes, consigned by plaintiff at Bishop's Cross, N. C., to C. A. Watson & Sons, at Chicago, Ill. This consignment is governed by the same rules heretofore discussed and applied, where defendant was the first carrier, and no further comment is necessary.

We will now consider some general questions raised by the defendant, together with the assessment of damages on each of the shipments.

[5] It is urged that the bills of lading were open, which means that the consignor neither retained the title nor any interest in the goods, and the defendant insists that, this being so, the property in the goods passed from consignor to consignee at the time of delivery to the carrier, and the plaintiff, therefore, not being injured by any loss or damage sustained, is not the proper party to sue for the same. But, while that is perhaps true, nothing else appearing but the straight consignment and delivery to the carrier, there may be such an arrangement between the two parties, consignor and consignee, as to change the ordinary rule arising out of that simple relation and to entitle the consignor to sue for the loss or damage. Has such a change been wrought in this case? We are of the opinion that there has been. If the goods were either lost or damaged by the wrong or negligence of the carrier, and on demand of the consignee, and afterwards, by mutual consent of the parties, the price of the goods was docked by as much as the loss or damage, and the settlement made on that basis, we cannot see why this does not amount to an equitable assignment to the consignor of the consignee's right to recover of the carrier, and to the extent that the consignor has been required to reduce the price he has suffered a loss by the negligence of the carrier. Whether you consider it as an assignment to the consignor of the consignee's right to so much against the carrier, or as a loss of so much indirectly to the consignor by the negligence, or as ultimately a sale on the account of the consignor, it seems to us that the latter should have the right to sue. We have said that by the consignment under such a bill of lading the title prima facie passes to the consignee, which does not, however, exclude the idea that the consignor has not lost all and every right in the shipment. The consignee gets the title, so that he may sue for the specific recovery of the goods, and damages for any loss or injury to them by the carrier, if he elects so to do; but he may settle with the consignor, or so agree with him, that the latter may acquire the right to recover for any loss or damage he may have suffered. The case falls within the principle of Aydlett v. Railroad Co., 172 N. C. 47, 89 S. E. 1000; Buggy Co. v. Railroad Co., 152 N. C. 122, 67 S. E. 251; Summers v. Railroad Co., 138 N. C. 295, 50 S. E. 714; Railroad Co. v. Guano Co., 103 Ga. 590, 30 S. E. 555; Cardwell v. Railroad Co., 146 N. C. 218, 59 S. E. 673.

But, if this is not so, the consignee would not have received the goods, but for this arrangement, and he had the right of reasonable inspection for the purpose of ascertaining their condition and rejecting them, if damaged. 6 Cyc. 465. If the consignee could refuse to receive the goods, on account of injury to them caused by the negligence of the carrier, a reduction in price allowed to induce a receipt of them would be the loss of the consignor, for which he should recover of the carrier, as he is the party aggrieved, and to the extent of this loss has an interest in the shipment. The court charged that the loss must have been charged back to the consignor. We can see, in the record, testimony sufficient to show that there was damage or loss in respect to each shipment.

[6] We have assumed as correct, in our discussion of the case, the position of defendant that the reconsignment at Berkley, or elsewhere, would not make a new shipment, or change the initial point in the line of transportation, and thus break its continuity, so as to bring the defendant's liability within the operation of the Carmack Amendment as to the first carrier. Atchison, T. & S. F. Railroad Co. v. Harold, 241 U. S. 371, 36 Sup. Ct. 665, 60 L. Ed. 1050; Missou- ri, etc., Railroad Co. v. Ward, 244 U. S. 383-388, 37 Sup. Ct. 617, 61 L. Ed. 1213; Myers v. Railroad Co., 171 N. C. 194, 88 S. E. 149. When the consignor controls the bill of lading, or has the right to change the destination or divert the goods to a new one, this does not break the connection; but the new destination is regarded as if it were the original one. Myers v. Railroad Co., 171 N. C. 190, 88 S. E. 149.

[7] The letters on the bills, "S. L. & C.," meaning "shipper's load and count," merely changed the burden of proof. If they have not been there the carrier had loaded and counted the goods, the burden would have been upon it, if there had been any loss or damage; but, where the shipper undertakes to load and count the goods, this burden is shifted, and the latter must affirmatively show his damage. This burden was properly placed on him by the judge, and, there being some evidence of the loss and damage, there was no error on this score.

The judge could not have nonsuited the case upon the ground that there was no evidence. In the case of S. L. & C. shipments, these letters required explanation, and besides there was some evidence upon all phases of the case, so far as defendant's negligence is concerned, when we consider and apply the rule stated in Meredith v. Railroad Co., supra, and the other authorities cited in connection therewith. There was also evidence as to the damages and plaintiff's right to recover them, and in respect to those instances where the defendant company has been acquitted of negligence, it is liable, whether or no the loss or damage occurred on its line, under the Carmack amendment.

The jury found that, while the defendant was not the initial carrier, it was guilty of individual negligence, or that the loss or damage by negligence took place on its line, and that in the other instances it was liable under the Carmack Amendment, and assessed the damage, for which the judgment was entered. There was no error in the rulings which vitiated the verdict.

Before closing, we will say, in answer to the position taken by defendant in its supplemental brief, that the cases of Ch. & W. C. R. Co. v. Varnville F. Co., 237 U. S. 597, 35 Sup. Ct. 715, 59 L. Ed. 1137, Ann. Cas., 1916D, 333, and Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Harold, 241 U. S. 371, 38 Sup. Ct. 665, 60 L. Ed. 1050, have not been overlooked. We have not held, in this case, that an intermediate or delivering carrier is liable for a loss or damage not shown to have happened while the goods were in its possession. We have, on the other hand, held defendant liable as the initial carrier, or when it was not such, but an intermediate one, we have so held it liable, because there was some evidence, under the principle of Meredith's Case, that the loss did actually occur on its line. Nor have we failed to give the defendant the benefit of the position that a reconsignment, at an intermediate point, under an exchange bill of lading, did not constitute two separate and distinct shipments. Atchison, etc., R. R. Co. v. Harold, supra. Nor do we think that this case, owing to its peculiar facts, falls within the principle of Galveston, etc., R. R. Co. v. Wallace, 223 U. S. 481, 32 Sup. Ct. 205, 56 L. Ed. 516. There is testimony here which, in at least one view of it, tends to show that the North River Line took no part in a continuous shipment from Jarvisburg to the final destination in the West, but merely delivered the potatoes at Elizabeth City, where all the lots of potatoes were assembled, and there weighed and reassorted, and then started on their interstate journey to Chicago, Ill., or elsewhere in some other state. The bill of lading was not, in this case, of such a decisive character as to preclude inquiry as to whether it was really that of defendant as the initial carrier, and the matter was properly left to the jury.

We have not found it necessary to consider the case of Paper Box Co. v. Railroad Co., 177 N. C. 351, 99 S. E. 23, but have decided the case on other grounds.

[8] The question as to the number of the cars was one of identity, and was for the jury to decide upon the evidence.

We have endeavored to review all of defendant's material points, and, after doing so, no error is found.

No error.

Where defendants' claim to personal property exemption was denied on other grounds, held, that on appeal the denial was not sustained on the claim that finding of defendants' residence was insufficient.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sampson County; Gulon, Judge.

Action by J. E. Befarraah and another against T. F. Spell and wife. From a judgment for plaintiff which denied the request of defendants to have set apart to them personal property exemption, defendants appeal. Reversed.

See, also, 176 N. C. 193, 96 S. E. 949.

This is an action to collect certain notes given for the purchase price of a stock of goods. The facts are as follows:

On March 28, 1917, N. J. Aboud, a merchant at Roseboro, N. C., sold to the defendant T. F. Spell his entire stock of merchandise for the sum of $4,000, $500 of which was paid in cash, and the balance represented by notes as set out in article 2 of the complaint, said notes being secured by a mortgage deed upon the dwelling house and premises of the defendant I. V. Spell, situate in the town of Roseboro. There was no mortgage or other lien given upon the stock of merchandise. On the same date, to wit, March 28, 1917, said notes and mortgage were duly transferred and assigned to the plaintiffs, J. E. Befarraah and F. Nassif, trading as the Raleigh Bargain House.

Default having been made in the payment of the second note, the plaintiffs sued out an attachment in the superior court of Sampson and seized said stock of goods. Upon motion of the defendant, said warrant of attachment was vacated and set aside; and thereupon, at the request of the plaintiffs, a receiver was appointed to take charge of said stock of goods, wares, and merchandise, sell the same, and hold the proceeds pending the final judgment in this action. Said goods were sold and the net proceeds from said sale were deposited with W. F. Sessoms, clerk of superior court.

This case was first tried by his honor Judge Calvert at February term, 1918, and the plaintiffs were nonsuited. An appeal was taken to the Supreme Court, and at the fall term thereof said judgment of nonsuit was set aside and a new trial ordered. See Befarraah v. Spell, 176 N. C. 193, 96 S. E. 949. In the meantime, upon the petition of J. E. Befarraah, a member of the firm constituting the Raleigh Bargain House, he was made a party plaintiff and allowed to file a complaint, which he did at August term, 1918.

The certificate of the Supreme Court having been certified down, this cause again came on for hearing before Judge O. H. Gulon, at February term, 1919. The defendants, Spell and wife, requested his honor to set apart to them their personal property exemption in the funds deposited with the clerk of the superior court. His honor denied the request, and upon motion of the plaintiff Befarraah, and upon the complaint and answer, his honor held that the claim of the plaintiffs constituted a purchase-money lien upon the stock of goods, wares, and merchandise sold to the defendant, and that they were not entitled to any personal property exemption in said goods or the moneys derived from the sale thereof. Judgment was entered in accordance with the foregoing ruling, from which the defendants, Spell and wife, appealed to the Supreme Court.

Grady & Graham, of Clinton, for appellants.

Butler & Herring, of Clinton, for appellees.

ALLEN, J. [1, 2] A vendor's lien for the purchase money "does not attach to personalty" (39 Cyc. 1804), and in this state we have gone further, and have refused to follow the English doctrine giving such a lien in sales of land.

"Ever since the leading case of Womble v. Battle, 38 N. C. 182, decided in 1844, it has been settled in this state that a vendor of real estate who has conveyed it by deed has no lien upon the land for the purchase money, and that the English doctrine of the purchase-money lien does not obtain here." Lumber Co. v. Lumber Co., 150 N. C. 288, 63 S. E. 1048, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 843.

It follows that his honor was in error in holding that the plaintiff was entitled to a lien upon the proceeds of the sale of the stock of goods to secure the purchase-money notes, and, there being no lien, the defendant is entitled to his exemption, unless he has waited too long, or his application cannot be made because no execution or process has issued to enforce payment of the plaintiff's judgment.

[3] The statute (Revisal, § 695), following the language of the Constitution (article 10, § 1), gives to each resident of the state a personal property exemption of $500 out of his own property as against an execution or other final process, which is to be set apart on his demand, and, unlike the homestead exemption, which must be allotted before levying upon the land, the right to the exemption may be insisted on at any time before the sale, or the appropriation of the property by the court, "at the last moment" (Gardner v. McConnaughey, 157 N. C. 482, 73 S. E. 125), and the order of the court directing the payment of the money is final process within the meaning of the Constitution.

The case of Chemical Co. v. Sloan, 136 N. J. 122, 48 S. E. 577, is decisive of both points. In that case the action was brought to recover money, the proceeds of the sale of certain fertilizers, alleged to have been unlawfully converted by the defendant, a resident of this state, as agent of the plaintiff. The latter sued out an attachment upon the allegation in its affidavit that he had attempted to dispose of his property and was about to dispose of and secrete the same with the intent to defraud the plaintiff and his other creditors. The attachment was levied on personal property of the defendant, the value of which was less than $500. The property so attached, being perishable, was sold by the sheriff under an order of the court, and the sheriff held in his hands the proceeds of the sale subject to the further order and direction of the court. The defendant claimed his exemption out of the money so held by the sheriff. The plaintiff resisted the claim upon the ground that the demand for the allotment of the exemption was not made until after the sale. The court ordered the allotment to be made by the sheriff. The defendant moved to vacate the attachment, but the court denied the motion. There had been no judgment in the case, and consequently no order directing the application of the money to the payment of the plaintiff's claim. The court said, in discussing the question presented:

"We do not see why the defendant is not entitled to his exemption upon the foregoing facts. The Constitution exempts the personal property of any resident of this state to the value of $500 from sale under execution or other final process. This language is too plain and explicit for any possible misunderstanding of its meaning. It is only when the property is about to be subjected to the payment of a debt by final process that the last opportunity is left to the defendant to claim his exemption. At any time before this stage of the proceeding is reached he may make his demand and become entitled to an allotment of the exemption. This is perfectly clear without light upon the subject from any of the authorities. A warrant of attachment is mesne process, and is nothing more than a provisional remedy. It is ancillary to the relief sought in the principal action, and is intended to preserve the property, or its proceeds if it has been sold as perishable, in the hands of the sheriff or in the custody of the law to abide the event of the suit. The defendant may demand his exemption when the warrant is levied on his property and it is taken out of his possession, or he may wait until the final process is issued and the property is about to be appropriated by sale to the satisfaction of the same."

The facts in the Sloan Case were more favorable to the plaintiff than in this, because in the Sloan Case the motion to dissolve the attachment was denied, while in this it was allowed.

[4] The plaintiff also objects to the allotment of the exemption because it does not appear that the defendant is a resident of this state, but, as this objection was not made in the superior court, and the ruling of his honor was on a different ground, and the defendant was engaged in business in Sampson county, we would not be justified in denying the right to the exemption because of lack of more definite and specific finding as to residence.

Upon the record as it now stands the male defendant is entitled to his exemption.

Reversed.

(178 N. C. 163)

MORTON et al. v. PINE LUMBER CO.
(No. 219.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 8, 1919.)

1. LOGS AND LOGGING §3(14)—CHILDREN OF DECEASED OWNER MAY ENJOIN CUTTING TIMBER ON DEFAULT IN PAYMENTS.

Where the owner of timber lands died, the lands descending to his infant children, and the lumber company, to which he had granted the right to cut timber within 10 years, with the privilege of renewal for 10 years on payment of $10 annually, and its assignee, had not tendered the extension money to the children within the time required for the first payment, nor to any one with right to create a permanent interest in their property, the children are entitled to enjoin the cutting of timber and to recover damages for that cut after the 10 years.

2. DOWER §56(1, 2)—UNTIL DOWER ALLOTTED POSSESSION AND RIGHT OF HEIRS IN TIMBER LANDS SUPERIOR TO WIDOW.

Until dower was allotted in a decedent's timber lands, the possession and right thereto was in his infant children as his heirs, and his widow had no power to bind the children concerning the land in any way, as by accepting from a lumber company money required by its contract to give it the right to cut timber for 10 additional years.

3. LOGS AND LOGGING — 3(14)—FAILURE TO TENDER YEARLY EXTENSION MONEY CAUSING FORFEITURE OF TIMBER CONTRACT.

Failure of grantee of right to cut timber from a decedent's land, and also of its assignee, to pay the $10 per year extension money for the first year after the original 10 years for which the contract was made, held to work a forfeiture of the entire contract, which permitted a 10-year extension on the payment of $10 annually; such contracts being strictly construed, and the particular one requiring the extension money to be paid or properly tendered year by year.

4. GUARDIAN AND WARD — 42 — EXTENSION OF TIMBER CONTRACT OF DECEASED FATHER BY GUARDIAN REQUIRES COURT'S APPROVAL.

Under Revisal 1905, §§ 1788, 1789, 1798, 1800, a sale of his ward's realty by a guardian is allowed only on petition filed, and the order must in all cases have the supervision and approval of the judge, and tender to the guardian of infant children, heirs of a deceased owner of timber lands, by the grantee of the right to cut timber, of money necessary by the contract to extend the right to cut for 10 years, could not be sanctioned or made effective by the mere receipt of the money by the guardian, but required a court proceeding.

5. LOGS AND LOGGING — 3(7)—EFFECT ON HUSBAND'S DEATH OF JOINDER BY WIFE IN HUSBAND'S SALE OF TIMBER.

Where a husband and wife granted the right to cut timber from his lands, and the husband died, the land descending to his children as his heirs, the widow was not entitled to receive from the grantee of the right to cut timber or its assignee money necessary to be paid to extend the term of the contract for another 10 years merely because she was one of the grantors of the original deed.

Allen, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Onslow County; Gulon, Judge.

Action by Dena Morton, guardian of Ernest Loyd and Junie Loyd, against the Pine Lumber Company. From judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Civil action to restrain cutting of timber and for damages determined on final hearing before his honor, O. H. Gulon, Judge, at April Term, 1919, of the superior court of Onslow county. The court was of the opinion that, on the pleadings and exhibits made in the cause, plaintiffs had shown no right to relief, and thereupon adjudged that defendants go without day. Plaintiffs excepted and appealed.

Duffy & Day and E. M. Koonce, all of Jacksonville, and Cowper, Whitaker & Allen, of Kinston, for appellants.

Frank Thompson, of Jacksonville, and L. R. Varser, of Lumberton, for appellee.

HOKE, J. On the hearing it appeared: That on April 8, 1905, John Loyd, owner, with his wife, in consideration of $30, conveyed to the Swansboro Lumber Company the timber of every description of 12 inches and upward standing and growing upon three tracts of land aggregating 103 acres, with right to cut same at any time within 10 years from date of the deed with the privilege of renewal for 10 years on request of grantee, etc., and on payment of $10 annually for said period. For the same consideration for like period, the right to build all necessary tracks and tramways, etc., was also conveyed, with privilege of cutting any timber under said size to be used in construction. In same deed there was also conveyed a permanent right of way for a railroad 60 feet wide over said land and, with the stipulation that the owner should not cut during these periods any timber from said land, under the size 12 inches, except what was necessarily required for fencing and further that the parties of the first part should pay all taxes and assessments upon said land and timber so long as the contract should remain in force, etc. That soon after the execution of this deed and contract, John Loyd, the owner, died, leaving him surviving, his widow Dena (now intermarried with Gardock Morton), and two children, plaintiffs in this suit, Ernest Loyd and Junie Loyd, who were then and are now infants. That nothing further was done under the contract until April 6, 1915, when the Swansboro Lumber Company, grantee in the deed, paid to Dena Morton $10 and took a written receipt therefor signed by said Dena and her then husband, Gardock Morton, specifying that the same was in payment for one year's extension on the timber deed of Mr. Loyd and wife. And thereafter, to wit, on 25th of March, 1916, the Swansboro Lumber Company having conveyed their interest to the Pine Lumber Company, and Dena Morton having meantime qualified as guardian of plaintiffs, the said Pine Lumber Company paid to said guardian $50 and took a written receipt therefor specifying that same was a payment in full for five years' extension for the right and privilege of cutting said timber.

It appeared further that the said Pine Lumber Company were preparing and intended to cut the timber from said land, claiming that they had the legal right to do so under their deed from the Swansboro Lumber Company and by virtue of the payments referred to.

In a recent case before the court (Lumber Co. v. Wells, 171 N. C. 262, 88 S. E. 327), it was said to be the correct deduction from many of our decisions on the subject, "that standing lumber is realty," subject to the laws of devolution and transfer applicable to that kind of property, and that lumber deeds, such as this, convey an estate of absolute ownership defeasible as to all timber not cut and removed within the specified period, citing Williams v. Parsons, 167 N. C. 529, 83 S. E. 914; Midyette v. Grubbs, 145 N. C. 85, 58 S. E. 795, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 278; Lumber Co. v. Corey, 140 N. C. 477, 53 S. E. 300.

And further that stipulations for an extension of time are in the nature of options, and that they do not in themselves create any interest in the property, but amount only to an offer to create such interest when the conditions are performed and working a forfeiture when not strictly complied with. Citing Waterman v. Banks, 144 U. S. 394, 12 Sup. Ct. 646, 36 L. Ed. 479; Thacher v. Weston, 197 Mass. 143, 83 N. E. 360; and other cases. And again that "where * * * the time first provided for" in a deed of this character "has passed, and it becomes necessary for the grantee to hold by reason of the performance of the stipulation for an extension, the estate or interest arises at the time the conditions are complied with, and, in the absence of any provision in his deed to the contrary, the price paid belongs to him who then has the title and from whose ownership the interest is then created. The option or privilege obtained, to the extent of the right conferred, is a contract attendant on the title, and, as stated, unless otherwise provided in the deed conveying the title, the price for the interest arising on proper performance of the conditions will inure to the owner. It is from his estate that the interest passes, and he must receive the purchase price."

In further illustration of the principle, it was held in another case in the same volume, Carolina Lumber Co. v. Bryan, 171 N. C. 265, 88 S. E. 329, that when the owner has died—during the first period—nothing else appearing, the title descended to the heirs, and that they, and not the executor, are entitled to receive the purchase money.

[1] On the facts presented and a proper application of these principles approved in Mizell v. Lumber Co., 174 N. C. 68, 93 S. E. 436, and many other cases, we are of opinion that the restraining orders heretofore issued in the cause should be made permanent and defendants perpetually enjoined from any further cutting of timber. On the death of John Loyd, the owner, the land descended to the infant plaintiffs, his children and heirs at law, and on the record there is no valid claim or suggestion that any tender of the extension money was ever made to them within the time required for the first payment nor to any one having lawful right to create or convey a permanent interest in their property.

[2-5] Until dower is allotted, the possession and the right thereto was in the heirs, and the widow as such had no power to bind them in any way concerning it. Fishel v. Browning, 145 N. C. 71, 58 S.

E. 759. The payment of the money to the widow, therefore, for the first year's extension, just two days before the time limit had expired, could not affect their interest, and there being no other payment within that time for the first year's extension, this of itself would work a forfeiture, for these contracts, as stated, are to be strictly construed, and the agreement requires that the extension money should be paid or properly tendered year by year. Eureka Lbr. Co. v. Whitley, 163 N. C. 47, 79 S. E. 268; Rountree v. Cohn-Bock Co., 158 N. C. 153, 73 S. E. 796; Bateman v. Lbr. Co., 154 N. C. 248, 70 S. E. 474, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 615; Product Co. v. Dunn, 142 N. C. 471, 55 S. E. 299. And if it were open to consideration, the attempted payment to the guardian is equally without effect; this being for the 5 years following the first year. A perusal of our statutes on the subject will show that the power of a guardian to make disposition of his ward's real estate is very carefully regulated, and a sale is not allowed except on petition filed, and the order must in all cases have the supervision and approval of the judge. Rev. §§ 1800, 1798, 1788, 1789. And this tender, which, as we have seen, when rightly made, serves frequently to create or convey an interest in the real estate of the infant ward, could not be sanctioned or made effective by the mere receipt of the guardian, but would require a court proceeding where the ward's interest could be supervised and cared for, as the law contemplates and directs. Le Roy v. Jacobski, 136 N. C. 443, 48 S. E. 796, 67 L. R. A. 977. On examination the present contract affords us apt instance and illustration of the wisdom of the provisions of our law on the subject. The suggestion that by the terms of the deed the wife could receive the extension money as one of the grantors of the deed is without merit. It being made to appear that the land belonged to her deceased husband if her name is included in the "granting clauses of the deed as one of the parties of the first part," this prima facie should only serve to pass the rights appertaining to her as wife of the owner, her inchoate right of dower, etc., and beyond that would be regarded as a mere formality. And even since the Martin Act, empowering the wife to contract and deal as if she were a feme sole (Laws 1911, c. 109), the covenants and stipulations in such a deed should not be allowed to affect her except to the extent of her interest and would give her no power to bind the owners of the inheritance unless otherwise clearly and plainly expressed in the instrument. Coble v. Barringer, 171 N. C. 445, 88 S. E. 518, L. R. A. 1916E, 901, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 281; 13 R. O. L. pp. 1325, 1326; 2 Devlin on Deeds, § 955.

There is error, and this will be certified that a judgment for permanent injunction be entered.

Reversed.

ALLEN, J. (dissenting). I do not agree to the disposition of this case, because there was no one in being at the time of the expiration of the time for cutting the timber to whom the money for the extension could be paid; as the title had descended to infants without guardian and the money was paid to the guardian as soon as one was appointed and before one year of the extension period had expired.

I also think, in any event, provision ought to be made for the return of the amount paid to the guardian.

KING GROCERY CO. v. SOUTHERN EXPRESS CO. et al. (No. 298.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 15, 1919.)

CARRIERS  $\Leftarrow$  137½, New, vol. 3 Key-No. Series—INCONSISTENT FINDINGS AS TO LIABILITY INSUFFICIENT TO SUSTAIN JUDGMENT.

In action against express companies for negligence, a finding by the jury that the S. company, which transported the butter, is not liable for the loss, is inconsistent with a finding that the A. company, which was organized subsequently to the loss and succeeded to the business of the S. company, is liable, and cannot support a judgment against the A. company.

Appeal from Superior Court, Robison County; Calvert, Judge.

Action by the King Grocery Company against the Southern Express Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff against the defendant American Railway Express Company, which excepted and appeals. Reversed.

The defendant the American Railway Express Company appealed. The following is the charge of the court and the issues, to all of which the defendant specifically excepted:

"Gentlemen of the Jury: There are some issues to be submitted to you. The first is: 'In what sum, if any, is the defendant American Railway Express Company indebted to the plaintiff on account of the loss of merchandise, as alleged in the complaint?'

"If you find the facts to be as testified to, you will answer that issue: '$2.68.'

"The second issue is: 'In what sum, if any, is the defendant Southern Express Company indebted to the plaintiff on account of the loss of merchandise, as alleged in the complaint?' If you find the facts to be as testified to, then you will answer this issue: 'Nothing.'

"Third. 'Did the plaintiff file claim with the defendant Southern Express Company within the time provided by statute?' If you find the facts to be as testified to, you will answer that issue: 'Yes.'

"Fourth. 'Did the defendant fail and refuse to pay said claim within three months after the filing of same?' If you find the facts to be as testified to, you will answer that 'Yes,' also."

"Upon the jury's answer to the foregoing issues, the court as a matter of law answered the fifth issue: 'In what sum is the defendant American Railway Express Company indebted to the plaintiff on account of penalty for failure to pay said claim within the time provided by statute?' '$50.00,' to which the defendant American Railway Express Company excepted."

McLean, Varser, McLean & Stacy, of Lumberton, for appellant.

Johnson & Johnson, of Lumberton, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The uncontradicted evidence is, and it is admitted, that the merchandise was shipped prior to the incorporation and organization of the American Railway Express Company. The claim of $2.68 was filed with the Southern Express Company on May 3, 1918. The American Railway Express Company was organized during the recent war as a war measure, for the better operation and control of the express business of the country. At the time this butter was damaged, this company was not in existence; but whether it is liable for the acts and negligence of the Southern Express Company we will not determine on this appeal. It is manifest that there is an inconsistency in the findings of the jury. Under the instructions of the learned judge the jury have found that the Southern Express Company is not liable to the plaintiff on account of the loss of merchandise as alleged in the complaint. It necessarily follows that if the Southern Express Company, which transported the butter and is alleged to have caused the damage by its negligence, is not liable, then the American Railway Express Company, although it succeeded to the business of the Southern Express Company, cannot be liable.

The case of Friedenwald v. Tobacco Works, 117 N. C. 545, 23 S. E. 490, is not in conflict with this proposition. In that case there was a transfer of all the property rights and franchises of one corporation to a new company organized by the same stockholders and the same directors for the purpose of carrying on the same business. It was held that the new corporation was liable for the debts of the old; it being practically the same business conducted by the same persons under a new name.

In the case at bar no liability has been established against the Southern Express Company; consequently, as the negligence was not the fault of the American Express Company, it cannot be liable if the Southern Express Company is not.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 8, 1919.)

1. TRIAL ⇨165—ON MOTION FOR NONSUIT, PLAINTIFF'S TESTIMONY TAKEN AS TRUE.

On a motion for nonsuit, the testimony in support of plaintiff's claim must be taken as true and construed in the light most favorable to him.

2. CARRIERS ⇨175 — REFUSAL TO DELIVER A BREACH FOR WHICH INITIAL CARRIER LIABLE.

Refusal to deliver without bill of lading by terminal carrier on receipt of message from initial carrier directing such delivery held a breach of duty on the part of the terminal carrier for which the initial carrier might be held liable under the Carmack (U. 3. CARRIERS ⇨70—ON SHIPMENT "TO ORDER OF CONSIGNOR NOTIFY," TITLE REMAINS IN CONSIGNOR.

In a shipment "to order of consignor notify," title remains in the shipper, who has control of the shipment as to route, destination, and delivery unless by assignment of the bill of lading or other contract for value creating an interest in the goods he has deprived himself of his rights.

4. CARRIERS ⇨159(2)—TIMELY PRESENTATION OF CLAIM FOR DAMAGE.

Where the damaged shipment had been made September 12th, the action of the shipper's broker, on December 29th, in filing with the terminal carrier full notice of claim, etc., held a full compliance with the requirement of the contract that claim be presented at the point of delivery or origin within four months.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pamlico County; Daniels, Judge.

Action by D. C. McCotter against the Norfolk Southern Railroad Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. No error.

Civil action to recover damages for loss caused by negligent delay in shipment and delivery of a lot of potatoes from Bayboro, N. C., to Roanoke, Va. The goods were shipped by plaintiff to his own order, notify Roanoke Fruit Company, etc., on December 12, 1914. The shipment was routed over Norfolk & Western in state of Virginia; the defendant being the initial carrier, receiving the shipment at Bayboro as stated. On denial of liability, the jury rendered the following verdict:

"(1) Did plaintiff on or about the 12th day of December, 1914, deliver to defendant at Bayboro, N. C., 105 barrels of sweet potatoes in good condition to be safely transported and delivered within a reasonable time over said railroad and its connecting carriers to consignee or agent, Roanoke, Va.? Answer: 'Yes.'

"(2) If so, did defendant negligently fail to transport and deliver said potatoes within a reasonable time and thereby damage plaintiff, as alleged? Answer: 'Yes.'

"(3) If so, what damage, if any, is plaintiff entitled to recover? Answer: '$189.90 at 6 per cent. from December 30, 1914, to date.'

"(4). Did plaintiff file notice of claim as required by the bill of lading? Answer: 'Yes.'"

Judgment on verdict for plaintiff, and defendant excepted and appealed.

Moore & Dunn, of Newbern, for appellant.
D. L. Ward, of Newbern, and Z. V. Rawls, of Bayboro, for appellee.

HOKE, J. There was evidence on part of plaintiff tending to show that the potatoes delivered for shipment to the defendant road at Bayboro, N. C., on December 12, 1914, and routed via Norfolk and thence over Norfolk & Western to Roanoke, Va., arrived at this point on December 17th following; that owing to the fact that the bill of lading was lost or delayed in the mails, the delivering carrier refused to turn over the goods without presentation of a bill of lading, or a bond of indemnity, and did not do so until December 23d; that the weather was mild at the time the potatoes were shipped, and continued so until December 17th, when it turned very cold and continued to be freezing weather for several days thereafter, and, owing to the delay in delivery of potatoes, the same were frozen and became worthless; that on arrival of potatoes at Roanoke they were applied for by the American Brokerage Company acting at Roanoke for the shipper, and, delivery being refused for want of bill of lading, the brokerage company wired that no bill of lading had been received, etc., and had a message in reply that the defendant road had been requested to notify the Norfolk & Western to deliver without bill of lading. There was further evidence tending to show that, on receipt of message from his brokers, plaintiff saw agent of defendant road and requested it to notify the Norfolk & Western by telegram to deliver without bill of lading and that shipper had offered bond of indemnity; that said shipper offered a bond to defendant's agent, and was told that his standing was well known and that he need not give a bond. There were also facts in evidence to the effect that this message was received by the Norfolk & Western on December 17th, and further that the brokerage company in renewing its demand for the potatoes informed the agent of the delivering carrier that the message directing delivery without bill of lading had been forwarded by the defendant road at request of the owner.

The testimony on the part of defendant tended to show that the message from the initial carrier directing delivery without presentation of bill of lading was not received till December 23d, at which time potatoes were forthwith surrendered to shipper's agent and without bond.

[1, 2] On these, the facts more directly pertinent to the issue, it was urged for error that the court refused to allow defendant's motion for a nonsuit, and this for the reason, chiefly, that the delivering carrier was not required to surrender potatoes without presentation and surrender of the bill of lading; but on the record we are of opinion that the position cannot be maintained. Not only is it the accepted rule on a motion of this kind that the testimony in support of plaintiff's claim must be taken as true and construed in the light most favorable to him, but it appears, from a perusal of his honor's charge on the third issue, that, in this aspect of the case, the jury have necessarily determined that the message from defendant directing delivery without the bill of lading was received in Norfolk on December 17th, and in such case, in refusing delivery, we concur in the opinion of the lower court that a breach of duty has been properly established on the part of the Norfolk & Western and for which defendant may be held liable under the Carmack (Act Cong. Feb. 4, 1887, c. 104, § 20, 24 Stat. 386, as amended by Act Cong. June 29, 1906, c. 3591, § 7, pars. 11, 12, 34 Stat. 595 [U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8604a, 8604aa]) and subsequent amendments to the Interstate Commerce Act. Paper Box Co. v. Ry., 177 N. C. 351, 99 S. E. 23, and cases cited; Mann v. Navigation Co., 176 N. C. 104, 96 S. E. 731.

[3] In a shipment of the kind presented here, "to order of consignor notify," the title to the goods remains in the shipper, and, ordinarily, he has the control of same as to route, destination, and delivery, unless he has, by assignment of the bill of lading or other contract for value creating an interest in the goods, deprived himself of his rights over them. In Hutchinson on Carriers, § 193, the position is stated as follows:

"When there has been no agreement to ship the goods which will make the delivery of them to the carrier a delivery to the consignee and vest the property in him, the shipper may, even after the delivery to the carrier and after the bill of lading has been signed and delivered or after the goods have passed from the possession of the initial carrier into that of a succeeding one, alter their destination and direct their delivery to another consignee, unless the bill of lading has been forwarded to the consignee first named or to some one for his use."

A principle very generally recognized and approved, and applied with us in Richardson & Produce Co. v. Woodruff & Son, 100 S. E. 173, at present term, Myers v. R. R. Co., 171 N. C. 190, 88 S. E. 149; Development Co. v. R. R., 147 N. C. 506, 61 S. E. 881; and other cases.

On the facts presented, therefore, a failure to deliver the potatoes to the owner or his agent on a telegraphic message from the initial carrier directing that this be done without presentation of the bill of lading, made at the request of the owner and consignor in the bill of lading, would be sufficient to sustain the verdict on the issue, and in this connection it may be well to note that, when such consignor requested that the message be sent, he offered to give a bond of indemnity and was told that no such bond would be required.

In no event would an order of nonsuit be justified, there being additional evidence on the part of plaintiff tending to show that the time actually taken for the shipment from December 12th to 17th was too long, and, in itself, might reasonably have caused the injury complained of.

[4] It was further contended that no recovery should be allowed because no claim was filed within the time required by the terms of the contract. Stipulations of this kind, when reasonable, have been approved by us in cases coming under the laws of this jurisdiction (Culbreth v. R. R., 169 N. C. 725, 86 S. E. 624), and in interstate shipments are expressly recognized by the statute, when not for a shorter period than 90 days. It appears, however, that on December 29, 1914, the same month when the loss occurred, the plaintiff's broker in Roanoke, acting for plaintiff, filed with the delivering carrier a full notice of claim, showing the amount, nature, and value of the shipment, the date and address, the car in which the goods were sent, the time it arrived at Roanoke, and the condition of the goods. It would seem to be a full compliance with the requirement of the contract "that the claim be presented at the point of delivery or point of origin within four months." Apart from this, the verdict having established that the loss was caused by negligence in shipment and delivery of goods, the statute applicable (Mann v. Transportation Co., supra) provides that no notice of claim shall be required as a condition precedent to recovery.

On careful consideration of the record, we have found no error to defendant's prejudice and the judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

No error.

GUY v. BULLARD et al. (No. 221.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 8, 1919.)

1. SALES  $\S$ 456 — CONTRACT CONDITIONAL SALE OF SAWMILL AND NOT LEASE.

Contract, reciting that whereas plaintiff owned a sawmill outfit and desired to sell it to defendant, while defendant desired to purchase, plaintiff leased to defendant subject to purchase, with provisions as to the terms of payment of $1 a thousand feet of lumber cut until $750 had been paid, which should be treated as the price, held a contract of conditional sale.

2. SALES  $\S$ 456—PARTIES CANNOT CHANGE EFFECT OF CONTRACT BY GIVING IT NAME.

A construction put by the parties on a contract of sale or lease of personalty is entitled to consideration in determining its true meaning, but the parties cannot change the legal effect of the contract merely by giving a name to it.

3. ASSIGNMENTS  $\S$ 19 — CONDITIONAL SALE CONTRACT ASSIGNABLE BY BUYER.

Conditional sale contract covering sawmill outfit held assignable, not importing reliance on the character, skill, or personal qualities of the buyer for its performance.

4. ASSIGNMENTS  $\S$ 68—ESTOPPEL OF SELLER TO DENY LEGALITY OF ASSIGNMENT OF CONDITIONAL SALE CONTRACT.

The conditional seller of a sawmill outfit, who has consented to the assignment by the buyer by accepting part of the purchase money from the assignee, and by cashing one of the checks after judgment in favor of the assignee in the seller's suit to recover the outfit has been rendered, is not in a position to say the contract was not legally assigned by the buyer.

5. SALES  $\S$ 477(1)—PRIVILEGE TO REPOSSESS PROPERTY CONDITIONALLY SOLD WAIVED BY FAILURE TO EXERCISE.

A conditional seller of a sawmill outfit, suing to recover it from the buyer and his assignee, cannot avail himself of the contract provision giving him the right to repossess for failure to operate for 30 days, where, instead of exercising the privilege, he permitted the buyer to continue in the use of the mill and accepted the balance of the purchase money.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sampson County; Gulon, Judge.

Action by I. J. Guy against Badger Bullard and Thomas E. Owen. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This is an action to recover a sawmill outfit.

On April 28, 1917, the plaintiff entered into a contract with the defendant Bullard in reference to said property, which contract was afterwards assigned to the defendant Owen.

The contract recites:

"That whereas the said I. J. Guy is the owner of a certain sawmill outfit located in the county of Cumberland on the Kelly Melvin land which he is desirous of selling to the said Badger Bullard and which the said Badger Bullard is desirous of purchasing."

It then provides that—

"I. J. Guy has by these presents leased to the said Badger Bullard subject to purchase."

It further provides that—

"Said I. J. Guy agrees to lease to said Badger Bullard all of the above-described property."

The terms of payment set out in the contract were $1 per thousand feet for each and every thousand feet of lumber cut and manufactured by said sawmill outfit, and the contract concluded with the following provision:

"It is further agreed by and between the parties hereto that the said Badger Bullard shall comply with the terms and conditions above enumerated, then and in that event when the sum of $750 has been paid, the same shall be treated as the purchase price of said property, and he shall be the absolute and legal owner of the same, and the same shall be treated as a complete and full settlement by and between the parties hereto and the property above described and enumerated shall all belong to the said Badger Bullard."

The judgment rendered in the superior court sets out the contract in full, and concludes as follows:

"And it further appearing to the court that on the 12th day of February, 1918, the said Badger Bullard sold and conveyed and duly transferred in writing said contract for said mill and all his right and title thereto under the aforesaid contract to the defendant, Thomas E. Owen, and

"It further appearing to the court that prior to the sale of said property by Badger Bullard to Thomas E. Owen the said Badger Bullard paid, under the contract, the sum of $151.18, being the $1 per thousand feet mentioned in the contract on 151,179 feet of lumber sawed by him with said sawmill, and that after the sale and assignment of his contract the defendant has paid to the plaintiff, I. J. Guy, a sum which, together with the money paid by Badger Bullard, makes the total sum paid to I. J. Guy, the plaintiff, under the contract for said sawmill outfit, $750, of which $306.71 is evidenced by uncollected checks drawn by the defendant to the order of the plaintiff and now held by plaintiff uncollected, but which are collectible from funds in the bank on which they are drawn.

"Upon the foregoing facts found by his honor and admitted by the parties, his honor being of the opinion that said contract was a sale and not a lease, and that the purchaser of Badger Bullard, being the defendant Thomas E. Owen, had a right to pay the said sum of $750 and take the property, and the defendants having paid said sum to the plaintiff herein:

"It is considered, ordered, and adjudged that the plaintiff has been fully paid for his mill under said contract, and that plaintiff take nothing by his suit, and that the defendants recover of the plaintiff and John D. Kerr, Sr., surety on his prosecution bond, the costs of this action to be taxed by the clerk of this court."

The plaintiff excepted and appealed.

Kerr & Herring and Fowler & Crumpler, all of Clinton, for appellant.

Butler & Herring, of Clinton, for appellees.

ALLEN, J. [1] A contract very much like the one before us was considered and construed in Puffer v. Lucas, 112 N. C. 377, 17 S. E. 174, 19 L. R. A. 682; and it was then held that contracts of this character are contracts of conditional sale, and that upon the payment of the purchase price the title to the property rests in the vendee.

This case has been affirmed several times, and notably in the case of Hamilton v. Highlands, 144 N. C. 280, 56 S. E. 930, 12 Ann. Cas. 876.

In this last case the plaintiff entered into a written contract with the defendant, which was called a "lease," to hire to the use of the plaintiff for nineteen months a piano, etc., and to pay $50 cash, and as rent $15 monthly, with further provision that, if the defendant paid the installments of rent as they fell due, he should have the right to purchase the piano for the total amount of the installments, in which case all sums paid as rent should be deducted from the purchase price, and the court, after discussing the general effect of the contract, says:

"It follows that the courts, in determining whether or not a contract is one of bailment or one of sale, with an attempt to retain a lien for the price, in effect a mortgage, do not consider what description the parties have given to it, but what is its essential character. It was a mere subterfuge to call this transaction a lease, and the application of that term to it in the written agreement of the parties does not in law change its real meaning. A contract like the one upon which this suit was brought has been held by a very large majority of the courts of this country to be, in substance, a conditional sale, although in the form of a lease (and so called) or of a bailment for use, with an option to purchase."

Numerous authorities are cited and discussed in support of the conclusion that the contract was one of conditional sale, and that upon failure to pay the entire debt the defendant was entitled to have the property sold and, after applying enough of the proceeds to pay the balance of the debt, to have any surplus paid to him.

[2] The construction put upon the contract by the parties is entitled to consideration in determining its true meaning, but they cannot, by giving a name to it, change its legal effect.

[3,4] These authorities are conclusive against the plaintiff's contention that the contract is one of lease and not of sale, nor can we sustain the position that the contract was not assignable.

The general rule is that any claim or demand can be transferred, and this contract does not come within any of the exceptions in Petty v. Rousseau, 94 N. C. 363, nor does it in express terms or by fair intendment import reliance on the character, skill, or personal qualities of the vendee for its performance, a class of contracts which cannot be assigned (Railroad v. Railroad, 147 N. C. 376, 61 S. E. 185, 23 L. R. A. [N. S.] 223, 125 Am. St. Rep. 550, 15 Ann. Cas. 363); but, if nonassignable, it appears here from the findings in the judgment that the plaintiff has consented to the assignment by accepting a part of the purchase money from the assignee and by cashing one of the checks after the judgment was rendered and depositing it as security for the costs on the appeal.

It is found as a fact in the judgment that Bullard paid to the plaintiff $151.18 before the contract was assigned to Owen; that the plaintiff had, when the judgment was rendered, checks given to him by Owen amounting to $306.71, the two amounts aggregating $457.89, which, deducted from $750, the full amount of the purchase money which has been paid to the plaintiff, leaves $292.11 paid by the defendant Owen after the assignment of the contract and accepted by the plaintiff.

He is not therefore in a position to say that the contract has not been legally assigned to the defendant.

[5] Nor can the plaintiff avail himself of the provision in the contract giving him the right to repossess the property upon failure to operate the mill for a period of 30 days because, instead of exercising this privilege, he permitted the defendant to continue in the use and operation of the mill and accepted the balance of the purchase money.

We find no error in the judgment.

RICKS et al. v. FUTRELL et al. (No. 106.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct 8, 1919.)

1. LOGS AND LOGGING §3(7)—CONSTRUCTION OF TIMBER DEEDS.

In ascertaining timber rights, the deeds conveying the timber interests and those affecting the general title will be considered together, and the true intent of the parties ascertained from the entire agreements.

2. LOGS AND LOGGING §3(11)—CONSTRUCTION OF TIMBER DEED.

Timber deeds held to pass to grantees the title to the timber for five years, with the privilege of cutting and removing the timber any time within the first three years, free of further charge, but requiring grantee to make additional payment for privilege of removing timber during the last two years.

3. LOGS AND LOGGING §3(11)—ON SALE OF TIMBER RIGHTS ADDITIONAL PAYMENT REQUIRED FOR EXTENDED TIME FOR REMOVAL.

Where deed conveying timber for five-year period provided that for privilege of removing timber after expiration of first three years grantee should make additional payment to grantor "or the then owner of the aforesaid tract of land," owner of general title during the last two years of such five-year period was not entitled to such additional payment, where his grantor had reserved the timber rights during such period; his grantor being the then owner of that part of the land constituting the timber rights.

4. ESTOPPEL §54—RECORD OF DEED AS NOTICE PRECLUDING ESTOPPEL IN PAIS.

Where timber deed conveying timber for five-year period required additional payment for right of removal during last two years, to be made to "the then owner of land," lumber company claiming under such deed, who made such payment to owner of general title, instead of such owner's grantor, who had reserved timber rights, could not, in grantor's action against it, avail itself of defense of estoppel in pais, where latter deed, reserving such timber rights, was of record.

Appeal from Superior Court, Northampton County; Connor, Judge.

Action by E. H. Ricks and another against Jackson Futrell and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs except and appeal. Reversed.

George O. Green, of Weldon, and W. L. Long, of Roanoke Rapids, for appellants.

Walter E. Daniel, of Weldon, and G. E. Midyette, of Jackson, for appellees.

HOKE, J. On the hearing it was properly made to appear:

That on the 10th day of March, 1916, E. T. Zollicoffer, owning a large body of land in said county, sold and conveyed to J. W. Crew the standing timber growing thereon; the provision in reference to the timber contained in the deed being as follows:

"That the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, shall have five years from the date hereof in which to remove the timber hereby conveyed from the aforesaid tract of land: Provided, however, that he, or his assigns, shall after the expiration of three years from the date hereof pay to the said party of the first part, or the then owner of the aforesaid tract of land, six per centum annually, in advance, upon the amount of the purchase price aforesaid—that is, nineteen thousand dollars—for the privilege of the remaining two years in which to remove the said timber."

That on March 28, 1916, said grantee J. W. Crew and wife conveyed said timber to A. C. and H. C. House, and on December 6, 1916, said A. C. and H. C. House conveyed the same to defendant the Greenville Manufacturing Company; the stipulations in these conveyances as to the timber rights and interests being the same as in the first deed, etc. That on December 27, 1916, said E. T. Zollicoffer conveyed this land, on which the timber was situate, to W. L. Long; and, the lands having been in the meantime divided into several lots, on January 18, 1918, W. L. Long and wife conveyed to plaintiffs in the action two of said lots, Nos. 12 and 14, on which the timber in controversy is situated, both of these deeds containing a stipulation that the same were made "subject to the terms and conditions of a certain timber deed executed by E. T. Zollicoffer to J. N. Crew in 1916," etc. That on September 21, 1918, plaintiffs conveyed one of these lots, No. 14, to Jackson Futrell; the deed containing stipulation concerning the timber thereon as follows:

"It is distinctly understood and agreed by and between the parties to these presents that this deed does not convey and pass title to three (3) acres sold to the said G. Moody, above mentioned, by Messrs. C. A. Wyche and W. L. Long, and for which they have not yet given him a deed; also all timber rights on the land herein conveyed reserved by the said parties of the first part until March 10, 1921."

And in December following lot No. 12 was conveyed to said Jackson Futrell by plaintiff, with habendum:

"To have and to hold the above-described piece, parcel, or tract of land, together with all privileges and appurtenances thereunto belonging, save and except all standing timber and rights thereto, which are herein reserved by the said parties of the first part for a period of two (2) years, from the 10th day of March, 1919, to the 10th day of March, 1921, to the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, to their only use and behoof in fee simple forever."

That prior to expiration of the time limit for cutting, to wit, March 10, 1919, defendant lumber company made an adjustment for privilege of further cutting, by paying to the codefendant Futrell the price for one year's extension, and was proceeding to cut the timber on these portions of the land, when it was stopped by restraining order in this cause.

[1-3] Considering these two series of deeds together, the deeds conveying the timber interests and those affecting the general title, and seeking the true intent of the parties as expressed in their entire agreements, the approved method of construction in such cases (Hornthal v. Howcott, 154 N. C. 228, 70 S. E. 171; Davis v. Frazier, 150 N. C. 447, 64 S. E. 200), we are of opinion that the force and effect of the provisions in the timber deeds, is to pass to the grantees the title to the timber for five years, with the privilege of cutting and removing the timber any time within the first three years, free of further charge. and for the last two years the privilege is to be paid for annually, in advance, 6 per cent. on the purchase price of $19,000. The stipulation amounts to a positive obligation to pay for the privilege the agreed price, while the timber remains on the ground and uncut, whether the same is exercised or not; i. e., 6 per cent. on $19,000 in advance for the first of these two later years, and, if not cut then, the same amount to be due for the privilege during the last year, and the sum or sums to be paid to plaintiffs, who are the owners of the timber during the period covered by the agreement and to whom the money is due by the clear intent of the parties as expressed in their conveyances covering the property—the stipulation of the deed on September 21st being as stated:

"It is distinctly understood and agreed by and between the parties to these presents that this deed does not convey and pass title to three (3) acres sold to the said G. Moody, above mentioned, by Messrs. C. A. Wyche and W. L. Long, and for which they have not yet given him a deed; also all timber rights on the land herein conveyed reserved by the said parties of the first part until March 10, 1921."

And that of 31st of December being:

"To have and to hold the above-described piece, parcel, or tract of land, together with all privileges and appurtenances thereunto belonging, save and except all standing timber and rights thereto which are herein reserved by the said parties of the first part for a period of two (2) years, from the 10th day of March, 1919, to the 10th day of March, 1921, to the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, to their only use and behoof in fee simple forever."

These important provisions of the contract would to our minds be entirely without significance unless they except the title to the timber until March 10, 1921, and reserve to the grantors during that period the payment of the purchase price. The question is, we think, virtually decided in Powell v. Lumber Co., 163 N. C. 36, 79 S. E. 272. In that case Mary E. Sumner, owner of the land, in July, 1901, sold the timber thereon to one W. W. Cummer, with right to remove same for ten years, and with an extension privilege of five years. In November following she sold the land to other parties, "excepting the timber sold by Mary E. Sumner on said land and by her conveyed to W. W. Cummer by deed," etc. Subject to these exceptions and under mesne conveyances the land was acquired and held by plaintiff Powell. Prior to expiration of ten years Mary E. Sumner sold and conveyed to assignee of Cummer the timber for the extension period, and it held that she had the right to dispose of the timber for the renewal period and to recover the amount which had been agreed upon as the consideration for same. As shown in the opinion referred to, the decision of Hornthal v. Howcott, 154 N. C. 228, 70 S. E. 171, to which reference has been made by defendants' counsel involved only the right of the parties after the period specified for cutting had terminated, and the question as to who could rightfully collect the purchase price under the terms of the contract was in no way presented.

It was earnestly insisted for the defendant that in the contract creating the timber interest it is specified that the payment for the last two years is to be made to the then owner of the land, and that the lumber company, having made satisfactory arrangements with its codefendant Futrell, who then held the title, thereby acquired the legal right to proceed under the contract. The term "land" is one of very comprehensive significance. As said by my Lord Coke:

"It includes not only the ground or soil, but everything which is attached to the earth, whether by the course of nature, such as trees, herbage, and water, or by the hand of man, as houses or other buildings, and it has an indefinite extent, upwards as well as downwards, so as to include everything terrestrial under or on it."

And we have uniformly held in this jurisdiction that standing timber is realty and subject to the laws of devolution and transfer appertaining to that kind of property. In September and December, 1918, McPherson and Ricks, the grantors in the deeds to Futrell, were the owners of the lands and the standing timber thereon which constituted part of it. As such owners they had the perfect right to control it, and to grant a part of the property to one and reserve a portion to themselves. Having therefore excepted that part of the land consisting of this standing timber, and in terms which clearly imputed a right to receive the purchase money for the same during the period covered by the contract, we see no reason why this exemption should not be given effect and the grantee, Futrell, be conclusively bound by it. Herring v. Lumber Co., 163 N. C. 481, 79 S. E. 876.

[4] On the record there can be no claim that the lumber company has been imposed upon, or that the facts present a case for an estoppel in pais. The terms of the instruments upon which plaintiffs rely appear upon the face of the conveyances, and ordinary care would have sufficed to fully inform and protect the company, and in such case they could acquire no more than their grantor, Futrell, himself owned; that is, the land, except the standing timber during the life of the contract. True, in Timber Co. v. Wells, 171 N. C. 262, 88 S. E. 327, the court held that, in case of an option for an extension period, the purchase money would be due and owing to him who held the title at the time the same was due and payable; but it appeared also as the approved limitation on the principle, "unless there was a contrary provision in the deed itself." Here there is a contrary provision in the deed, to wit, a clause excepting the standing timber till March 10, 1921, and in terms as stated reserving to the grantor the right to collect the purchase money for the extension period—I. e. the interest on $19,000.

It will be noted that only a portion of the land was acquired by plaintiffs and conveyed by them to Futrell, and therefore they could only recover their due proportion of the purchase money. Ordinarily the defendants would have the right to require that all the owners of the land be made parties; but inasmuch as it appears that the timber on all the other parts of the land has been cut, and the rights concerning the same satisfactorily adjusted, there is no reason why the present suit should not proceed as now constituted and the rights of the parties thereon determined.

This will be certified, that the proportionate amount of the purchase money—I. e., the interest as stated—presently due plaintiffs be ascertained; that defendants meantime be restrained until the same is paid, and on sufficient bond given to assure payment of plaintiffs' reasonable recovery and costs, and such further proceedings had as the legal rights of the parties may require.

1919.)

1. TAXATION §788(3) — PLAINTIFFS, GRAN-TEES IN DEED FROM STATE, MUST SHOW TAX DEED TO STATE VALID.

Plaintiffs claiming swamp land by deed from the state board of education, successor to the literary fund, on which Rev. St. c. 67, § 3, conferred title to certain lands, excepting swamp lands theretofore granted to individuals, and defendants showing such a grant, and the presumption under Revisal 1905, § 4047, in favor of deed of said board lasting only till the other party has shown good and valid title, plaintiffs have the burden of establishing validity of a tax deed to the Governor, claimed to have again placed the title in the state, prior to their deed.

2. TAXATION §766—TAX DEED NOT ACKNOWLEDGED AND RECORDED AS REQUIRED BY STATUTE INVALID.

Sheriff's tax deed to the Governor for land sold for taxes to him for the state under Acts 1798, c. 492 (Rev. St. c. 102, § 60 et seq.), is ineffectual; it not appearing it was acknowledged in open court, much less at the next term, or that it was registered in the clerk's office, or that it was filed with the secretary of state before settlement of sheriff's account, as required by the statute.

3. TAXATION §766—RECITAL OF ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF TAX DEED FROM SHERIFF TO STATE INSUFFICIENT.

Recital in attestation clause of sheriff's tax deed to Governor, under Acts 1798, c. 492 (Rev. St. c. 102, § 60 et seq.), that it was acknowledged in open court, appearing before sheriff's signature, not being made by an officer authorized to take the acknowledgment, amounts to nothing more than the sheriff's unsworn declaration of what he intended to do.

4. TAXATION §788(3)—THERE IS NO PRESUMPTION OF PROPER PROBATE OF TAX DEED.

In the absence of evidence of any probate of a tax deed, there can be no presumption of proper probate, as where the proper officer certifies an instrument has been duly proven, without setting out his acts.

5. TAXATION §788(3) — PRESUMPTION OF PROBATE OF TAX DEED ARISES FROM REGIS-TRATION.

No presumption of proper probate of a tax deed arises from its registration, where it appears the register acted on the certified copy, and its indorsements bearing no evidence of probate.

Appeal from Superior Court, Onslow County; Gulon, Judge.

Action by the New Hanover Shingle Mills Company, Incorporated, and others, against the John L. Roper Lumber Company and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

This is an action to recover damages for trespass upon land, in which the title was put in issue, and was the real question involved in the trial. Plaintiffs claim title to the land in question under a deed from the state board of education to one Carrier, dated July 3, 1896. The plaintiffs offered evidence tending to show that the description in the above deed covered the three tracts of land described in the complaint, and evidence to locate said land. Plaintiffs then offered in evidence mesne conveyances, connecting themselves with the aforesaid deed from the state board of education. It was shown that all of these deeds connecting plaintiffs with said deed from the state board of education described the lands set out in the complaint, and that all grantees through whom plaintiffs held appear to be purchasers for value. The deed from the state board of education was, however, objected to, on account of alleged defect in its probate, and for that, it was asserted by defendants, it could carry no title to the grantees in any view.

The defendants offered in evidence grant No. 732, to David Allison, dated May 29, 1795, and it was admitted that this grant covered the land in question. Defendants then offered mesne conveyances connecting themselves with said David Allison grant, one of which was executed and registered in the year 1859, showing that the grantee therein was a purchaser for value. The defendants further introduced evidence tending to show possession of such lands covered by the Allison grant, and their mesne conveyances from the year 1906 to the present time. The plaintiffs thereupon offered in evidence a deed from William Doty, sheriff of Onslow county, to William R. Davie, Governor of North Carolina, dated October 10, 1799. It purports to convey the lands set forth in the David Allison grant and lying in Onslow county to the state under a tax sale made by the sheriff of Onslow county. This deed was also objected to by the defendants, both on the ground of its competency and its effect.

The attestation clause, the form of execution, and the attempted probate of these deeds were as follows:

His honor held that these deeds were incompetent and invalid to pass title, and plaintiffs excepted. Judgment in favor of defendants, and plaintiffs appealed.

Frank Thompson, of Jacksonville, L. R. Varser, of Lumberton, and L. I. Moore, of Newbern, for appellees.

ALLEN, J. [1] The statute, conferring title to certain lands on the president and directors of the literary fund, to which the state board of education is the successor, excepts from its operation swamp lands "heretofore entered and granted to individuals" (Rev. Stat. c. 67, § 3), and it follows that when the defendants introduced a grant from the state to David Allison, issued in 1795, and mesne conveyances to the defendants, covering the land described in the complaint, they rebutted any presumption raised by statute in favor of the deed of the state board of education of date July 3, 1896.

The effect of the introduction of the grant and the other conveyances was not only to show that the land had been granted to an individual before the statute in favor of the literary fund was enacted, and therefore the title did not pass by the terms and language of the statute, but also to establish title in the defendants, nothing else appearing, and the statute in favor of the deeds of the state board of education provides that the presumption shall last only "until the other party shall show that he hath a good and valid title to such lands in himself." Revisal, § 4047.

In this condition of the record, with nothing in evidence except the deed of the state board of education and mesne conveyances to the plaintiffs, and the Allison grant and mesne conveyances to the defendants, all covering the same land, the court would unhesitatingly declare the title to be in the defendants, and it therefore became vital for the plaintiffs to establish the validity of the tax deed of Lemuel Doty, sheriff, to the Governor, in 1799, for the purpose of showing that the title of Allison had been divested and did not pass to the defendants, and to again place the title in the state as vacant land subject to entry, which would belong to the literary fund under the statute, and then to the state board of education.

[2] The sale for taxes was made under Acts 1798, c. 492 (Rev. Stat. c. 102, § 60 et seq.) of which Chief Justice Ruffin makes the following summary in Avery v. Rose, 15 N. C. 552:

"It recites that the mode of selling lands for taxes, as then established by law, was insufficient to secure the collection of the revenue, and then provides, amongst other things, that, when no person will pay the taxes for a less quantity than the whole tract, it shall be deemed a purchase of the whole by the Governor, and the sheriff shall execute a conveyance to him, and his successors, for the use of the state; that it shall be the duty of the sheriff to perfect the deed, by signing it, acknowledging, and delivery thereof in the presence of the next county court; that the clerk shall register it in a book, to be kept for that purpose, and after doing so shall certify the same, and deliver it to the sheriff (who shall call on him for the same), within 20 days after the court; that the sheriff shall, before he settles his account with the comptroller, deposit the deed with the secretary of state, who shall record and keep it for the benefit of the state; and that the lands so conveyed shall be deemed vacant and subject again to entry. It then further provides that the secretary of state shall give to the sheriff a certificate setting forth the quantity of land thus conveyed (the tax being then ad numerum, not ad valorem), and that upon the deposit thereof with the comptroller, and the oath of the sheriff that he had conveyed, in conformity to the requisitions of the act, all the lands by him sold for taxes, and thus purchased for the use of the state, the comptroller (the requisites of the act being complied with) shall allow the sheriff in his settlement a credit for the tax on those lands and all charges on the sale, and his commissions thereon, as if the sum had been collected in money; and, lastly, that the sheriff shall be credited in like manner in his settlement at home, for the county and poor taxes."

The learned Chief Justice then proceeds to discuss the statute in connection with the other revenue laws then existing, and reaches the conclusion that the state is not a purchaser as usually understood; that the purpose of the statute was not to enable the state to acquire title to land, but to collect her revenue; that, as the state was in no danger of losing the taxes, which were charged against the sheriff, for which he and his sureties were liable, that the provisions of the statute were for the benefit of the sheriff, to provide the means for obtaining credit with the comptroller and being discharged from liability for the taxes, and that the duty was enjoined upon the sheriff to follow the terms of the statute, and to see that others did so, and it was held that the statute must receive a strict construction, and that a failure on the part of the sheriff to acknowledge the deed at the next ensuing term of the county court was fatal to the deed to the Governor.

We quote at length from the opinion because of its learning and reasoning, and it is the only authoritative construction of the statute in our Reports.

"But to us it seems that the state cannot be deemed a purchaser, whose title is to be protected, notwithstanding irregularities, within any of the principles on which they are disregarded in sales on executions. The scope of the act is not to enable the state to reacquire her territory from her own citizens. She does not wish it. As soon as she gets it under this act, it is by the same act offered for private appropriation again, upon the same terms on which it was before granted. The policy of the state, in this statute and throughout our legislation, is to part on the most favorable terms with all her public domain, with a few exceptions, and not to become again the proprietor of any that has been granted, unless in a case of necessity. This is clear from the act of 1793, which forbids the surrender of land to avoid the taxes. It is apparent on the act of 1798 itself, for she does not purchase, as a chapman does, for the least price, but only takes the land instead of the tax, when the tax can be got in no other way, and, if she does not take the title, the sheriff is responsible for that tax, and the owner for the accruing ones. The great object of this provision, therefore, is not to acquire the land for the state, but to secure the collection of the taxes, to raise revenue, and have it duly accounted for and paid by the proper officers, and in justice to those officers, to make them account for, and pay only such portions as they have collected, or might have collected. * * *

"The act assures to him (the sheriff) such credit, upon certain conditions which it puts in his power to perform, and the performance of which it requires to be established by certain evidence. The case, then, is not one in which the interest of the creditor or the debtor requires the law to be indulgent in overlooking omissions in the mode of proceeding. It is one in which the creditor is secure at all events, because she can look to the sheriff and his sureties for the tax, but in which she will not, provided he makes it appear in the manner prescribed, which is plain and easily attainable, that she ought not. This part of the act is therefore substantially and really for the benefit of the sheriff himself, the person charged with the duty of selling, and with the performance of all the subsequent measures of importance required for its completion. Upon established principles he ought to be held to strict performance. He is so held in this statute. * * *

"The question has thus far been considered in reference to the words of this part of the statute, and to the circumstance that the interest of the sheriff himself, was principally concerned, and therefore that he should act in due time. Whatever interest the state has demands likewise his diligence throughout. It is important to her to know her actual net revenue, and what prior claims there are against her at the time it is paid in. She wishes to resell the land, that she has reluctantly taken back, and with as little delay as possible. An early and public notice of it, in the county where it is situated, is therefore deemed important. She wishes to avoid and detect frauds attempted on her, and therefore, while the whole matter is of recent occurrence, she requires that a sale made shall be acknowledged of record and in open court of that county, that no pretended sale may at a distant day be imposed on her, and she brought in conflict with one of her own citizens. Every act of omission which tends to defeat these views is inconsistent with the real intention of the Legislature, and cannot be tolerated. The state does not take the land, but as a credit to the sheriff for the tax, and no conveyance to the state is to be taken as valid within the statute, but such an one on the production of which the sheriff would be entitled to credit for the tax. From this it would result that the sheriff must procure the other officers to do their duty, because otherwise the state is not bound to accept the deed, and the title does not vest in her, under this law, in any other case. * * *

"The authority to make the state a bidder is a special one, and for the sheriff's benefit, to bid for her only where there is no other bidder, for a tax due to her, and to make a deed within a certain time, upon which the sheriff shall have credit. It must therefore be strictly construed with respect to those acts, and the periods prescribed. * * * Upon these grounds, it is the opinion of the court, that the deed to the Governor is void, because it was not made or acknowledged at the court next succeeding the sale."

This authority was cited and approved in Stewart v. Pergusson, 133 N. C. 281, 45 S. E. 585. Applying these principles we must hold that the sheriff's deed is not valid, and did not have the effect of passing title to the state, as it does not appear that it was acknowledged in open court at all, much less at the next succeeding term, or that it has been registered in the clerk's office as required by the statute.

[3] The recital in the attestation clause of the deed that it was acknowledged in open court, appearing before the signature, not being made by an officer authorized to take the acknowledgment, amounts to nothing more than the unsworn declaration of the sheriff of what he intended to do, and not of what he had done.

[4, 5] There is no evidence of any probate of the deed in any form, and consequently no room for the application of the doctrine of Starke v. Etheridge, 71 N. C. 240, and of other cases, holding that, when the proper officer certifies that an instrument has been duly proven, without setting out his acts, it will be presumed that the probate was taken according to law, and no presumption can arise from registration, as it appears that the register acted upon the certified copy and the indorsements thereon sent to him in 1867, and not upon any other probate or evidence of acknowledgment.

Again, the tax deed bears date October 16, 1799, and purports to have been made pursuant to a sale to collect the taxes of 1798, and of this phase of the case the court says in the Avery Case:

"It [the statute] requires him [the sheriff] to produce and file the deed in the office of the secretary of state before he settles for the taxes, and to make oath that he has conveyed all the lands struck off to the state, in conformity to the requisitions of the act. The deed must therefore have been made, recorded, and filed, before the 1st day of October of the year in which the tax is payable (the succeeding year; in this case, 1799). This would, of itself, be fatal to the plaintiff's title."

This view of the case renders it unnecessary to consider the doctrine of ancient documents, or to pass on the objections to the deed of the state board of education; but we would not be understood to approve the form of the execution of the deed, or of its attempted probate.

Affirmed.

(178 N. C. 238)

DEBNAM v. WATKINS et ux. (No. 258.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 8, 1919.)

1. MORTGAGES  $\S$  300 — UNACCEPTED TENDER DOES NOT DISCHARGE LIEN.

An unaccepted tender of amount due on a debt secured by a mortgage does not discharge the lien of the mortgage, unless the tender be kept good and the money be paid into court.

2. MORTGAGES  $\S$  302 — TENDER AFTER MATURITY DOES NOT DISCHARGE LIEN.

After maturity of a mortgage a tender does not, in North Carolina, which follows the common-law doctrine, discharge the lien of the mortgage.

3. MORTGAGES  $\S$  372(1) — PURCHASER AT FORECLOSURE NOT DEFEATED BY TENDER.

The rights of purchaser at mortgage foreclosure sale cannot be defeated by proof of tender of the amount of the indebtedness prior to sale, where the owner, who had acquired the property subject to the mortgage, appeared at the sale and participated in the bidding without making known the fact of tender, for such conduct works an estoppel.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Allen, Judge.

Action by J. B. Debnam against J. A. Watkins and wife. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. No error.

William Mitchell died in the year 1890, and left a will, in which he devised the tract of land in question to C. R. Debnam for life, remainder to his five children, Joseph B., Mattie, Bettie, Hattie, and Thomas Debnam. C. R. Debnam, the life tenant, is still living, and about 30 years ago he leased the land to the defendant J. A. Watkins, who has held it from year to year, under the lease, ever since. On the 26th of October, 1909, C. R. Debnam and Hattie Debnam, one of his children, conveyed all their interest in the land, by deed of trust, to W. N. Jones, to secure an indebtedness of $80, which deed was duly recorded in October, 1909. On the 16th of December, 1910, C. R. Debnam, and Thomas Debnam, one of his children, conveyed all their interest in the land, by mortgage, to B. F. Montague, to secure an indebtedness of $122.33, which mortgage was duly recorded on the 26th day of January, 1911. Thomas Debnam and C. R. Debnam having failed to pay the indebtedness secured in the mortgage to B. F. Montague, the latter, under the power of sale in said mortgage, sold the land, and the defendant J. A. Watkins purchased the same at the sale on April 13, 1912, for $225, and a deed was duly made to him by B. F. Montague and registered in April, 1912. Hattie Debnam and C. R. Debnam having failed to pay the indebtedness secured in the deed of trust to W. N. Jones, the latter sold the land, under the power of sale in the deed of trust, and conveyed the same to plaintiff J. B. Debnam for $260 by deed recorded on the 13th of July, 1913. The defendant having failed to pay rent or to give possession to the plaintiff, he commenced this action for possession and damages, as shown in his complaint.

The jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Is the plaintiff the owner and entitled to the possession of the land described in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

"(2) What is the yearly rental value of said land? Answer: $100."

Judgment on the verdict, and defendant appealed.

J. G. Mills, of Wake Forest, for appellants. Jones & Bailey, of Raleigh, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). The questions of fraud and improvements may be eliminated from the case, as the first is not properly pleaded, nor is the second referred to at all. It was agreed that the issues be settled after hearing the evidence. There was no evidence of fraud. It may be, as suggested by plaintiff on the argument, that defendants may proceed, under the statute, to have an allowance made for improvements; but we give no opinion as to this matter, it not being before us.

[1] Under the tender alleged to have been made to Mr. Jones, the senior mortgagee, the money has not been deposited in court, although the defendants seek in this action to redeem from the Jones deed of trust. It was said by Justice Allen in Lee v. Manly, 154 N. C. 244, 70 S. E. 385:

"In Dixon v. Clark, 57 E. C. L. R. 376, Wilde, C. J., announces the rule as follows: 'The principle of the plea of tender, in our apprehension, is that the defendant has been always ready (toujours prêt) to perform entirely the contract on which the action is founded; and that he did perform it, as far as he was able, by tendering the requisite money, the plaintiff himself precluding a complete performance by refusing to receive it. And as in ordinary cases, the debt is not discharged by such tender and refusal, the plea must not only go on to allege that the defendant is still ready (uncore prêt), but must be accompanied by a profert in curiam of the money tendered.' And this is cited with approval in Bank v. Davidson, 70 N. C. 122. In Bilzell v. Haywood, 96 U. S. 580 [24 L. Ed. 678], it is said that, 'to have the effect of stopping interest or costs, a tender must be kept good,' and in Soper v. Jones, 56 Md. 503, 'A plea of tender, not accompanied by profert in curiam, is bad.' In the case of Parker v. Beasley, 116 N. C. 1 [21 S. E. 955, 33 L. R. A. 231], it is held that an unaccepted tender of the amount due on a debt secured by a mortgage does not discharge the lien of the mortgage, unless the tender be kept good and the money be paid into court, and the same doctrine is affirmed in Dickerson v. Simmons, 141 N. C. 330 [53 S. E. 850, 8 Ann. Cas. 361]."

The alleged tender of defendants was made after the note was due. It is not necessary that our conclusion be based upon this ground alone, and that case is specially mentioned as appearing to be analogous in its facts, and it seems to be sufficiently so to control our decision.

[2, 3] There is another reason for affirming the judgment. If the tender of the amount due on the note secured by the deed of trust to Mr. Jones was properly made, or was a good tender, it appears that thereafter Mr. Jones, as trustee, offered the land for sale, after advertisement; that defendants attended the sale and bid for the land, without giving any notice to the other bidders that the sale was unauthorized because of a previous tender by him of the amount due upon the note secured by the deed of trust. He made no such claim at that time, and the plaintiff purchased at the sale, for full value and without any notice of any such claim on the part of the defendant. This, plaintiff contends, was a waiver of the tender defendants made, so far as he is concerned, and an estoppel upon the defendants to set it up, as a defense in this action, even if, under other circumstances, it would be a valid one. This subject was considered to some extent in Dickerson v. Simmons, 141 N. C. 325, 329, 53 S. E. 850, 851 (8 Ann. Cas. 361), where it is said:

"It is well settled and universally held that an unconditional tender on the day when the mortgage debt falls due, called the law day, discharges the lien of the mortgage, although the debt survives as a personal liability. 20 Am. and Eng. Enc. (2d Ed.) 1062, and cases cited; Shields v. Lazear, 34 N. J. Law, 496 [3 Am. St. Rep. 256]. As to the effect of a tender made, as in this case, after maturity, there is much conflict of authority. In those jurisdictions where the mortgage is treated simply as a security to a debt, the rule is that a mortgage is discharged by a proper tender made at any time before foreclosure, and that a sale under the power is void. In those more numerous jurisdictions where the common-law doctrines prevail, the lien of the mortgage is not discharged by the tender; the only effect being to arrest the accruing of interest and to free the debtor from future costs. If the mortgagor desires by his tender to discharge the lien, when it is not accepted, he must bring his suit by redemption and pay the money into court. North Carolina, Massachusetts, New Jersey, and other states are classified as jurisdictions which adhere to the common law. 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. (2d Ed.) 1063. In the first-named jurisdictions it is held that, where tender is made after the law day, a sale under the power is void even as to a bona fide purchaser for value. Cameron v. Irwin, 5 Hill (N. Y.) 272-276; Pingree on Mortgages, § 1342. The contrary is held in Massachusetts and some other courts, which adhere to the common law. Jones on Mortgages, 1798, and cases cited. Those courts regard the power as one coupled with an interest which cannot be revoked, and hold that a sale under the power, after an unaccepted tender, transfers the legal title to the purchaser, and that the tender is merely a foundation for a suit in equity for redemption. It seems, therefore, that in those states a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice of tender gets a good title. It is also held that a mortgagor who has notice of an intended sale and allows it to proceed without objection cannot afterwards show a tender or even a payment in full of the mortgage debt and thereby defeat the title of a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. Cranston v. Crane, 97 Mass. 459 [93 Am. Dec. 106]; Jones on Mortgages, § 1788. It has been determined expressly by this court that 'the unaccepted tender of the amount due on a debt secured by mortgage does not discharge the lien of the mortgage unless the tender be kept good and the money paid into court. Its only effect is to stop interest and costs accruing after tender'—citing Parker v. Beasley, 116 N. C. 1, 21 S. E. 955, 33 L. R. A. 231.

But our case is stronger for this plaintiff. The defendant knew of the sale and attended it with a view of becoming a purchaser, and was a competitor of the plaintiff in the bidding. He said nothing about his tender, did not rely upon it, and offered no objection to the sale. If he had any objection to it, based on the tender, common fairness required of him to then and there make it known, and not to impress the plaintiff with the belief that no such objection existed, and thereby induce him to buy the land after being lulled into security by the defendant's silence and inaction, or by his conduct at the sale. In this connection, it is further said in Dickerson v. Simmons, 141 N. C. at page 330, 53 S. E. at page 852, 8 Ann. Cas. 361:

"Notwithstanding the conflict between the courts as to the effect of a tender made after the law day, it seems to be agreed by all that a mortgagor may preserve his right to redeem against any purchaser by giving him notice of the tender before or at the sale"—citing Cranston v. Crane, 97 Mass. 459, 93 Am. Dec. 106, supra; Jones on Mortgages, supra.

This the defendants did not do, but the opposite, as they not only assented to the sale, but actually participated in the bidding. It would be very inequitable that they now should be allowed to set up their alleged tender, after they had held out to the plaintiff by their conduct that there was no such objection, or, if it ever existed, that they waived it. Having been silent when they should have spoken, we will not hear them speak when they should be silent. They had undoubtedly a right to buy at the sale to protect their own title, but the obligation rested upon them not to put another to a disadvantage by their conduct, and cause him to do what otherwise he would not have done, if the defendant's claim had been disclosed. Even in the assertion or protection of his own rights, a party should not by his acts or conduct mislead others, who will be prejudiced thereby, because of their ignorance of facts which were known to him and also because of his conduct, which induced them to act. The doctrine is well stated by the learned reporter in the fourth head-note to Mason v. Williams, 66 N. C. 564:

"Not only the uberrima fides, but that simple bona fides which the law exacts from every man, required the true owner to make known his claim at said sale or never; he should have given all bidders the advantages he possessed from his exclusive knowledge; his omission to do so amounted to a negligence which imperiled the interests of others, and gave him an unfair advantage over them, enabling him, if he could, to buy low, and thereby secure an indisputable title, or, if another outbid him, to fall back on his reserved claim."

There Mr. Mason attended the sale to protect his interest in the property, but he assented to the sale without making known his claim, or his object in bidding, and he bid for the property, and by his silence induced another to buy. He was held to be estopped afterwards to assert his title against the purchaser. That case has been approved many times by this court.

In Morris v. Herndon, 113 N. C. 236, at page 239, 18 S. E. 203, at page 205, Shepherd, C. J., thus refers to the case:

"The rule is that if a man so conducts himself, whether intentionally or not, that a reasonable person would infer that a certain state of things exists, and acts on that inference, he shall be afterwards estopped from denying it"—citing Mason v. Williams, supra.

The passage was quoted from the opinion of Bramwell, B., in Cornish v. Abingdon, 4 Hurl. & Nor. (Exch. Rep.) 549. He also quotes from 2 Herman on Estoppel, 9627, as follows:

"But this is applicable only in the case where the foundation of the estoppel is in silence or acquiescence, for, when the owner concurs in a sale by participating in it at the time, it becomes his own act."

And in Biggs v. Brickell, 68 N. C. 239, Justice Boyden refers to the case in these words:

"Can any one maintain that the debtor who assented to this sale could have successfully defended an action of ejectment brought against him by the defendant? We think the case of Lentz v. Chambers, 27 N. C. 587 [44 Am. Dec. 63], and the case of Mason v. Williams, 66 N. C. 564, and the cases therein cited, are decisive of the question."

In this case it appears, from the defendants' own testimony, that they attended the sale, assented to it, and the male defendant was one of the bidders; that they gave no notice of their tender to the plaintiff or any other bidder. There seems to be no controversy about the facts, and the case falls within the principles of tender, payment of money into court, and estoppel, which we have stated as being settled by the authorities cited.

We have assumed in the discussion that the tender itself, as alleged by the defendants, was sufficiently made, that is, was in due form, though there is reason to doubt it. No error.

SASSER et al. v. HARRISS et al. (No. 281.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 15, 1919.)

APPEAL AND ERROR  $\S$  781(4)—DISMISSAL OF APPEAL INVOLVING MOOT OR USELESS QUESTIONS.

An order restraining holding a primary election on a date fixed by the city board of elections, and requiring it to be held on the date fixed by law, will not be reviewed long after the primary election has been held.

Appeal from Superior Court, New Hanover County; Calvert, Judge.

Action by L. B. Sasser and others against W. N. Harriss and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Appeal dismissed.

E. K. Bryan and A. G. Ricaud, both of Wilmington, for appellants.

Iredell Meares, of Wilmington, for appellees.

BROWN, J. This is an action by the plaintiffs against the defendants, constituting the members of the city board of elections of the city of Wilmington, for the purpose of having declared void the call made by the board for the primary election under the act of the General Assembly of 1919, authorizing the board of elections to call the primary and fix the date for the holding thereof, which act is recited in the record.

The cause was heard before his honor, Thomas H. Calvert, judge, at the March term, A. D. 1919, of the superior court of New Hanover county, and upon said hearing his honor restrained the holding of the said primary election on the date fixed by the board, and ordered the election to be held on the date as provided by the law in force relative thereto, prior to the passage of the act of 1919, and from the judgment of the court, defendants appealed.

It appears that the primary election has long since been held, and doubtless the candidates now have been duly elected. Nothing can now be accomplished by setting aside the order of Judge Calvert. If his judgment was reversed, this court could not now order another primary. The question has thus become merely a moot question, and there is nothing for the judgment of the court to operate upon.

The appeal is dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

STATE v. MINCHER. (No. 209.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 8, 1919.)

1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION  $\S$ 129(2)—JOINDER OF COUNTS FOR LARCENY AND FOR RECEIVING STOLEN GOODS VALID.

A count for larceny may be joined with one for receiving stolen goods in the same indictment.

2. CRIMINAL LAW  $\S$ 370—RECEIVING STOLEN GOODS  $\S$ 8(4)—POSSESSION OF OTHER STOLEN PROPERTY EVIDENCE OF GUILTY KNOWLEDGE.

In a prosecution for receiving stolen goods, evidence as to defendant's possession of a watch stolen at another time and an article in the daily paper which defendant took, relating to the theft, were competent evidence on the question of guilty knowledge.

3. CRIMINAL LAW  $\S$ 370—EVIDENCE OF RECEIPT OF OTHER STOLEN GOODS ADMISSIBLE TO SHOW GUILTY KNOWLEDGE.

Where defendant admitted he had received the stolen property from a convict, who was in his charge with no opportunity to make money, but who secured it while allowed to be away from camp, evidence of the receipt of other stolen property by defendant was admissible upon the question of guilty knowledge.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lenoir County; Daniels, Judge.

E. W. Mincher was convicted under an indictment charging larceny and receiving of stolen goods, and he appeals. No error.

The defendant appeals from a judgment pronounced upon an indictment, charging in one count larceny and in the other receiving one gold watch, three pieces of English gold coin, and one $2½ gold piece of United States coin, the property of E. A. Adrey.

The state's evidence tended to show that the defendant had been for six years an overseer of the convict road force of Lenoir county. Among the other prisoners, under the control of and worked by the defendant at the convict camp of the county, was Will Gorham, who had been a trusty for some time. About the 18th or 20th of December, 1918, a watch and chain were stolen from J. T. Hearne, a witness for the state. On the night of Tuesday, January 28, 1919, several stores in the city of Kinston were broken open and goods and other articles were taken from them. On the same night the home of E. A. Adrey, a Syrian merchant of the town, was entered and about $300 in bills, gold, and checks were stolen. Among this money were three English gold pounds, one $2½ gold piece of American money, a $5 gold piece, a half pound of African money, some Greek money, about the size of a quarter, a Chinese dime, and some Philippine Island money. On the next morning (Wednesday morning) the officers found a track of a man in his stocking feet and tracked him from about the edge of town to the iron bridge and to the stockade. There they arrested Will Gorham. In consequence of what they learned from him the latter part of March, 1919, they took out a search warrant and searched the house and premises of the defendant, Mincher. This was about 40 or 50 yards from the stockade. Put away in a trunk, which was locked, were three gold pieces, the property of Adrey, and later they obtained from him, in addition to these three gold pieces, a $2½ gold piece, also the property of Adrey. The defendant at the time was wearing the watch of Hearne attached to another chain. The hands had been changed and the number inside had been scratched out. Will Gorham was convicted at the August term, 1918, of Lenoir county of housebreaking and was serving the sentence of five years on the roads for such offense. Adrey did not succeed in finding or recovering any of the rest of his money. It appeared further from the testimony of Rhem, superintendent of roads, that Gorham was made a trusty in the fall of 1918, and that he (Rhem) left the stockade on Saturday night and other nights. During his absence the convicts were left in charge of Mincher one Saturday and Sunday, and of John Ipock on the next. He further testified that the defendant, Mincher, had entire charge of the camp when he (Rhem) was absent. The defendant was a subscriber to the Kinston Daily News during the period when these robberies were going on, and had been for several years before. It was taken to him by a rural carrier. In the issue of that paper of January 30, 1919, there was a full account of the robberies the preceding Tuesday night, including those of the Adrey home and also a list of the coins stolen therefrom. There was evidence also on the part of the state that Will Gorham was permitted to leave camp nearly every Saturday night and would not be back until after 11 o'clock Sunday night; that Will Gorham brought money back with him on some of these trips $10 and $20 bills, which he gave to the cook, another trusty, to keep for him; that he gave the $2½ piece, the English pounds, and some paper money to the defendant on the road; that the defendant knew of Will's bringing to the camp a large quantity of Reyno cigarettes, as the witness overheard Mincher tell Will, "You had better get them cigarettes, out of the cage, old Thad Tyndall is talking," and the defendant and Will were having secret talks together mostly every night after supper.

The defendant in his testimony admitted getting the $2½ and English pound pieces from Will some time in February, 1919. He admitted also getting the watch from Will, but claimed that he did not know that they were stolen. It appears in the testimony that defendant was in Kinston the night in which Hearne's house was robbed; this, also, he admits.

The defendant moved to quash the indictment upon the ground that the two counts could not be joined. Overruled, and the defendant excepted.

The defendant also excepted to the admission of evidence as to the watch found in his possession because it was shown to be the property of Hearne, and if stolen it was not at the same time when the property described in the indictment was stolen.

Also, to the introduction of the Daily News containing an account of the robberies.

Fred I. Sutton and T. C. Wooten, both of Kinston, for appellant.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

ALLEN, J. [1] It has been the uniform practice in this state to join a count for larceny with one for receiving in one indictment, and this has been repeatedly approved. State v. Baker, 70 N. C. 685; State v. Stancill, 100 S. E. 241, at this term.

[2] The evidence as to the watch and the article from the Daily News belong to the same class of testimony, and both were competent on the question of guilty knowledge.

[3] The defendant admitted he received the watch as well as the property charged in the indictment from Gorham, a convict in his charge, who had no opportunity to make money, and who was in the habit of leaving camp at night; but he denied that he knew that any of the property was stolen, and this was the real question in controversy before the jury.

The number of the watch had been scratched out, the hands changed, and the defendant testified he was to pay Gorham $8 for it, while Hearne said it was worth $40.

It was also shown that the Daily News was delivered to him as a subscriber regularly, and that it contained an account of the stealing from the house of Adrey before the defendant received the property from Gorham, and the defendant, testifying in his own behalf, did not deny that he knew of the newspaper article.

This evidence comes clearly within the principle of State v. Simons, 100 S. E. 239, and State v. Stancill, 100 S. E. 241, at this term, in which the authorities are collected and discussed.

The court says in the first of these cases:

"There are offenses which are committed in sudden temper, or under violent provocation, or by the impulse of passion. As to these the only competent evidence is what took place at the time. State v. Norton, 82 N. C. 630. But the crime of illicit dealing in intoxicating liquor is in the same class with larceny, counterfeiting, forgery, obtaining money under false pretenses, and burglary; which are all committed with deliberation, in defiance of law, and for the ignoble motive of making profit thereby. In all such cases it is competent to prove intent by showing matters of like nature before or after the offense."

And in the second, in which the defendant was charged with the larceny and receiving of tobacco, the property of J. H. Little, and evidence that other tobacco in his possession was stolen from one Wilkinson was admitted:

"The testimony as to the theft of the Wilkinson tobacco was offered merely to show the intent with which the defendants stole this tobacco, and not to prove the accusation substantively. It was sufficiently connected with the main charge to render it competent for this purpose. It was all taken to Raymond Stancill's, the common storehouse for the loot of these defendants. * * * It is said in State v. Murphy, 84 N. C. 742: 'Evidence of a "collateral offense" of the same character and connected with that charged in an indictment, and tending to prove the guilty knowledge of the defendant, when that is an essential element of the crime, is admissible; therefore on the trial of an indictment for the larceny of a hog, where the prosecutor testified that he identified the property as his in an inclosure of the defendant, and demanded its delivery to him, it was held competent for the state to prove by the testimony of another witness that at the same time and place, and in the presence of the prosecutor and defendant, such witness said that the other hog therein was his, and he then and there claimed and demanded it of defendant.' In that case the court says, in an opinion by Justice Ashe, who always wrote clearly, accurately, and vigorously, and reviews the law at length: 'Where the question of identity or intent is involved, or where it is necessary to show a guilty knowledge on the part of the prisoner, evidence may be received of other criminal acts than those charged in the indictment'—citing and approving Yarborough v. State, 41 Ala. 405; Thorp v. State, 15 Ala. 749. The whole question is considered and fully reviewed in Gray v. Cartwright, 174 N. C. 49, 93 S. E. 432, where the authorities are collected. This question is fully discussed by the Chief Justice in State v. Simons, 100 S. E. 239, at this term, and evidence of the kind admitted in this case is held there to be competent to show knowledge, intent, and motive."

The other exceptions to evidence are untenable and require no discussion, and an examination of the charge shows that it is clear, accurate, full, and fair.

No error.

1. CARRIERS ⇐35—AGREEMENT TO SUBMIT CLAIM OF SHIPPER FOR REPARATION INVALID.

Shipper in interstate commerce, who, having paid a rate less than that established under authority of Interstate Commerce Commission, because of railroad's ignorance of increase thereof, paid difference between old and new rate upon railroad's promise to submit shipper's claim for reparation to Corporation Commission, cannot recover for railroad's breach of such promise; the promise being void under U. S. Comp. St. 1916, §§ 8569, 8574, prohibiting rebating, and the damages being speculative, because of impossibility of determining how Corporation Commission would have decided case.

2. CARRIERS ⇐35—AGREEMENT FOR INTERSTATE SHIPMENT AT LESS THAN PRESCRIBED RATE ILLEGAL.

Agreement for interstate shipment at a rate less than that prescribed is illegal, under U. S. Comp. St. 1916, §§ 8569, 8574, though rate has been misquoted to shipper and received by the agent of the carrier by the mere mistake or the negligence of such agent.

There can be no recovery on a contract for services made with an illegal design in view, or for the purpose of enabling the beneficiary to accomplish an unlawful object.

Appeal from Superior Court, Chowan County; Devin, Judge.

Action by the Edenton Cotton Mills against the Norfolk Southern Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

The action, as it appears from the pleadings, was brought to recover certain alleged freight overcharges for goods shipped by the plaintiff over the lines of defendant and connecting carriers. It turns out that certain freight rates had been established with the sanction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which afterwards were duly changed and increased in amount, but the parties to this action were not aware of the change at the time that the charges were made against the plaintiff. When the change of rates was discovered, the defendant demanded the difference between the rates charged and the amount received under the old tariff and those due under the tariff of rates as amended and increased by the commission. This amount, or difference, was paid by the plaintiff, and it now alleges that the defendant entered into a special agreement with it as follows:

"(1) The defendant undertook, promised, and agreed, for and on behalf of plaintiff, that it would take charge of, present, and submit the same [that is, its claim for reparation] to the said Corporation Commission in proper form and manner and in due time for adjustment and allowance, and time and again, when this plaintiff would call upon it for settlement, stated to this plaintiff that it was then attending to the matter and would have the same presented in reasonable time, which undertaking, agreement, and promise this plaintiff reasonably relied upon.

"(2) Notwithstanding the defendant's undertaking, promise, and agreement aforesaid, and notwithstanding it had assumed the duty aforesaid to this plaintiff, the defendant neglected and wrongfully failed and refused to do its duty as it had agreed to do, and in justice and right was required to do, until more than two years after the plaintiff had paid the overcharges as demanded by the defendant and had suffered the damage aforesaid, and after all right and power to consider and allow the same were by lapse of time denied the Interstate Commerce Commission under the law.

"(3) The claims and demands of the plaintiff aforesaid were, after a lapse of two years from the time the right of demand accrued, presented to the said Interstate Commerce Commission, and that commission disallowed the same solely upon the ground that, because of the delay aforesaid, it was not permitted by law to consider the same.

"(4) That but for the promise, undertaking, and assurance of the defendant, as hereinbefore set out, and but for the reliance of the plaintiff on the same, and its belief that the defendant was performing its duty as it had undertaken to do, this plaintiff would have presented and prosecuted before the Corporation Commission the claim aforesaid, to which there was no defense, and about which there was no dispute, and would have recovered the money justly due it.

"(5) That by reason of the wrongful and unlawful conduct of the defendant aforesaid, and its failure to perform its duty as hereinbefore set forth, the plaintiff has been damaged in a large sum."

There is a prayer for judgment; the amount claimed being $1,000.

The defendant answered, and denied the material allegations as to the contract. It denied that it had overcharged the plaintiff, and averred that the plaintiff had been charged at the established and promulgated rates, and further that the defendant could not, under the Interstate Commerce Act, have charged any less; that the defendant could not refund any of the sums paid, without the same being authorized under the said law.

The jury found against the defendant as to the contract and its breach, and allowed the amount of the excess over the rates promulgated July 20, 1911 (the old rates), as damages. Judgment was entered upon the verdict, and defendant appealed.

J. N. Pruden, of Edenton, and Ehringhaus & Small, of Elizabeth City, for appellee.

WALKER, J. [1, 2] If we concede that the evidence tends to show a contract as alleged, and not a mere gratuitous offer to lend its aid and assistance in obtaining a refund of the difference between the two rates, as paid by the plaintiff, and also that the contract, if made as alleged by the plaintiff, was founded upon a sufficient consideration, our opinion is that the plaintiff cannot recover, as the contract is illegal; it being contrary to the provisions of the law against rebating or giving undue preferences, privileges, or concessions, which is made a misdemeanor by the Interstate Commerce Act, both as to persons and corporations participating in the unlawful act. U. S. Compiled Statutes (1916) Annotated, vol. 8, title "Interstate and Foreign Commerce," §§ 8569 and 8574, and notes, where many authorities are collected. The language of the act of Congress is very stringent in regard to the duty of the shipper to pay and of the carrier to collect the schedule rates on all shipments of freight. The cases cited in notes to the sections of the Compiled Statutes show conclusively that the agreement for a shipment at a rate less than that prescribed cannot be recognized by the courts, and it makes no difference whether the rate has been misquoted to the shipper and received by the agent of the carrier by the mere mistake or the negligence of the latter. The only rate is the true rate, as authorized by the commission. It was held in T. & R. Ry. Co. v. Mugg, 202 U. S. 242, 26 Sup. Ct. 628, 50 L. Ed. p. 1011, that where a carrier has negligently made and quoted to a shipper rates on interstate shipments of coal, upon which he has relied in contracting for the coal, selling at prices based on such rates, which were lower than the rates which had been duly published, printed, and posted as required by the Interstate Commerce Act, and the carrier, as required by the act, collects the prescribed rates, the shipper cannot recover against the carrier for damages occasioned by its misrepresentation of the rates. To the same effect are Alabama Lumber & Exp. Co. v. Philadelphia, B. & W. R. Co., 19 Interst. Com. R. 295, and Texas & P. R. Co. v. Leslie, 62 Tex. Civ. App. 380, 131 S. W. 824, motion for rehearing overruled 62 Tex. Civ. App. 380, 131 S. W. 827. See, also, Ill., etc., R. Co. v. Henderson Elevator Co., 226 U. S. 441, 33 Sup. Ct. 176, 57 L. Ed. 290; Va.-Caro. Peanut Co. v. Railroad Co., 166 N. C. 62, 82 S. E. 1. The following cases are to the same effect, as will appear by statement of the substance of each decision:

"Acceptance by railroad of charge less than rate filed by mistake, not discovered till after consignee's settlement with his principal, held not to create waiver or estoppel, precluding recovery of balance from consignee." Penn. R. Co. v. Titus, 216 N. Y. 17, 109 N. E. 857, L. R. A. 1916E, 1127, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 862.

"A person dealing with a carrier is as effectually bound by the law and the orders of the Commerce Commission, as to both freight and passenger tariffs, as is carrier itself, and neither is estopped to assert the illegality of contract made in violation of the act and orders of the commission." Melody v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 25 S. D. 606, 127 N. W. 543, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 568, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 727.

The same was held in B. & O., etc., Rwy. Co. v. N. A. Box & Basket Co., 48 Ind. App. 647, 94 N. E. 906, 96 N. E. 28; La. Rwy. & Nav. Co. v. Holly, 127 La. 615, 53 South. 882; N. Y., etc., R. Co. v. York & W. Co., 215 Mass. 36, 102 N. E. 366.

An agreement of a carrier to refund a part of the rates lawfully charged and collected is in violation of the Act and unenforceable. L. & R. Co. v. Coquillard Wagon Works, 147 Ky. 530, 144 S. W. 1080. Carrier cannot, directly or indirectly, contract for a rate different from that specified in its schedules. St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. S. R. Stone Co., 169 Mo. App. 109, 154 S. W. 465. A suit by a shipper for a loss of goods on a policy of insurance issued to the carrier, after receipt of the limited value fixed on such goods by the carrier's schedules and bills of lading, was held to be in violation of the act of Congress, amended by Act June 29, 1906, c. 3591, 34 Stat. 586, as seeking or soliciting a rebate or concession, and not maintainable. Duplan Silk Co. v. Am. & For. Marine Ins. Co., 205 Fed. 724, 124 C. C. A. 18. A carrier may recover from a shipper, who has paid the legal rate, a refund made to the shipper by carrier's agent, either by mistake of carrier or through agent's illegal act. Cent. of Ga. R. Co. v. Curtis, 14 Ga. App. 716, 82 S. E. 318; L. & N. R. Co. v. Allen, 152 Ky. 145, 153 S. W. 198 (s. c. reaffirmed, 152 Ky. 837, 154 S. W. 371); Ga. R. Co. v. Creety, 5 Ga. App. 424, 63 S. E. 528; Schenberger v. Union Pac. R. Co., 84 Kan. 79, 113 Pac. 433, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 391.

It all comes to this: That the carrier is bound to collect and the shipper to pay the published rates, even though the agent of the carrier has by his conduct caused the shipper to pay a lower rate to his prejudice in fixing the price of his goods, or in any other way. La. R. & N. Co. v. Holly, 127 La. 615, 53 South. 882; Baldwin S. & L. Co. v. Columbia S. R. Co., 58 Or. 285, 114 Pac. 469; So. Pac. Co. v. Frye & Bruhn, 82 Wash. 9, 143 Pac. 163; Hamlen v. Ill. Cent. R. Co. (D. C.) 212 Fed. 324. Ignorance of shipper as to the correct rates will not excuse him, and he should not rely on representations of carrier or his agent as to them. St. L., etc., R. Co. v. Faulkner, 111 Ark. 430, 164 S. W. 763; Wyrick v. Mo., etc., R. Co., 74 Mo. App. 406; Baldwin S. & L. Co. v. Columbia

S. R. Co., supra. Those cases show how strictly the courts have required carriers and shippers to live up to the letter of the law enacted by Congress for the purpose of exacting rigid compliance with the main intention, that there should be no favoritism or discrimination, and no unfair competition, in the form of rebates, or by other methods of business.

The Interstate Commerce Commission considered a question similar to the one now before us, and through Commissioner Clements it said in Forster Bros. Co. v. Duluth etc., R. Co., 14 Interst. Com. R. at page 236:

"It is unfortunate that shippers should be misled to their injury by erroneous information furnished by representatives of carriers as to the rate in effect. It is, of course, the duty of carriers' agents to furnish correct information as to the proper application of the lawful established rates. However, the law requires that tariffs shall be open to public inspection, and therefore shippers are themselves charged with notice of the rate lawfully applicable. The commission cannot consider an erroneous rate quotation made by an agent of a carrier as the basis for an award of reparation to a shipper who thereby suffers damage. Collusion between the carrier and a shipper, which it desired to favor, for protection of other than the tariff rates, would be rendered too easy of accomplishment. In such case the carrier could protect any rate which it might desire to apply, by simply quoting it to the favored shipper, and thus the integrity of the published tariffs (a strict observance of which is required by law in order to prevent unjust discrimination) would be constantly violated."

This matter has been recently considered by this court in Southern R. Co. v. Latham, 176 N. C. 417, at page 419, 97 S. E. 234, 235, where Justice Hoke, for the court, says:

"It is clear that defendants are responsible for the amount properly due for these shipments, both as consignors under the bill of lading presented and under the express agreement that they were to prepay the freight in protection of the designated consignee, and, further, that this amount must be determined by the rates of the schedules and tariff established, pursuant to law"—citing Tex. Pac. Ry. v. Mugg & Dryden, 202 U. S. 242, 26 Sup. Ct. 628, 50 L. Ed. 1011; Central of Ga. Ry. v. Birmingham Sand & Brick Co., 9 Ala. App. 419, 64 South. 202; Baltimore, etc., Ry. v. New Albany, etc., Basket Co., 48 Ind. App. 647, 94 N. E. 906, 96 N. E. 28; Holt v. Westcott, 43 Me. 445, 69 Am. Dec. 74; Asheboro Wheelbarrow Co. v. Ry., 149 N. C. 261, 62 S. E. 1091.

Railway Co. v. Mugg, supra, is quoted with approval, where it is said:

"A common carrier may exact the regular rate for an interstate shipment, as shown by its printed and published schedules on file with the Interstate Commerce Commission and posted, . . . as required by the Interstate Commerce Act, although a lower rate was quoted by the carrier to the shipper, who shipped under the lower rate so quoted."

And then the case of Balto. & Ohio Railway Co. v. New Albany, etc., Basket Co., supra, where the court held:

(1) "One who engages a railroad company to transport freight in interstate commerce is liable for the established rate on such freight, regardless of any contract such shipper might have with the consignee."

(4) "A shipper must take notice of the rates for interstate shipments; and he relies, at his peril, on the statement of the carrier's agent."

(5) "An interstate carrier is not estopped from recovering the balance due for a shipment by the unauthorized act of its agent in quoting an illegal freight rate."

And finally the case of Cent. of Ga. Ry. v. Birmingham Sand & Brick Co., supra, where the same rule was thus stated:

"Under the Interstate Commerce Act, the freight rate of an interstate shipment is not that named in the bill of lading or contract of shipment, but the lawful rate existing at the time, whether or not such rate is known to the consignor or consignee, and regardless of whether the parties were misled by the carrier as to the lawful rate, or whether it had posted the lawful rate as required by the statute; hence the carrier cannot by any act estop itself from demanding the lawful rate."

So that the principle is firmly settled that the only rate is the rate fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission and published, and no contract, agreement, or understanding between the parties can change it.

In this case, if recovery by the plaintiff were adjudged, he would be given a rate for the transportation of his goods and wares which would be less than that allowed to other shippers. It is no answer to the assertion to say that plaintiff would merely be recovering damages for a breach of contract, and not recovering a favor from the defendant by a reduction of the published rate, contrary to the express provision of the act forbidding any concession, privilege, or discrimination. It is not the manner of showing a favor to the plaintiff, so much as the substance of it, that we must consider in passing upon the question whether there has been either a direct or indirect violation of the law. If the resultant effect is bad, and comes within the prohibition, it matters little what particular form it takes. The clear and ultimate result is that plaintiff will have had his goods hauled at a less rate than that which was published at the time the service was rendered. If defendant can be compelled to pay the difference by an action in court, it can pay it just the same without such an action; that is, voluntarily. All it will have to do, then, in order to circumvent the act and give the plaintiff what is, in effect, a rebate, is what has been done here—contract to render service in obtaining reparation for the amount paid in excess of the mistakenly supposed rate, and then refuse to perform the contract and instead pay the damages.

Such a course would open the door wide for collusion and corrupt bargaining to violate the law, and would therefore be against public policy as declared by the act, which seeks to compel equal and impartial service to all alike, and to abolish rebates and discrimination in any and every form, as being in violation of the very terms of the act, and opposed to the wise policy inaugurated by it, which was so firmly enforced in Duplan Silk Co. v. Am. & For. Marine Ins. Co., supra. There the defendant paid the stipulated value of $1 per pound for the silk carried by it and lost in a marine disaster to one of the carrier's boats. The plaintiff sued on a marine policy, but the court held, as we have shown, that he could not recover, as, though the suit was a collateral one, and not against the carrier, it was forbidden by the Interstate Commerce Law (Act Feb. 4, 1887, c. 104, § 16a) as added by section 6 of the Act of June 29, 1906 (Hepburn Act), 34 Stat. 584 (U. S. Comp. St. § 8585), prohibiting the carrier to give, or the shipper to receive or solicit, any rebate or concession for schedule rates, and no question as to the right of the shipper to recover otherwise on the policy was considered; the decision being confined to the single point above stated.

[3] Where a contract for services is made with an illegal design in view, or for enabling the beneficiary to accomplish an unlawful object, no recovery will be allowed upon it. 9 Cyc. 573; Clark on Contracts (2d Ed.) p. 254 et seq. The court said in the Duplan Silk Case, supra:

"The libellant argues that the giving of marine insurance by the railroad company is not a rebate, facility, or concession connected with transportation within the meaning of the act. We think this altogether too technical. No one could contend that a carrier which charged its published rate of freight could lawfully agree in addition to pay the shipper's life insurance or office rent or wages of any of his employes. It is next urged that this insurance was not a discrimination, because it was given to all shippers equally. Nevertheless it was a violation of the act by the carrier, because not stated in its tariff schedules. Indeed, the express contrary was stated, viz. that the carrier would not assume marine insurance unless it was specifically provided for; and the libellant, even though not aware of the insurance at the time the goods were shipped, is by this suit violating the act, inasmuch as it is knowingly soliciting a concession by which its shipment was being transported at a less rate than that named in the tariffs published and filed by such carrier." American Exp. Co. v. United States, 212 U. S. 522, 29 Sup. Ct. 315, 53 L. Ed. 635; Chicago, St. P., M. & O. Ry. Co. v. United States, 162 Fed. 835, 90 C. C. A. 211. If the libellant recover in this suit, it will get at the expense of the railroad company the full value of its shipment as if it had paid three times first-class freight, when it is only entitled to the agreed value on the freight paid."

It was therefore held there that it was a clear case of soliciting for an advantage or favor beyond that allowed to other shippers, and in our case the plaintiff asks to recover on a special contract for the rendering of a service which is not specified in the carrier's schedule of rates, and a service, too, not granted or promised to the other shippers over its line. By thus seeking to gain an advantage over others, the plaintiff, by this suit, is, according to the authorities, itself guilty of violating the Interstate Commerce Act. A similar view was taken by the Circuit Court of Appeals in Washington, etc., R. R. Co. v. Mobile & O. R. Co., 253 Fed. 12, at page 14, 166 C. C. A. 342, as follows:

"Defendants make the proposition that, after having received money in payment of a freight charge, the Mobile & Ohio had the right to do with it as it pleased, and the right to give it to the Washington & Choctaw, if it so desired. This proposition cannot receive the sanction of the courts. It is a mistake to assume that the railroad companies may do as they please with that which they receive. They are public corporations, charged with public duties, and those duties cannot be performed without a proper conservation and administration of their revenues. The rate-making bodies of the country must see to it that reasonable rates are fixed, with the view of enabling the companies to perform their public duties. The proper fixing of rates is inconsistent with an unrestrained right upon the part of the railroad companies to donate or otherwise dispose of their funds, except for the purposes and in the manner contemplated by the laws. Even if this general proposition could be controverted, there could be no question about the duty of railroad companies to conform their interstate transactions to the terms of the Interstate Commerce Act. Tariffs and divisions would be rendered nugatory, if the interested companies could, by repayments and readjustments of accounts, bring about any result they might desire as between themselves and connecting lines, or between themselves and shippers. It is the right and the duty of railroad companies which have improperly paid out money to connecting lines under a mistake of fact, or with knowledge of the unlawful character of payment, to recover such payments. The conclusions reached, and so well stated, by the trial judge, are concurred in entirely."

But there is another ground upon which plaintiff's recovery may be defeated. If defendant can be sued upon the alleged contract, there is no way of determining with any certainty in law how the Interstate Commerce Commission would have decided the case, if it had been properly constituted before it and diligently prosecuted by the defendant carrier, in behalf of the plaintiff, if such a proceeding would have been permitted by the commission at all. It is a judicial question, and there is no way of foreseeing or foretelling what the decision would have been, or of knowing, in advance, what would be its conclusion, whether in favor of the shipper or the carrier. It may have ordered reparation to be made, or it may have refused to do so, in the exercise of its own judgment as to the law and merits of the case. There is no possible way, therefore, of telling beforehand whether there would be any order for reparation or for the return of a part of the money paid on the freight charges. It would be highly unseemly for a court to foretell its own opinion of a case, and what the decision would be if it were brought before it, and no respectable court would do such a thing, nor should any such wrong be imputed to it. Even if it should do so, its opinion could be changed, when the facts are developed, at any time before the decision, and it would be its duty to change it. So we are unable to say, in advance of a decision, whether the plaintiff would sustain any damages. They are, therefore, too uncertain and speculative to be safely estimated. Machine Co. v. Tobacco Co., 141 N. C. 284, 53 S. E. 885; Wilkinson v. Dunbar, 149 N. C. 20, 62 S. E. 748; Hardware Co. v. Buggy Co., 167 N. C. 423, 83 S. E. 557; Coles v. Lumber Co., 150 N. C. 183, 63 S. E. 736.

We need not discuss the question, which has been raised, whether there is any consideration for the contract, apart from its illegal nature, and the uncertainty as to any loss from a breach of it. But the principal ground of decision is that the tendency of such a contract, and its probable, if not inevitable, effect, would be to violate one of the important provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act, the one against rebates and discrimination among shippers, which was enacted to protect them and the public against such unfair and collusive agreements.

The motion for a nonsuit should have been sustained, and for this error we reverse the judgment and order the action to be dismissed.

Reversed.

STATE v. BALDWIN. (No. 241.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 8, 1919.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS ⇨236(7) — EVIDENCE SUSTAINING CONVICTION ON ILLEGAL POSSESSION.

In a prosecution for having in his possession intoxicating liquor for the purpose of sale, evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction.

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS ⇨233(2)—ILLEGAL POSSESSION SHOWN BY CONDITION OF PREMISES.

In a prosecution for having in his possession intoxicating liquors for the purpose of sale, evidence of the condition of defendant's premises and the liquor corks, etc., stored therein, is competent to show purpose of defendant in having the liquor.

3. CRIMINAL LAW ⇨829(1), 834(2) — LANGUAGE OF REQUESTS NEED NOT BE FOLLOWED.

A trial judge need not adopt the language of the requests, and it is sufficient if they be covered by the charge given.

4. CRIMINAL LAW ⇨818—ERROR IN INSTRUCTION AS TO INTENT CORRECTED BY RETRACTION.

In a prosecution for having possession of intoxicating liquor with intent to sell, where the trial court promptly corrected his erroneous statement that the law presumed an intent or purpose to sell from the bare fact of possession of more than a quart and stated the correct rule, the error was sufficiently retracted.

5. CRIMINAL LAW ⇨825(1)—SOLICITOR MAY RESTATE CONTENTIONS WHILE COURT RECAPITULATING THEM.

In a prosecution for having possession of intoxicating liquor with intent to sell, it was not error to permit the solicitor to restate his contentions while the court was recapitulating them on both sides, and, if the contentions were misstated, the court's attention should have been called to it so that the proper correction could have been made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Allen, Judge.

Joe Baldwin was convicted of having in his possession intoxicating liquors for the purpose of sale, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Defendant was tried under an indictment containing four counts for:

(1) Having sold whisky to parties unknown.

(2) Having whisky in his possession for the purpose of sale.

(3) Having received more than one quart in one package at one time.

(4) Having received more than a quart within 15 days.

There was a verdict of guilty, and, from the judgment upon such conviction, the defendant appealed to this court. The judge, however, confined the jury's consideration to whether defendant had intoxicating liquors in his possession for the purpose of sale.

There was testimony which tended to show that three officers of Wake county, Raines, Honeycutt, and Broadwell, in consequence of information which they had received, went to Apex on the evening of December 18, 1918, and about 8 o'clock that evening stationed themselves in a plum thicket near defendant's house, which was situated just outside of the limits of that town by the Seaboard Air Line Railroad. While they were there, an automobile came up. The driver, putting out the lights when he was approaching the house, ran up in front of defendant's driveway, which led into his back lot, and stopped. When the officers had arrived within about 50 yards of the car, they could see a man going to and coming from it, the moon at the time shining brightly. They arrested this man as he put down the last jug inside the gate of defendant. The man himself was Hayes Baldwin, a brother of defendant, and there were four jugs, two of two gallons, one of three gallons, and one of one gallon, each jug in a guano sack. One of the officers stated that they contained monkey rum, and the other corn whisky. Officer Raines, sending Broadwell to the front door of defendant's house, went himself to the back door. The house was lighted, and he, going inside, found two white boys and two white women, as well as the wife of Hayes Baldwin, but did not find Joe Baldwin or his wife therein. He found one quart of whisky outside of the back door on a little shelf. Officer Honeycutt, while Raines was in the house, went to the back door with Hayes Baldwin in charge, and while there a little negro boy ran out. This attracted his attention, and, while watching the boy, Hayes made his escape. He found in the yard a broken-down automobile and a box that had a half gallon of cork stoppers in it. By the garage was a small chicken house, and Honeycutt, throwing his searchlight in it, found seven five-gallon kegs of corn whisky. This they deposited with the four jugs at the gate. After the search, the officers, intending to use the automobile in which Hayes Baldwin had driven up to carry the liquor which they had found, were engaged in putting the liquor in the machine, when Hayes Baldwin, suddenly appearing, locked the machine so that they could not use it and again made his escape. It seems that the white people in Joe Baldwin's house were residents of the town of Wilson, and were on their way home when they stopped there. The white man claimed that his machine had broken down and that they stopped for the purpose of having it repaired. The officers, however, used his machine in carrying the liquor to Apex. The defendant was arrested on Friday afternoon, December 20th, about 75 yards from his home. He was left in the custody of the local deputy, Wall, on that occasion, and while the other officers went to search another house he made his escape. On the afternoon of the 20th they found, on defendant's premises, two five-gallon kegs of wine, one of which was set up in a corner of his garage with two glasses near it. This had a faucet which could be used only with a key. In this garage, too, they found a large number of wrappers for bottles, "the kind that are usually seen around them." They were pasteboards in the shape of pint bottles.

The officer Roy Honeycutt testified, as to the search on December 20th, as follows:

"I found a five-gallon jug about half full of Scuppernon wine, and a fifteen-gallon keg of Bullis wine, which was on the shelf in the garage, and a glass the size of that. One of them had a faucet that you could lock, and the lock was in the possession of Joe's wife, and that was put up there from the time we went there Wednesday night until Friday."

Defendant objected to this evidence, but it was admitted. This was defendant's second exception. His first exception was to the refusal of the court to permit an officer, who was a witness, to answer a question asked him on the cross-examination: "Did Mr. Harrison, the white man, tell you why he was at Joe Baldwin's house?" But testimony to this effect was afterwards admitted, without objection, and this is what they said to Officer Honeycutt:

"I had a conversation with the people in the house after I found the whisky. They didn't want to give me their names; I asked them two or three times. The older lady said her name was Mrs. Lambe, and the gentleman said he was Mr. Harrison and the other lady his wife. They told us the automobile was broken down, but it was the same automobile that was in the back yard, and it was the one they took us down to Apex in. They said their car was broken down there, and that they didn't know what kind of a house it was. They said they had not seen any whisky and would not have stopped there if they had known there was whisky there."

Defendant's third exception was taken to the court's refusal to give judgment as of nonsuit upon the evidence.

The remaining exceptions of the defendant were directed to the judge's charge, or to his refusal to charge as specially requested.

Exception 4 is founded upon the following state of facts: The judge had stated fully the contentions of the state upon the evidence and had followed this by a statement of the contentions of the defendant. The court, at this point, permitted the solicitor to make a statement of his contentions, as to the condition of the garage, but refused to embrace them in his charge. The court then stating that it allowed the defendant the same privilege, that is, to state his contentions, as to the condition of the garage.

Armistead Jones & Son, of Raleigh, and Percy J. Olive, of Apex, for appellant.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1,2] We have not stated all of the evidence tending to show defendant's guilt, but only so much as is necessary to a proper consideration of the exceptions taken at the trial. There was ample testimony to prove that defendant had liquor in his possession for the purpose of sale.

The testimony to which the defendant objected, and which was admitted, was competent to show how the search of the defendant's premises was made and what was discovered. It laid the foundation for further proof that the liquor was on his premises with his knowledge and consent, and that some of it was placed there by him or at his request. The discoveries tended to show preparation for the sale of liquor. The conduct of the defendant, when he returned to his home, was not that of an innocent man.

The first exception taken to the testimony as to what was said to the officer by some of the parties found at defendant's house, about their being there and why they were there, is without merit, because, if the evidence was competent of itself, the defendant got the full benefit of it afterwards. The error, if any, was harmless, at least so far as the defendant was concerned.

The second exception is equally without any merit. It was competent, and relevant, to show what was found on the defendant's premises, in the garage, and the chicken coop, and the condition of those places. It aroused a grave suspicion of retailing liquor, and gave rise to even more than a suspicion, as it tended strongly to prove an actual sale of liquor. Seven five-gallon kegs of corn whisky or "monkey rum" in the chicken coop, a half gallon of cork stoppers, a fifteen-gallon keg of Bullis wine, a five-gallon jug of Scuppernong wine, a glass about the proper size, the bottle wrappers, the locked faucet, with the key in the possession of defendant's wife, and the defendant's behavior when he came back to his home, form an array of circumstances which cannot be denied any potency as evidence of guilt. The condition of the premises as described by the witnesses, was competent to show the intent and purpose of the defendant in having the liquor.

The refusal to nonsuit was correct. This follows from what we have already, and circumstantially, said about the evidence and its sufficiency. State v. Atwood, 166 N. C. 438, 81 S. E. 318; State v. Turner, 171 N. C. 803, 88 S. E. 523; State v. Dobbins, 149 N. C. 465, 62 S. E. 635; State v. Blauntia, 170 N. C. 749, 87 S. E. 101; State v. Boynton, 155 N. C. 456, 71 S. E. 341; State v. Bush, 177 N. C. 551, 98 S. E. 281. The evidence we have here consists of "pregnant circumstances," as said in State v. Turner, supra. It is the cumulation of facts that makes it all fit for the consideration of the jury, and not any single fact. The evidence in this case is stronger than was that in State v. Jones, 175 N. C. 709, 95 S. E. 576, and State v.

Horner, 174 N. C. 788, 94 S. E. 291, where we sustained the convictions for distilling liquor.

[3] The charge of the court was all that the defendant could ask for. It covered the points in controversy, and, when read altogether, was a correct statement of the law bearing upon the case, and the defendant had the full benefit of the instructions requested by him so far as he was entitled to them. It was not required that the judge should adopt the language of the requests. Graves v. Jackson, 150 N. C. 383, 64 S. E. 128; Rencher v. Wynne, 86 N. C. 268.

[4] The judge fell into error when he stated that the law presumed an intent, or a purpose, to sell from the bare fact of possession of more than a quart; but he promptly, and even immediately, corrected the error and gave the proper instruction, in accordance with State v. Barrett, 138 N. C. 630, 50 S. E. 506, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 626; State v. Wilkerson, 164 N. C. 432, 79 S. E. 888; and State v. Bean, 175 N. C. 748, 94 S. E. 705. The error was sufficiently retracted, and the correct rule given as to the prima facie case, presumption of innocence, reasonable doubt, and burden of proof. It also appears that defendant himself led the court into the error as to the presumption by one of his own requests for instructions (No. 11).

[5] There was no error in permitting the solicitor to restate his contentions while the court was recapitulating them on both sides. If the contentions were misstated, the judge's attention should have been called to it, so that the proper correction could then be made; otherwise it is too late after verdict to complain. Bradley v. Mfg. Co., 177 N. C. 153, 98 S. E. 818.

The doctrine of actual and constructive possession was properly explained to the jury, in respect to its bearing upon the facts of this case, as it is stated in State v. Lee, 164 N. C. 533, 80 S. E. 405, and State v. Bush, 177 N. C. 551, 98 S. E. 281. There was evidence from which the jury could rightly infer that Hayes Baldwin was acting for defendant in bringing liquor to his premises for the purpose of sale, and also that the defendant was at times actually at his home and engaged in the sale of liquor from a stock, and a large one, which he kept on hand for sale, and at other times was constructively in possession of the premises and liquor for the same illegal purpose.

The trial was free from error, so far as we can see.

No error.

STATE v. BALDWIN. (No. 242.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 8, 1919.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW §732—STATUTES PROHIBITING EXPRESSION OF OPINION IN CHARGE STRICTLY CONSTRUED.

Revisal 1905, § 535, declaring that no judge in giving a charge to a petit jury in either a civil or criminal action shall give an opinion whether a fact is fully or sufficiently proven, being in derogation of the common law, must be strictly construed.

2. CRIMINAL LAW §1166½(12)—REMARKS OF JUDGE NOT EXPRESSION OF OPINION AS TO GUILT OF DEFENDANT IN ANOTHER CASE.

Where both defendant and his brother were separately convicted of having possession of intoxicating liquor for purpose of sale, the fact that the trial judge, in sentencing defendant's brother a week previous, remarked that in his opinion the two were delivering liquor to people of a particular town, is no ground for reversing judgment of conviction against defendant on the theory that such statement before bystanders and jury in first case was an expression of opinion as to defendant's guilt, for Revisal 1905, § 535, prohibiting the judge from expressing an opinion as to the facts, being in derogation of common law, should be strictly construed, and furthermore section 1959 required that the panel for the first week in which the remark was made should be discharged, so there was no probability that any juror trying defendant heard the remark.

3. CRIMINAL LAW §1144(15)—PRESUMPTION THAT REMARKS OF JUDGE IN ONE CASE WERE DISREGARDED IN ANOTHER CASE.

It will be presumed, where the judge in sentencing defendant's brother, who was also convicted of having possession of intoxicants for purpose of sale, made a remark as to their unlawful sales, that if any one who sat as a juror in the prosecution against defendant heard the remark it was disregarded.

4. CRIMINAL LAW §589(4) — CONTINUANCE PROPERLY DENIED THROUGH JUDGE PREVIOUSLY TRIED ACCUSED'S BROTHER.

Where defendant and his brother were both charged with having possession of intoxicating liquor for the purpose of sale, defendant is not entitled to a continuance because the judge before whom he was tried was the same as the one who tried defendant's brother a week previous.

5. CRIMINAL LAW §1151—GRANT OF CONTINUANCE ON DISCRETION OF COURT.

The granting or refusal of a continuance, like the granting or refusing of a severance or separation of witnesses, has been left to the sound discretion of the trial judge, and is not reviewable unless patent abuse appears.

6. INTOXICATING LIQUORS §233(1) — MATTERS FOR CONSIDERATION ON PROSECUTION FOR KEEPING FOR SALE.

In a prosecution for having intoxicating liquor in his possession for the purpose of sale, the jury might consider that, when officers were proceeding to take and carry off the liquor which defendant had brought to his brother's residence, defendant, who had escaped, returned and locked his car which the officers were about to use.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Allen, Judge.

Hayes Baldwin was convicted of having in his possession spirituous liquor for the purpose of sale, and he appeals. Affirmed.

The defendant was convicted of having in his possession spirituous liquors for the purpose of sale. The evidence showed that on the night of December 18, 1918, he drove up in an automobile to the house of his brother Joe Baldwin, near Apex (who was also convicted at the same term of the same offense). At the yard gate he took out of the machine four jugs nearly full of whisky, one of them being a three-gallon jug. He was arrested by the officers just as he put down inside the yard the last of these jugs. One of the officers went inside the house leaving the defendant in charge of the other. The defendant thereupon made his escape. In the back yard of the house seven five-gallon kegs of corn whisky were found in the chicken house.

The officers, intending to use the defendant's car to transport the liquor to Apex, backed it up to the gate and commenced loading the whisky on it, when the defendant suddenly made his appearance and took the key out of the car, thus preventing it being used, and again made his escape. When the officers arrived at the house of Joe Baldwin, it was lighted up, and when Officer Raines went inside he found the wife of Hayes Baldwin playing the piano, and a little negro boy ran out of the house. There were in the house also two white people, two men, and two women who refused at first to give their names.

Upon this evidence the jury found the defendant guilty, and he appealed.

Armistead Jones & Son, of Raleigh, and Percy J. Olive, of Apex, for appellant.

J. S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

CLARK, C. J. [1-3] The exception chiefly relied on, it seems, was that the week before the judge, in sentencing Joe Baldwin (see State v. Joe Baldwin at this term, 100 S. E. 345), remarked that in his opinion Joe and Hayes Baldwin were not selling liquor to the people of Apex, but were delivering it to people in Wilson. This was in connection with the fact that the Wilson people found in the house who had been subpoenaed as witnesses had failed to attend.

The trial of the defendant Hayes Baldwin did not take place till the next week, and it does not appear in the record that a single juror on the trial of the present defendant was present when Joe Baldwin was sentenced the previous week. Indeed, Rev. § 1959, required that the panel for the first week (when these remarks were made) should be discharged at the end of that week, and there is no probability that any juror who tried this defendant on Thursday of the following week knew of the judge's expression as to the Wilson people on Friday of the week before. Nor could his remarks be considered as an expression of an opinion in the trial of this defendant the following week any more than the verdict of guilty against Joe Baldwin on whom he was passing sentence.

At common law and in England to this day the judge is not forbidden to express an opinion upon the facts of any case; but it was deemed that the judge who is an integral part of the trial could be of aid to the jury in expressing an opinion upon the reasonable inferences to be drawn from the evidence, though, of course, he could not direct a verdict when there was conflicting evidence. The same rule still obtains in all the federal courts and the courts of nearly every state of the Union. It is therefore not an inherent right of a defendant that the judge should be restricted from expressing any opinion during a trial. The North Carolina statute, being a restriction upon the almost universal rule, cannot be extended beyond its terms, which are as follows:

Rev. 535. "No judge, in giving a charge to the petit jury, either in a civil or a criminal action, shall give an opinion whether a fact is fully or sufficiently proven, such matter being the true office and province of the jury; but he shall state in a plain and correct manner the evidence given in the case and declare and explain the law arising thereon."

This restriction therefore forbids the judge only "in giving a charge to the petit jury" and from "giving an opinion whether a fact is fully or sufficiently proven." Being in derogation of the common law and of the practice and procedure in the English and federal courts and of the procedure generally elsewhere, we cannot extend it beyond its terms.

In State v. Jacobs, 106 N. C. 695, 10 S. E. 1031, where the judge remarked, just before the trial began, that the jailer had informed him that the prisoner "would escape if he had the opportunity," this was held not an expression of opinion forbidden by our statute. It was not given "in a charge to the jury," nor was it an expression of "opinion whether a fact is fully or sufficiently proven."

The court said:

"At common law, though the judge, as is still the rule, could not direct a verdict in any criminal case, nor in a civil case, where there was a conflict of evidence, there was no inhibition upon his expressing an opinion upon the facts. It was thought that such expression of opinion, while not governing the jury, would be of assistance to them, coming from an impartial man of much experience in weighing evidence and in drawing conclusions therefrom. Such is still the practice in England and her colonies, in our federal courts, and indeed in most of the states of the Union. In North Carolina, in 1796, the [following] statute was passed which changed the practice in this respect: * * * 'No judge, in giving a charge to the petit jury, either in a civil or criminal action, shall give an opinion whether a fact is fully or sufficiently proven, such matter being the true office and province of the jury.'"

The court added:

"It is difficult to see how the remark of the judge violated any provision of this statute. No juror had been selected, the remark was not in the presence of the jury, nor did it contain any opinion that 'a fact was fully or sufficiently proven.' No facts had been shown in evidence. Indeed, had the jury been impaneled, the statute prohibited the judge 'from expressing an opinion only upon those "facts" respecting which the parties take issue or dispute, and on which, as having occurred or not occurred, the imputed liability of the defendant depends.' Ruffin, C. J., in State v. Angel, 29 N. C. 27. To the same purport is the late case of De Berry v. Railroad, 100 N. C. 310 [6 S. E. 723]; also, State v. Jones, 67 N. C. 285; State v. Robertson, 86 N. C. 628, and State v. Laxton, 78 N. C. 564. In the latter case [in which the prisoner was convicted of rape], Smith, C. J., says: 'It is quite obvious from the words of the act that its special object was to prevent the intimation of such opinion in connection with and constituting a part of the instructions by which the jury were to be governed, and when its influence on their minds would be direct and effective.'"

After making the above citations, the court, in State v. Jacobs, said further:

"Our juries are usually men of intelligence, competent to understand the evidence and draw their own conclusions as to the facts. To construe every remark incidentally made by the judge, in ruling upon debated questions arising on the trial or otherwise, to have such weight upon the mind of the jury as to bias the freedom of their verdict, is as little complimentary to the intelligence and sturdy independence of those who compose our juries as it is to the impartiality of those who are called upon to preside over our superior and criminal courts."

In State v. Jacobs, supra, the remark was made just before the trial began, but the jury had not been impaneled; the remark was not in a charge to the jury; nor was it an expression of opinion whether "a fact is fully or sufficiently proven," for no facts had been shown in evidence, and hence it was held that it was not a violation of our statute restricting the judge as to such matters. There the men who were subsequently on the jury were doubtless present in the courtroom at the time when the remark was made. In the present case the remark objected to was made six days previously in passing sentence upon a defendant in another case, and there is no evidence that any one was present who subsequently served on this jury, and the presumption is that there was not, for the previous jury had been discharged by operation of law at the end of the previous week.

In State v. Angel, 29 N. C. 27, quoted supra, the prisoner was convicted of murder, and the remark of the judge excepted to was made in the charge to the jury. Ruffin, C. J., said in that case that the act of the assembly restraining the judges from expressing to the jury an opinion as to the facts of the case applied only "to those 'facts,' respecting which the parties take issue or dispute, and on which, as having occurred or not occurred, the imputed liability of the defendant depends." This has been cited often since; among other cases, in State v. Howard, 129 N. C. 661, 40 S. E. 71, and in the very recent cases of State v. Rogers, 168 N. C. 116, 83 S. E. 161, and Long v. Byrd, 169 N. C. 659, 86 S. E. 574.

Among the cases citing State v. Jacobs, 106 N. C. 696, 10 S. E. 1031 (besides those already quoted) is State v. Crane, 110 N. C. 535, 15 S. E. 232, where the court says:

"The jury is an essential part of the judicial system among every English speaking people, and, while not perfect, the experience of the ages and the observation of the present are that it performs fairly well its part. Certainly no better substitute has ever been found. To underrate the intelligence of twelve honest, impartial men who try the question of fact submitted to them is a mistake. When aided by a just and intelligent judge, their verdicts are generally correct. Jurors are not expected to possess legal training. Their province is not to pass on questions of law, but their grasp of the facts is usually just and accurate, and probably not a court passes that upon the jury there are not men of equal mental capacity with the judge who presides, or the counsel who address them. Jurors are not in their nonage, and it is not just to underrate their intelligence. This court has heretofore said as much in State v. Jacobs, 106 N. C. 695 [10 S. E. 1031]."

The court in that case (State v. Crane) was remarking upon the exception that though the judge had withdrawn evidence from the jury it would still be affected by it.

In State v. Jackson, 112 N. C. 853, 17 S. E. 150, where the exception was that during the argument of a motion for continuance of a case in the presence, but prior to the impaneling of a jury a bystander had remarked in open court that the prisoner's wife had said she would not come to a trial because she would only help get her husband in jail, it was held that it was not ground for exception because the judge did not grant a continuance thereafter, saying:

"If such remarks were grounds for new trials, all men present who might possibly become jurors would need be sent out of the courthouse on the argument of preliminary motions. Remarks made by the judge on such motions do not come within the prohibition of the statute. State v. Jacobs, 106 N. C. 695 [10 S. E. 1031], and cases there cited. * * * There is a presumption of law that jurors are men of sufficient intelligence to understand that their verdicts must be based solely upon the evidence adduced on the trial and the law laid down by the court."

In this present case, the remark of the judge in sentencing another party tried for committing the same offense does not appear to have been heard by any juror who sat in this case, and if it had been the jury would be presumed conclusively to have tried the case, according to their oaths, upon the evidence submitted to them.

[4, 5] The exception to the refusal of a continuance of the case of Hayes Baldwin because the same judge had tried Joe Baldwin the previous week has no foundation in precedent nor logically, for the facts are found by the jury only. 25 Cyc. 582, 583.

The granting or refusal of a continuance, like the granting or refusing of a severance, or the separation of witnesses, and like matters, has always been wisely and properly left to the sound discretion of the presiding judge, and not reviewable except in cases of patent abuse, which does not appear here. As was said in State v. Southerland, 100 S. E. 187, at this term:

"The judge is not a mere moderator, and it would detract very much from the efficiency and economy of the administration of justice if he were unnecessarily hampered with arbitrary rules as to matters which have always been committed to his sound discretion."

[6] The defendant also excepts that the court stated as a contention of the state that the jury had a right to consider as a circumstance that, when the officers were proceeding to take the whisky and carry it off, the defendant, who had escaped, came back on the scene and locked the car and again escaped. This was stated as a contention, but it would not have been error if the court had told the jury that it was a circumstance which they could consider in connection with the other evidence offered by the state in connection with having the liquor in his possession whether it was for an unlawful purpose.

There were numerous other exceptions; but, after a careful and full consideration of them, we are of opinion they require no discussion.

No error.

SPEIGHT v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. (Nos. 100, 101.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 8, 1919.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨843(2)—UNNECESSARY MATTERS NOT DETERMINED.

On an appeal in an action for damages for negligent alteration in transmission of a telegram, it is unnecessary to determine whether the message was sent out of the state to evade the state law where the message was intrastate as a matter of law.

2. COMMERCE ⇨28 — TELEGRAM BETWEEN POINTS WITHIN THE STATE SENT THROUGH ANOTHER STATE INTRASTATE MESSAGE.

Where the initial and terminal points of a telegram message are within the state, and there was a direct telegraph line of the defendant company between such points over which the message could have been transmitted without passing through another state, the message is intrastate, even though relayed through another state, and the defendant is liable under state law for negligent alteration in transmission, whether the alteration occurred within or without the state, in view of Const. U. S. art. 1, § 8, cl. 2, relating to interstate commerce, and amendment 10, reserving power to the states.

3. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES ⇨66(1) — TELEGRAM BETWEEN POINTS WITHIN A STATE SENT THROUGH ANOTHER STATE EVASION OF JURISDICTION.

In an action against a telegraph company for negligent alteration of a message in transmission between points within the state, in view of Laws 1919, c. 175, making such messages prima facie intrastate, and prohibiting their conversion into interstate messages, the burden was upon the defendant claiming the message was interstate to show that the transmission through another state was not done to evade the jurisdiction of the state, whose laws give damages for such negligence.

Allen, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Halifax County; Kerr, Judge.

Action by Addie Speight against the Western Union Telegraph Company. A verdict for plaintiff for damages was set aside, and a judgment of nonsuit entered, and both plaintiff and defendant appeal. Reversed.

This was an action for damages for the negligent alteration in the transmission of a telegram from Greenville, N. C., to Rosemary, N. C., both in this state. The message was as follows:

"Greenville N. C., 9:45 A. M.

"1—24—18.

"Mrs. Addie Speight, Rosemary, N. C.

"Father died this morning. Funeral to-morrow, 10:10 A. M. Appie O. Smith."

This message was delivered to the plaintiff at Rosemary, N. C., on the same day with the date changed from January 24 to January 23, 1918, thus making the telegram read: "Father died this morning (l. e., January 23d). Funeral to-morrow (l. e., January 24th)."

Upon receiving this message in the changed form, the plaintiff believed that her brother, who was the father of the sender of the message, died on January 23d and would be buried on the 24th, the date of its delivery, and it was impossible for plaintiff therefore to reach Greenville in time to attend the funeral. If the message had been correctly dated, it would have been apparent that the funeral was to take place on January 25th, and the plaintiff was thus misled and prevented from attending the funeral. The jury responded to the issues that the message sued on was sent out of North Carolina into Virginia and thence back into North Carolina "for the purpose of fraudulently evading liability under the laws of North Carolina," that it was "negligently changed in transmission in the manner alleged by plaintiff," and that she was entitled "to recover $100 damages."

The court set aside the verdict, being of opinion that as a matter of law in no view of the testimony was the plaintiff entitled to recover, and entered a judgment of nonsuit. The plaintiff appealed.

The defendant's appeal is upon the ground that there was no evidence to submit to the jury upon the first issue whether the message was sent out of the state, through Weldon to Richmond, thence to Norfolk, and thence back through Weldon to Rosemary, to evade the state law.

The plaintiff's appeal is upon the ground that the court set aside the verdict as a matter of law because the message upon the evidence was interstate and therefore damages could not be recovered.

George C. Green, of Weldon, J. P. Pippen, of Littleton, and Murray Allen, of Raleigh, for plaintiff.

W. E. Daniel, of Weldon, for defendant.

CLARK, C. J. [1] We do not think it necessary to pass upon the question presented by the defendant's appeal, for we deem that as a matter of law this was an intrastate message, and hence governed by our decisions, and it is immaterial whether the message was sent through Weldon, N. C., to Richmond, Va., and thence to Norfolk, Va., and thence back through Weldon, N. C., to Rosemary, N. C., in order to evade the North Carolina laws applicable to the transmission of messages of this nature in intrastate commerce, or whether this remarkable circumlocutory method of transmission was due solely to the method which the defendant corporation had adopted for its own convenlence in transmitting messages from Greenville to Rosemary. Both these points are in this state, and the defendant has a continuous line entirely in this state and in operation from Greenville to Rosemary. It transmits messages from Greenville to Weldon (67 miles) without going through Richmond, and it transmits messages from Weldon to Rosemary without sending them through Norfolk. It could have transferred this message at Weldon, N. C., and it did not make this an interstate message because the corporation chose to forward it to Richmond, Va., thence to be sent back through Norfolk, Va., to Rosemary, N. C.

[2] It could as well have sent the message to Raleigh to which it has a direct line, and there to be transferred to Rosemary, to which point there is also a direct line from Raleigh all in this state.

It was the defendant's own method, adopted for its own convenience, or according to the notions of some superintendent, that there were two transfers made at Richmond and at Norfolk, both in another state, instead of by the natural method of one transfer point either at Raleigh or Weldon, both in this state.

If the defendant saw fit to adopt business methods requiring this remarkable system of making three transmissions each of greater length than the entire distance from Greenville to Rosemary, i. e. Weldon to Richmond, Richmond to Norfolk, and Norfolk to Rosemary, it does not concern the plaintiff, provided the message was delivered with promptness, and without this error in transmission, which was doubtless caused by the additional relays required by this system of transmission.

If a package were sent by mail route or by stage, or by wagon, from Greenville to consignee in Rosemary, there being a continuous route between the two points in such condition that it did not require the wagon or stagecoach to go through Virginia to get from Greenville, N. C., to Rosemary, N. C., this would be an intrastate transaction, and the fact that the carrier chose that roundabout method of making the transportation through another state would not make this interstate commerce.

Frequently cars are put into "through trains" which rarely stop to cut out cars. If a carload of tobacco were shipped from Greenville to Rosemary, there being, as there is, continuous rail connection between the two points, this would not become interstate commerce because the railroad company, being reluctant to cut out the car at Weldon, should for its own convenience carry it on to Richmond, thence send it to Norfolk, and then again tranship it from Norfolk through Weldon to Rosemary. The convenience or the whim of the carrier does not repeal the jurisdiction of the state over matters retained by it in its grant of interstate commerce to the federal government.

If the jurisdiction of the state depends upon the method which the telegraph company shall see fit to adopt in the transmission of messages from one point to another in the state, the state laws could be repealed entirely, and doubtless would be, by the defendant telegraph company simply sending every message between two points in this state to a point outside the state and thence back into North Carolina; for it would be almost impossible to prove that this was done to evade the state jurisdiction, since no one but the defendant and its agents can know its motive. The question is not the motive of the defendant in shifting around its messages in this most extraordinary manner, but whether it has a direct line between the two points, which is in regular use and not out of repair and which can be used without carrying the message to another state and thence back into this state. It is not a question of motive, nor of what method the defendant prefers to do its business, nor of red tape, but simply a question of fact whether the initial and terminal points are in this state and whether there is a direct telegraph line between the two points, in good condition and in use, over which the message can be transmitted without passing through another state. If so, it is an intrastate message whether it is actually sent through another state or not.

If commerce is between two points in the same state, the jurisdiction of the state over it is protected by the federal Constitution by which jurisdiction of interstate commerce is given to the federal government, and which provides that all power and authority not therein conferred is reserved to the several states. Whether commerce between two points in the same state is intrastate depends primarily upon whether both termini are in this state, and the only exception is when it is necessary to cross through the territory of another state in passing from the initial point in this state to the terminal point also in this state. This was held by Shepherd, C. J., in Comrs. v. Telegraph Co., 113 N. C. 222, 18 S. E. 389, 22 L. R. A. 570, affirming the ruling of the Railroad Commission to that effect.

In Leavell v. Telegraph Co., 116 N. C. 220, 21 S. E. 391, 27 L. R. A. 843, 47 Am. St. Rep. 798, this court affirmed the last-cited case, saying:

"In R. R. Commission v. Telegraph Co. (Albee's Case), 113 N. C. 213 [18 S. E. 389, 22 L. R. A. 570], the court held that telegraphic messages transmitted by a company from and to points in this state, although traversing another state in the route, do not constitute interstate commerce and are subject to the tariff regulation of the commission. In this it followed the unanimous opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, delivered by Fuller, C. J., in R. R. v. Pennsylvania, 145 U. S. 192 [12 Sup. Ct. 806, 36 L. Ed. 672]. To the same purport, Campbell v. R. R., 86 Iowa, 587 [53 N. W. 351, 17 L. R. A. 443]."

In Bateman v. Tel. Co., 174 N. C. 97, 93 S. E. 467, L. R. A. 1918A, 803, the message was transmitted from Hertford, N. C., to Plymouth, N. C., and there being no direct telegraph line entirely in North Carolina from Hertford, N. C., to Plymouth, N. C., the message was necessarily sent through Norfolk, Va., and thence to Plymouth, and the court held that if this was done in good faith it was an interstate message; but that is not the case here, where there is a complete line of wire running from Greenville to Rosemary entirely in the state. The Bateman Case did not present the anomalous situation which we have here of the message going through Weldon in this state to Richmond, Va., thence to Norfolk, Va., and thence back through Weldon, N. C., to Rosemary, N. C.

In Lehigh Valley R. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 145 U. S. 192, 12 Sup. Ct. 806, 36 L. Ed. 672, it was held that transportation from one point in a state to another point in the same state, but passing through part of another state, could be taxed by the state, and is not a tax upon interstate commerce. This was a unanimous opinion and written by Chief Justice Fuller. To same effect, Seawell v. R. R., 119 Mo. 222, 24 S. W. 1002; Campbell v. R. R., 86 Iowa, 587, 53 N. W. 351, 17 L. R. A. 443. In Kansas City S. Ry. Co. v. R. R. Com'rs (C. C.) 106 Fed. 353, it was held, citing the above cases and Commissioners v. Tel. Co., 113 N. C. 213, 18 S. E. 389, 22 L. R. A. 570, that, "where the course of transportation [between two points in the same state] must be for a considerable part of the distance through another state," it is interstate commerce. This seems to be the modification, or rather interpretation, of the doctrine of the three cases named. Certainly it is the only reasonable limitation.

It has also been held that where a telephone line extends into another state this does not exempt it from state control in respect to persons and service and rates for persons within the state. Tel. Co. v. Falley, 118 Ind. 201, 19 N. E. 604, 10 Am. St. Rep. 114; Tel. Co. v. Bradbury, 106 Ind. 1, 5 N. E. 721; Hockett v. State, 105 Ind. 250, 5 N. E. 178, 55 Am. Rep. 201, 31 L. R. A. 807, note, 60 L. R. A. 646, note.

In Tel. Co. v. Reynolds, 100 Va. 459, 41 S. E. 856, 93 Am. St. Rep. 971, it was held:

"Where the initial and terminal points are both in the same state, and the telegram is transmitted over the wires of the same company, and concerns only citizens of that state, the message is a domestic message, and its character, in that respect, is not altered by the circumstance that the line passes in part over territory of another state. Nor is it affected by the fact that the company has established a relay office in such other state. The statute deals with the company, not its agents. The company in this case undertook to transmit the message from one point to another in Virginia, and it cannot escape the penalty imposed by statute for its dereliction of duty on the theory that the statute has no extraterritorial force."

The same doctrine of this case was reaffirmed in Tel. Co. v. Hughes, 104 Va. 240, 51 S. E. 225, though that was subsequent to Hanley v. R. R. Co., 187 U. S. 617, 23 Sup. Ct. 214, 47 L. Ed. 333, in which it was held that, where the continuous transportation of goods between two points in this state passes over a "route" a large part of which is outside the state, this is interstate commerce.

The case of Hanley v. R. R. Co., 187 U. S. 617, 23 Sup. Ct. 214, 47 L. Ed. 333, is not in conflict with what is said above. That merely holds that when goods were transported on a through bill of lading from Ft. Smith, Ark., to Grannis, Ark., over respondent's railroad, a direct route running by way of Spiro, Ind. T., a total distance of 116 miles, of which 52 miles are in Arkansas and 64 miles in Indian Territory, this is interstate commerce, and the state of Arkansas cannot interfere in opposition to a regulation of Congress. This case certainly does not justify the extraordinary proposition sought to be built upon it that it puts it in the power of any state or telegraph company to destroy the right of the state to regulate intrastate commerce whenever it can by any device, however unnecessarily, divert transportation or transmission of a telegram, through another state. It is admitted here that this message could have been sent entirely in North Carolina more directly from Greenville to Rosemary, but it is alleged that it was contrary to the defendant's business methods to do so.

In R. R. v. Leibengood, 83 Kan. 25, 109 Pac. 988, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 985, it was held that where the line passes from one point in a state to another point in the same state, but a part of the route passes over the territory of another state, this is interstate commerce. This case (1910) has there full citation of authorities, an examination of which will show that, when the route necessarily passes over the territory of another state, this is interstate commerce; but none of them hold that in a case like this, where both points are in the same state, and there is a line of railroad or of telegraph between those points which can be used, that it becomes interstate commerce because the corporation sees fit to arrange its method of transportation or of transmission so as to make a wide detour through another state and then back into this state.

Most certainly we cannot concur in the proposition:

"But if the purpose was apparent to avoid the doctrine as to mental anguish as applied in this state and to place itself under the doctrine of the federal courts, this alone would not be unlawful, and, if such an intent could be declared contrary to law, it would not subject the defendant to liability as motive, intent, or purpose, however reprehensible (if) not connected with some wrongful act, cannot be the subject of a civil action."

It is not a question of making the defendant company indictable, or liable for a civil action in transacting its business by sending it through another state, and then back into this state, but whether it can by so doing oust the jurisdiction of this state over intrastate commerce which was reserved to it when in the compact at Philadelphia in 1787 the states agreed to confer upon the federal government jurisdiction over interstate commerce, but reserved to themselves jurisdiction over intrastate commerce and all other matters not expressly conceded to the federal government.

The tenth amendment reads as follows:

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively, or to the people."

The power over interstate commerce conferred on the federal government is in article 1, § 8, cl. 3, as follows: "To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states, and with the Indian Tribes." The line between "state's rights" and federal rights has often been the subject of dispute, and has not yet been clearly marked and run in every particular. There is, unfortunately still, a "twilight zone"; but it is beyond dispute that, while the federal government has control over interstate commerce, the state has never granted it control over intrastate commerce, and when the transaction is between two points in the same state, and there is a continuous road or railroad or telegraph line between those points in good condition capable of being used, transportation and transmission between those points cannot be made interstate commerce by the company's method of doing business "when the purpose is apparent to avoid the doctrine as to mental anguish as applied in this state, and to place itself under the doctrine of the federal court." If this were true, if this were admissible, the line between state's rights and federal rights is not that drawn by the Constitution of the United States, but is nullified by the fraudulent purpose of the corporation to evade the lawful jurisdiction of the state which incorporated the defendant, gave it the right to do business here, and protects it and its officials and its property from violence. This doctrine would make the pecuniary interest of a money-making corporation supreme, and the powers of the people in governing the state under its own laws (within the limits of the federal and state Constitutions) entirely secondary to the evasive and fraudulent conduct of a private corporation. Surely the state authority cannot be made "null and of no effect" in that manner. The creature that the state has made cannot be more powerful than its creator, like another Frankenstein.

The establishment of relay offices in another state in order to evade the laws of this state, or even if only to facilitate its business, is not a "necessary part" of the transmission of the message, except to the extent that it may avoid the jurisdiction of the state court, or possibly be some economy in the transmission of the message. Certainly, the defendant could not evade the 25-cent limit prescribed by the statute of this state for a message between two points, and charge in lieu thereof the rate for a message from Greenville, N. C., to Richmond, Va., plus the rate from Richmond, Va., to Norfolk, plus the rate from Norfolk, Va., to Rosemary, N. C., thus making three messages out of one. This demonstrates that there is but one message in law, and that is from Greenville, N. C., to Rosemary, N. C., for which the telegraph company can charge only the state limit of 25 cents for 10 words, and subject to the state law for damages for negligence in the transmission of said message.

It may be that the error was made by the operator at Greenville, N. C., or by the operator at Rosemary, N. C. No one knows, but the liability of the company is the same and is not less because it saw fit to send the message by such a remarkable roundabout way. It is therefore possible and probable that in the multitudinous and circumlocutory manner of handling this message the error may have been made, at some point outside the state.

[3] Besides, the order setting aside the verdict as a matter of law was erroneous, for it found necessarily as a matter of fact that this method of sending the message out of the state relaying it at Richmond and again at Norfolk, and then back into the state, was not for evasion; whereas, the defendant having a direct, continuous line between Greenville and Rosemary one-tenth of the distance and requiring only one relay at Weldon, the burden was on the company to show at least that this was not done to evade the jurisdiction of the state whose laws give damages for negligence in a case like this from which the company is exempted if it can make this an interstate message by this device.

The General Assembly, taking notice of this custom, which the defendant has adopted, enacted chapter 175, Laws 1919, "to prohibit telegraph companies from converting intrastate messages into interstate messages," which provides that "proof of the sending of any message from one point in this state to another point in this state shall be prima facie evidence that it is an intrastate message," and it was for the defendant to rebut this prima facie case.

There was error in setting aside the verdict. If the first issue had been material, there was evidence to sustain the finding of the jury. The ground on which the court set the verdict aside and entered a nonsuit was because it held that upon the face of the evidence this was an interstate message, which we do not think was correct. But even if the finding upon the first issue was set aside, the other two issues left standing (as well as upon the finding of the first issue), the judgment should be entered in favor of the plaintiff, and the case must be remanded for that purpose.

Reversed.

(112 S. C. 528)

STATE v. COLUMBIA RY., GAS & ELECTRIC CO. (No. 10274.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 26, 1919.)

1. REMOVAL OF CAUSES §18—ACTION UNDER STATUTE DEFENDED ON GROUND OF REPUGNANCY TO CONSTITUTION OF UNITED STATES NOT REMOVABLE.

State's action to obtain judgment of forfeiture of defendant's rights in a canal because of noncompliance with conditions subsequent of grant conveying rights, defended on ground that the statute authorizing action was in impairment of contract rights, was properly brought in state court, and application for removal to United States District Court was properly refused.

2. REMOVAL OF CAUSES §109—DUTY OF STATE COURT AFTER REMAND TO PROCEED WITH CASE.

Where ineffectual attempt was made to remove action from state to federal court, it was duty of state court, after federal court had remanded case, to proceed as if no removal had been attempted.

3. STATUTES §238—COURTS CAN ONLY GIVE EFFECT TO INTENTION EXPRESSED.

Courts lean against a construction which creates a condition subsequent, because forfeiture often results in unconscionable hardships; but they have no power, by construction, to make or modify contracts or statutes, their power being limited to discovery of and giving effect to intention expressed.

4. STATUTES §238—FORFEITURE WILL BE ENFORCED EXCEPT WHERE COURT HAS POWER TO RELIEVE AGAINST IT.

Where it is clear that forfeiture has been provided for, it is court's duty to enforce it, except where court has power to relieve against it and the circumstances call for the exercise of that power.

5. STATUTES §181(1) — IN CONSTRUCTION THAT WHICH IS CLEARLY IMPLIED IS AS BINDING AS IF EXPRESSED.

The purpose of construction is to find out the intention, however it may be expressed, whether in apt and technical words or otherwise, and that which is clearly implied is as good as if expressed.

6. STATUTES §238—NO PARTICULAR WORDS NECESSARY TO CREATE CONDITION SUBSEQUENT.

No particular phraseology and no technical words are necessary to create a condition subsequent, and that which is expressed as a condition may be held to be only a limitation or restriction, and vice versa, if it clearly appears that such was the intention.

7. STATUTES §238—PROVISION FOR RE-ENTRY NOT NECESSARY TO CREATION OF CONDITION SUBSEQUENT.

Provision for reverter or re-entry for breach of condition subsequent is not necessary to creation of condition subsequent, since reverter and re-entry are but remedies which follow the breach as legal consequences.

8. STATUTES §205 — LEGISLATIVE INTENT MUST BE GATHERED FROM STATUTE AS A WHOLE.

The legislative intention must be gathered from the language of the statute as a whole, not that found in any particular section or proviso.

9. STATUTES §238—MUST BE CONSTRUED IN LIGHT OF CIRCUMSTANCES.

Statute must be read in the light of all the circumstances, the subject of the grant, and the purpose to be attained.

10. CANALS §20—GRANT BY STATE SUBJECT TO PERFORMANCE OF THE CONDITIONS MAKES PERFORMANCE A CONDITION SUBSEQUENT.

Act Dec. 24, 1887 (19 St. at Large, p. 1090), conveying canal "subject to the performance of the conditions and limitations herein prescribed," held to make performance of the prescribed conditions, relating to completion of canal, conditions subsequent, notwithstanding absence of provision for reverter or re-entry, except in proviso relating to only small part of work, such proviso being consistent with general intention to create conditions subsequent, and the purpose of grant being promotion of navigation, in view of Act Dec. 24, 1890 (20 St. at Large, p. 967).

11. CANALS §20—GRANT SUBJECT TO PERFORMANCE OF CONDITIONS NOT WAIVER OF RIGHT TO COMPLETION OF CANAL.

Act. Feb. 26, 1912 (27 St. at Large, p. 779), relating to completion of Columbia Canal, granted by state under Act Dec. 24, 1887 (19 St. at Large, p. 1090), subject to performance of specified conditions as to completion of canal, does not waive state's right to have canal completed.

12. PLEADING §216(1)—WHETHER REASONABLE TIME FOR PERFORMANCE OF CONDITION SUBSEQUENT HAS ELAPSED MATTER OF DEFENSE.

In action to enforce forfeiture for nonperformance of conditions subsequent, question of whether a reasonable time has elapsed for performance of the conditions is a matter of defense, and not open to consideration on demurrer.

13. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW §121(1)—DECLARING FORFEITURE FOR NONPERFORMANCE OF CONDITIONS SUBSEQUENT NOT IMPAIRMENT OF CONTRACT RIGHTS.

Act March 12, 1917 (80 St. at Large, p. 348), declaring that rights of gas and electric company to canal under grant from state had been forfeited for nonperformance of conditions subsequent, and authorizing action to enforce performance of conditions, held not to impair obligations of contract.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; W. H. Townsend and R. W. Memminger, Judges.

Action by the State of South Carolina against the Columbia Railway, Gas & Electric Company. From an order refusing its motion to approve and accept its petition and bond for the removal of the case into United States District Court, and from an order overruling its demurrer to the complaint, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Following is the order of Townsend, Circuit Judge, overruling demurrer, referred to in opinion:

"This cause comes on to be heard on demurrer to complaint, on the ground that it fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The first question is whether there is any condition in the grant by the state of the Columbia Canal working a forfeiture, because of noncompliance by the grantee therewith.

"A grant by 'an act of the Legislature * * * differs from a grant of a private person in that it is both a grant and a law, and, as such, the intent of the law is to be kept in view, and its purpose effectuated, whenever the subject-matter of the grant comes in controversy; and that construction must be placed upon it which will preserve and carry out the object of the Legislature, however such construction may conflict with the principles of the common law, or prevent the attachment of equities which would spring from transactions between private parties.' Jackson, etc., R. Co. v. Davison, 65 Mich. 430, 32 N. W. 728; Schulenberg v. Harriman, 21 Wall. 44, 22 L. Ed. 551; Nash v. Sullivan, 29 Minn. 214, 12 N. W. 698; Oregon & Cal. R. R. v. United States, 238 U. S. 416, 35 Sup. Ct. 908, 59 L. Ed. 1360.

"The sense of a law or terms of an instrument may be found in other words than the quoted technical ones, if the intention is made clear.' Oregon & Cal. R. R. Co. v. United States, 238 U. S. 415, 35 Sup. Ct. 917, 59 L. Ed. 1360.

"A history of the Columbia Canal, as shown by our legislative acts, may be found in the opinion in State v. Water Power Co., 82 S. C. 181, 183 to 187, 63 S. E. 884, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 435, 129 Am. St. Rep. 876, 17 Ann. Cas. 343. As there suggested, the Broad and Congaree rivers are navigable streams, and, while the grant was obtained by the grantee for his private advantage, it was made by the state primarily, in pursuance of a policy to benefit the community by the improvement of the navigability of these rivers (82 S. C. 186, 187, 63 S. E. 884, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 435, 129 Am. St. Rep. 876, 17 Ann. Cas. 343), and therefore to advantage to that extent the state. The grant contemplated a development of the subject of the grant by the grantee, in a direction that would promote the purposes of commerce. White v. Nassau Trust Co., 168 N. Y. 149, 61 N. E. 169, 64 L. R. A. 275. The property of the state in these rivers was ingrafted with a trust for the benefit of the public, and was inalienable except for certain public purposes. State v. Pacific Guano Co., 22 S. C. 83; Ill. Cent. R. R. Co. v. Ill., 146 U. S. 387, 13 Sup. Ct. 110, 36 L. Ed. 1018; Scott v. Lattig, 227 U. S. 242, 243, 33 Sup. Ct. 242, 57 L. Ed. 490, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 107; United States v. Cress, 243 U. S. 316, 37 Sup. Ct. 380, 61 L. Ed. 746.

"As stated in Water Power Co. v. Electric Co., 43 S. C. 163, 20 S. E. 1002, by the present Chief Justice, the grant in question was made 'upon the conditions therein stated.' Prominent among these conditions was the improvement of the navigability of the rivers by the completion of the canal from Bull's sluice, on Broad river, to a point a few yards above Rocky branch on the Congaree. The statute which makes the grant clearly declares the purpose for which it was intended the granted property should be used, i. e., the improvement of the navigability of these rivers by the completion and maintenance of the canal as therein prescribed, which was in furtherance of the trust held by the state. Such use would inure specially to the benefit of the public, for whom the state was trustee. The grant may be declared void if the declared purpose is not fulfilled. Mahoning v. Young, 59 Fed. 96, 8 C. C. A. 27; Slegel v. Lauer, 148 Pa. 236, 23 Atl. 996, 15 L. R. A. 547. The grantee cannot disregard the requirements of the law under which he received the property, and still continue to hold it. In effect, the grant was of a limited fee, made on the implied condition of reverter in the event that the grantee failed or ceased to use the property for the purpose for which it was granted. Northern Pacific Ry. v. Townsend, 190 U. S. 267, 271, 23 Sup. Ct. 671, 47 L. Ed. 1044.

"This disposes of the first and second specifications of demurrer.

"The legislative act of 1917, coupled with the alleged demand for possession and refusal, is equivalent to the exercise of the right of re-entry. White v. Britton, 75 S. C. 428, 56 S. E. 232; Schulenberg v. Harriman, 21 Wall. 44, 22 L. Ed. 551. A judicial proceeding was authorized by the act of 1917. Des Moines v. City Railway Co., 214 U. S. 179, 29 Sup. Ct. 553, 53 L. Ed. 958; Defiance Water Co. v. Defiance, 191 U. S. 184, 24 Sup. Ct. 63, 48 L. Ed. 140; New Orleans Waterworks Co. v. Louisiana, 185 U. S. 336, 22 Sup. Ct. 691, 46 L. Ed. 936; City of Detroit v. Detroit, etc., Ry. Co., 184 U. S. 368, 22 Sup. Ct. 410, 46 L. Ed. 592; Taylor v. Anderson, 234 U. S. 74, 34 Sup. Ct. 724, 58 L. Ed. 1218; Hammond v. Railway, 15 S. C. 10.

"The complaint shows no waiver by the state of any breach of conditions in the grant. The other specifications of demurrer were not pressed in argument. The purpose of this action is to determine whether the alleged conditions existed in the grant, and whether the defendant and those under whom it claims have violated them. Both the conditions and violations are alleged. If the defendant has any defense, it must be shown by answer.

"It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the demurrer to the complaint be, and is hereby, overruled; with leave to the defendant to answer, if it be so advised, within 20 days from the date of this order."

William Elliott and J. B. S. Lyles, both of Columbia, for appellant.

T. H. Peeples, Atty. Gen., B. L. Abney and J. Fraser Lyon, both of Columbia, and S. M. Wolfe, Atty. Gen., for the State.

HYDRICK, J. The state brought this action to obtain a judgment of forfeiture of the rights of defendant in and to the Columbia Canal, and to recover possession thereof. The complaint alleges that the state was the owner of the canal, and, in pursuance of an act of the Legislature, in 1887 (19 Stat. 1090), it was conveyed to a board of trustees—

"for the use and benefit of the city of Columbia, for the purposes hereinafter in this act mentioned, subject, nevertheless, to the performance of the conditions and limitations herein prescribed on the part of the said board of trustees and their assigns: Provided, that should the said canal not be completed to Gervais street within seven years from the passage of this act all the rights, powers, and privileges guaranteed by this act shall cease, and the said property shall revert to the state."

That it had been completed nearly to Gervais street, something more than half its proposed length, and the trustees were required to carry it on to the point where it was to empty into the Congaree river, as soon as practicable, and provisions were made therein for that purpose; that in 1892, in pursuance of an act of 1890, amending the act of 1887 (20 Stat. 967), the trustees conveyed it to the Columbia Water Power Company, "subject, nevertheless, to the conditions, limitations, provisos, and exceptions" contained in said acts, and in 1905 the Water Power Company conveyed it in like manner to defendant; that the chief inducement to the conveyance of the property by the state was to open navigation through the canal around the shoals in the Congaree and Broad rivers at and near their confluence, and develop the water power thereof south as well as north of Gervais street, all of which is provided for in minute detail by the terms of the acts referred to; that nothing has been done toward the completion of the canal south of Gervais street, notwithstanding it has long since been practicable to have done so, and defendant has allowed it to be obstructed, so as to prevent the navigation thereof north of that street, and has abandoned the completion thereof, and the development of the water power contemplated south of that street; that by an act of 1917 (30 Stat. 348) the Legislature declared that the rights of defendant in and to said property had been forfeited, and the same had reverted to the state, on account of the failure to perform the conditions upon which it had been granted, and the Attorney General and other agents of the state therein named were directed to take such steps and institute such action as they might deem proper to recover possession thereof, unless defendant should, within 90 days after the passage thereof, make satisfactory arrangements with said officers and agents with reference thereto, as therein provided; and that defendant declined to make any arrangements whatever with regard thereto, and denied any obligation to perform the conditions of the grant.

Defendant sought to remove the case to the federal court on the ground that the act of 1917 was in effect a denial of due process of law, and an attempt by legislative fiat to impair the obligation of the state's contract. Judge Memminger refused to order removal, on the ground that no federal right was involved, and that defendant could contest the validity of the act of 1917 in the state court as well as in the federal court. Thereafter the federal court remanded the case, on the ground that no right under federal law was necessarily involved.

[1] There was no error in refusing the application for removal. Taylor v. Anderson, 234 U. S. 74, 34 Sup. Ct. 724, 58 L. Ed. 1218; Arkansas v. Kansas & Texas Coal Co., 183 U. S. 185, 22 Sup. Ct. 47, 46 L. Ed. 144.

[2] Besides, when the federal court remanded the case it was the duty of the state court to proceed as though no removal had been attempted. Railroad Co. v. Koontz, 104 U. S. 5, 26 L. Ed. 643; St. Paul, etc., R. Co. v. McLean, 108 U. S. 212, 2 Sup. Ct. 498, 27 L. Ed. 703; Empire Co. v. Towboat Co., 59 S. C. 549, 38 S. E. 156.

Defendant demurred to the complaint for insufficiency, on several grounds, the one chiefly relied upon being that the act of 1887 does not contain apt words to create a condition subsequent the breach of which would work a forfeiture. Judge Townsend overruled the demurrer in an opinion which will be reported. The conclusions therein announced are fully supported by the authorities cited.

[3] While courts lean against a construction which creates a condition subsequent, because that works forfeiture which often results in unconscionable hardship, they have no power by construction to make or modify contracts or statutes.

[4] Their power and duty is limited to the discovery of the intention therein ex-fense, and not open to consideration on demurrer.

13. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW §121(1)—DECLARING FORFEITURE FOR NONPERFORMANCE OF CONDITIONS SUBSEQUENT NOT IMPAIRMENT OF CONTRACT RIGHTS.

Act March 12, 1917 (80 St. at Large, p. 348), declaring that rights of gas and electric company to canal under grant from state had been forfeited for nonperformance of conditions subsequent, and authorizing action to enforce performance of conditions, held not to impair obligations of contract.
